THE approach of another Session is suggestive of the inevitable annual volume of new Acts of Parliament. It may also suggest to a few discontented spirits an inquiry whether it is absolutely necessary that each volume of the Statutes should be as cumbrous as its predecessor, and each year's legislation as unscientific as that of the year before. We pointed out some time ago * what appeared to us to be very important defects in the way in which the Statutes are promulgated, and we made certain suggestions for the re-classification, not only of the annual issue of Acts of Parliament, but also of the long-promised new edition of all such Acts as are now in force. The new edition, which, with the appliances now at the disposal of Government, in the shape of repealing Acts and registers of repealed Acts, might easily have been published a year ago, is not as yet even announced. So that the lawyer who wishes to have at hand all the living statute law, which certainly need not occupy more than eight or ten volumes, is compelled to purchase a library of from fifty to one hundred and fifty volumes, according to the edition which he may choose. The annual issue of the Statutes still labours under almost all the defects which we indicated in our former article. The volume for last Session is indeed somewhat less bulky than its predecessor. Twenty-two Acts of the kind which, as we pointed out, have no claim to be called "Public General," have been omitted from the authorised edition of such Acts; but the change has obviously been made merely as a rough and ready mode of lightening the book, and has been guided by no clear conception of the principle upon which such a change should be founded. The very first qualification of an editor of the Statutes should be the possession of a definition of the term "Public General." Such a definition we believe to be totally wanting to the minds of those now in authority. In their use of the word "Public," they evidently waver between three different senses—namely, law passed for State purposes, law to be judicially noticed, and law passed at the public expense; while to the word "General" they attach no meaning whatever. Many Acts habitually included in previous volumes of the Public General Statutes are, as we explained before, only private Acts, called "public" in order to simplify the process of passing them. A number of these have accordingly at length been degraded from their usurped position, but many others have been left untouched. If "An Act for confirming certain provisional Orders made by the Board of Trade under the General Pier and Harbour Act, 1861, relating to Carlingford Lough, Elgin, &c. &c." is no longer to be called "Public General," why should not the same justice be meted out to "An Act for declaring valid certain Orders of Her Majesty in Council relating to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners for England and to the Deans and Chapters of certain churches"? The long and short of the matter is, that it is impossible to re-classify the Statutes to any good purpose without first clearly determining upon what principle the operation is to be conducted.

The grand division of Statutes should be into "Public" and "Private." "Public statutes" should be such as are passed for State objects, and therefore at the expense of the nation. "Private statutes" should be such as, being passed for the advantage of private persons, are paid for by their promoters. The latter class would comprise all the Acts now known as "Local and Personal," as well as those specifically called "Private." These should be printed and published just as they now are. The former class would correspond to those now called "Public General." They should be printed and published rather as an historical monument than as a body of law. For legal purposes they would be subdivided into "General" and "Special." The "Public Special" Acts would comprise those the operation of which is restricted to a definite time, place, person, or object—namely, annual Acts; Acts which, though passed for State purposes, relate merely to local or personal rights; and Acts which are merely legislative authority for doing a certain work. The "Public General" Acts would not only be passed for State purposes, but would also be true laws; and with these alone would the lawyer be concerned. But even this collection should be split up into four separately numbered series, containing respectively laws operative only in England, in Scotland, in Ireland, and in the colonies or India. The ordinary English lawyer would of course need only the "English series" of the "Public General" Statutes. The advantages of the proposed arrangement over that now in use will at once appear from an analysis of the volume of so-called "Public General Statutes" of last Session. This volume, with which every lawyer is obliged to encumber himself if he would have any authorised statement of the legislation of the year, contains 130 Acts, occupying 1,150 pages. Only 318, however, of these pages are occupied by true laws having any operation in England; 358 pages are occupied by Scotch, 142 by Irish, and 21 by Colonial Acts, of a public general character. Of the "Public Special" Acts, as we would call them, the "annual Acts" occupy 209 pages, the "legislative warrants" 16, and the "Local and Personal" 77. Instead of having to purchase a volume of 1,150 pages, the English lawyer would, under the arrangement proposed, get all that concerns him in the compass of 318 pages.

* Saturday Review, 20th July, 1867.

As specimens of the Acts of which he would be relieved, we will mention the title of one Act of each of the classes which should be severed from the "Public General English." Among the Public General we may name, in the Scotch series, "An Act to Consolidate the Statutes relating to the Constitution and Completion of Titles to Heritable Property in Scotland, and to make certain changes in the Law of Scotland relating to Heritable Rights"; in the Irish series, "An Act to amend the Law relating to Reformatory Schools in Ireland;" in the Colonial series, "An Act to make provision for the appointment of Members of the Legislative Council of New Zealand, and to remove doubts in respect of past Appointments." Among the Public Special we find of the "annual" Acts, "An Act for punishing Mutiny and Desertion, and for the better payment of the Army and their Quarters"; of the "legislative warrants," "An Act for extending the Provisions of the Thames Embankment and Metropolis Improvement (Loans) Act, 1864, and for amending the Powers of the Metropolitan Board of Works in relation to Loans under that Act"; and of the "Local and Personal," "An Act to settle an Annuity upon Sir Robert Napier, G.C.B., G.C.S.I., and the next surviving Heir Male of his body, in consideration of his eminent services." With none of these Acts has the English lawyer, it is submitted, any more concern than he has with the French code, or with the Marquis of Westminster's title-deeds.

If the principle of classification which we have just described would be beneficial when applied to each year's legislation, still more striking results would follow from its application to a revised edition of the whole of the Statute law. The Statute-book may, as we have already stated, be reduced by the omission of repealed and spent enactments from fifty volumes to eight or ten volumes. But these again may be cut down, perhaps by one third, by the omission of all Acts which, although "Public," are not also "General," according to our use of the term. And this decrease in bulk would be accompanied by an increase in usefulness. The true laws, of which the collection would exclusively consist, would be more accessible from being disencumbered of all enactments of a different character. But the work would be rendered still cheaper and more convenient by being broken up, like the annual issue, into an "English," a "Scotch," an "Irish," and a "Colonial" series. There is no reason why an English lawyer should be compelled to load his shelves with the Statute law of Scotland, any more than with the "Code Civil" of Lower Canada, merely because Scotland, like Canada, is subject to the Crown of England. It is a mere accident in the question that the Scotch Statutes are made by the same Parliament which passes statutes for England. There should doubtless be a monumental edition, for historical reference, of every public statute, whether general or special, which has been passed since Magna Charta; but for legal purposes there should be an edition weeded of everything which is not general law, and divided into four series—the English, the Scotch, the Irish, and the Colonial. The reference of each Bill, on its introduction into Parliament, to its proper class, and its numbering, on becoming an Act, according to its position in that class, would of course require some new administrative machinery, but this might be of the simplest kind. If method were introduced into the promulgation of new laws, it would no longer be possible to frame a statute, as is now constantly done, part of which is a true general law, and part of which deals entirely with private rights. Glaring examples of this error are not wanting among the Acts of last Session. Chapter 99 is mainly for the purpose of continuing a long list of private Turnpike Acts, but it also meddles with the general law of Turnpikes and Highways. On the other hand, Chapter xlvi. of the Local Acts not only confirms certain provisional orders, but also amends the Pier and Harbour Act, 1861. The line between the so-called "Public General" and the "Local and Personal" Acts is also most uncertain. Among the latter is (c. cxiii.) an Act to repeal the Gun-barrel Proof Act of 1855; so is (c. lxxx.) an Act regulating metropolitan subways. An Act regulating metropolitan streets (c. v.) is, however, a public general Act. Again, temporary and permanent enactments are intermingled in the most confused manner. The first half of the Registration Act (c. 58) relates to the registration of the year 1868, and is therefore already obsolete; the latter half affects the law of the subject permanently. Briefly to recapitulate, we would urge upon the Government to determine upon dividing the Statutes into "Public" and "Private"; then, leaving the private Acts without any attempt at classification, to subdivide the public into "General" and "Special"; and to break up the "Public General" into four series, to be distinguished as the English, Scotch, Irish, and Colonial. This arrangement not only to be carried out in the case of the annual volume of new Statutes, but also to be made use of in selecting the contents of the revised edition of all the Statutes. Such edition to consist solely of "Public General" Acts, and to be broken up into the four series above mentioned.

Were these measures carried out, the first step would have been taken towards the improvement of the form under which the law of England is manifested. In the case of the Statutes at least, the jurist would be able to say, "In these four or six volumes" (as the case might be) "is contained the whole of the general law operative in England." Knowing precisely what the law is, and where it is to be found, and discerning, moreover, that its actual dimensions are by no means formidable, he would then be in a position to address himself cheerfully to the next stage of progress—to attempt to arrange the Statutes in a rational, instead of a merely chronological, order.

If law reformers could only by persuaded to define their terms and plan their course beforehand, their success might be both rapid and durable. Their ill-guided efforts at present serve only to make confusion worse confounded. Till they adopt a better method, the Statute-book must remain, like every other department of English law, a mere chaos through which wayfarers are misguided by a cumbrous and itself chaotic index.

ANDERIDA.

WE take for granted that no one now doubts that the ancient Anderida, the Andredesceaster of our national Chronicles, is to be looked for nowhere but at Pevensey. If there is any one whom Mr. Hussey and Mr. Wright have failed to convince, the thing is set at rest by the decisive judgment of Dr. Guest. The place answers all the requirements of the site in a way that no other place does; and we look on the question as one which, at this time of day, does not need to be reopened.

Pevensey then, taking it all and all, may perhaps be set down as the most memorable spot in Britain. It is possible that either of the events which make it memorable may be surpassed in immediate interest by other events in the great chains of cause and effect to which they severally belong. But we know of no place in Britain where two events of equal moment happened on the same spot. Anderida did not actually behold the beginning of the English Conquest of Britain, but it beheld the completion of one of its most important stages. It did not behold the actual turning-point of the Norman Conquest of England, but it did in actual fact behold its beginning. It was there, in short, that the founders of the South-Saxon Kingdom overcame the last resistance, call it Roman or British as we will, which the Teutonic settlers met with in south-eastern Britain. It was there that Ælle and Cissa stormed the last fortress of the Saxon Shore, and left not a Briton alive within it. And it was there that William the Norman landed on an errand which, to a superficial eye, might seem to be the undoing of the work of Ælle and Cissa. Nowhere do great historic memories crowd more closely together than in the historic land of the South-Saxon. It is no long journey from Pevensey to Hastings; it is a shorter journey still from Hastings to Battle. And it is not without significance that, on the hill of Senlac itself, on the site of the furthest English outpost, on the furthest point to which the great battle can have reached, the road branches off which bears the speaking inscription "To Lewes." So it was; Lewes, in a sense, wiped out Senlac and made England England once again. But, without Senlac, Lewes could never have been. And, without Anderida, Senlac could never have been. All three hang together. The birth of the English nation, its momentary eclipse, its final regeneration, all follow on each other in close sequence of cause and effect. Anderida, in the fifth century, played one of the greatest parts in that utter wiping out of all things Roman and Celtic which made England England. But the part which Anderida played in the eleventh century was not to begin a wiping out of things English, but only to begin their subjection to that fiery trial which proved in the end to be but the fire of the refiner. There is no spot in Britain, there are not many spots in the world, to whose lot it has fallen to play so great a part at two such memorable epochs. There is no spot in Britain where an Englishman is more irresistibly called on to stand and muse on the origin and fortunes of his race.

On the whole, it is the earlier event which presses most irresistibly on the mind as one muses on the site of Anderida. It is not William, but Ælle and Cissa, not the first Norman King, but the first English Bretwalda, whom the imagination calls up as the hero of the spot. Several causes combine to bring about this preference. The birth of our nation is a subject on which we are naturally more inclined to dwell than on its overthrow, even though the overthrow was one which led to its second birth. The earlier event too has that charm of mystery which is wanting in the later. We know every detail of the great campaign of William. Of the great siege of Anderida we know nothing for certain but the result, recorded in the stern simplicity of those few awful words which Gibbon truly said were more terrible than all the Lamentations of Gildas. To the more detailed narrative of Henry of Huntingdon we cannot give implicit belief; but, made up, as it doubtless is, out of very ancient ballads, it helps to throw somewhat of Homeric romance over the story. And, perhaps more than all, we have, so to speak, the living witnesses of both those memorable days, but witnesses which in the day of Ælle were actors in the scene, while in the day of William they were merely spectators. Not a Briton did the English conqueror leave within the walls of Anderida, but the walls which those Britons so vainly defended are still there to remind us of that day. There they stand, ruined and desolate; ruined and desolate they already were when William landed. Those massive walls and solid towers were built, in true Roman fashion, for eternity, and the mere hand of time has, as ever, fallen lightly upon them. They are still there, the very walls which so long checked the progress of the English invader, the walls which he at last scaled or undermined, the walls within whose circuit he slew, like Joshua at Ai or Cromwell at Wexford, every living thing that came within the reach of his sword. No such visible memorials are there to remind us of the landing of William. On that coast indeed the works of man have been more lasting than the works of nature. In the days of Ælle, and even in the days of William, Anderida was a great haven, and ships could ride at anchor under the towers of the Roman city. The towers are there still, but the sea, which bore the fleet of Normandy, has gone back. A marshy flat and a wilderness of shingle cut off the present Pevensey from the sea. To realize the fact that William landed where no one could land now calls for somewhat of an act of faith. But the deeds of the earlier conquerors we all but see with our own eyes.

In fact the true history and nature of the English Conquest is written in unmistakeable characters on the soil and on the ruins of Anderida. The South-Saxon Kingdom, the second Teutonic settlement in Britain, began in 477. In that year Ælle, with Cissa and his other two sons, made good his landing at Cymenesa in Chichester Harbour. The neighbouring city was conquered, and in process of time it came to bear the name of one of its conquerors, and the Roman Regnum became the English Cissanceaster. Fourteen years of fighting carried the invaders eastward to Anderida, the last of the fortresses guarding the southern portion of that long line of defence which the Romans knew as the Saxon Shore. This part of it was fast becoming a Saxon shore in quite another sense—in one denoting not those who threatened it, but those who dwelt along it. In 491 Anderida must have defended a small independent British territory, penned in between the two advancing English settlements, the Kentish Jutes to the East and Ælle's Saxons to the West. The fall of the city, and the massacre of its inhabitants, wiped out the last traces of British occupation and Roman dominion in this corner of our island. It was probably this great success which raised Ælle to that degree of supremacy —whatever that degree may have been—over the other Teutonic settlements in the island which is implied in his being the first Bretwalda. Hengest was now dead and the conquests of Cerdic had not begun. At such a moment Ælle was already the greatest Teutonic prince in Britain, and the South-Saxon Kingdom, so insignificant in after times, held for one lifetime a position which, if any one chooses, he may call Imperial. But the conquered city did not become the capital of a new Empire, or even the royal seat of the conqueror. No spot shows more clearly the way in which our forefathers dealt with their conquest, and the utter contrast between the manner of proceeding of the Franks in Gaul and that of the English in Britain. The Roman walls of Le Mans still fence in the oldest part of that noble city. The mediæval and the modern town have grown up around them, but the ancient hill-fortress still remains, as it has been from days before the beginning of history, a dwelling place of men and a centre of dominion. The Roman walls of Anderida fence in nothing; no human being now lives within their circuit. Probably from the days of Ælle till now no human being has lived within their circuit, except in the corner where a part of the Roman rampart has given way to a mediæval castle. English settlements arose close to the site of Anderida, but not on the site of Anderida. Just outside one gate arose Pevensey, just outside another gate arose West Ham—English settlements, bearing English names, settlements still existing in parishes, with churches, which churches might elsewhere be called ancient, but the dwelling-place of the vanished race is left utterly forsaken between the two dwelling-places of the new settlers. The lesson is an important one. The Roman has vanished, the Briton has vanished; ruined walls and towers alone witness to their former existence. And we may add that the Norman has, in a sense, vanished also—ruined walls and towers alone witness to the former existence of the castle founded by the half-brother of the Conqueror himself. But the Englishman has survived all. The two English settlements which grew up east and west of the forsaken Roman city are there still. They have preserved their uninterrupted existence as dwelling-places of men of English birth and speech. Their churches stand as memorials of that great spiritual conquest the effects of which have remained as uninterruptedly to this day as the effects of the great national conquest itself. They speak of a Christianity which has gone on unbroken ever since the mission of Wilfrith in the seventh century. But it is as important to notice that they speak of no Christianity earlier than the seventh century. Here we may again make the ever instructive contrast between Gaul and Britain. Anderida, a Christian city, doubtless contained, like any city of Gaul, a church or churches dating from the first establishment of the Gospel, covering probably the remains of some primitive martyr. In Gaul that church would still remain, rebuilt in its fabric over and over again, but preserving the site, the name, the traditions, of the earliest times. From Anderida all such traces vanished; how should it be otherwise? how should any traces of that earlier Christianity have lingered on, when not one of its professors was spared? But the English churches of West Ham and Pevensey continued their unbroken existence through the storm of Norman invasion, just as the churches of Gaul retained their unbroken existence through the storm of Frankish, Gothic, and Burgundian invasion. All that the landing of William did to them was to give them a foreign patron, probably a foreign priest, and to rebuild their fabrics in a foreign style. In short there is no spot which is in this way more instructive than the site of Anderida. There is none which more deeply impresses us with the true character of the two great events which it beheld. There is none which teaches us more forcibly the difference between the utter destruction which the Britons underwent at the hands of the English and the momentary subjugation which the English underwent at the hands of the Normans. And, if, as on such a spot we can hardly fail to do, we let our thoughts wander to lands beyond the sea, we better understand the wide difference between the Teutonic conquests in Britain and the Teutonic conquests on the Continent. We see that Hlodwig and his Franks had far more in common with William and his Normans than they had with Ælle and his Saxons. The differences between the Frankish Conquest of Gaul and the Norman Conquest of England are many and great; but, when we compare either with the work of Ælle at Anderida, we see that they are essentially conquests of the same class. They subdued the earlier inhabitants of the land, but they did not destroy them. The nation, its laws, its language, its religion, still lived on. All might be modified; none were abolished. The Frank indeed gave a new name to the land, which the Norman did not. But that was because the Frank could not, even by calling himself a Roman Consul, disguise the fact that he was a foreign conqueror, while the Norman could give himself out as the legal claimant of the English Crown, unhappily driven to use force to obtain his rights. And, after all, it was not till long after, and through the operation of causes which had very little to do with the first Frankish Conquest, that the name of France finally supplanted the name of Gaul. In fact it has not thoroughly supplanted it yet. As long as we speak of the Anglican Church and of the Gallican, our ecclesiastical language supplies a most speaking witness to the fact that Gaul is still Gaul, while Britain ages ago became England.

PHILLIPS v. EYRE.

IN this case the Court of Queen's Bench expressed, during the argument, an opinion exactly opposite to the judgment which it ultimately gave. The plaintiff complained that he had been arrested at Kingston, carried within the district where military law prevailed, tried by court-martial, and sentenced to be flogged, which sentence was carried into effect. These proceedings, or part of them, were authorized by Governor Eyre. They were manifestly illegal, and an Act of the Colonial Legislature was passed to indemnify those concerned in them. This Act required for its validity the assent of the Crown, and this assent was upon due deliberation given. The plaintiff now brought an action against Mr. Eyre, in an English Court, for the imprisonment and violence inflicted upon him in Jamaica, and the Court was called upon to decide whether the right to sue in England was taken away by the Act of Indemnity passed in Jamaica. When a man has sustained a wrong in an English colony he has the alternative of two remedies—he may either bring an action in the colony, or bring an action here. The question was whether a colonial Act could take away, not merely the right of action in the colony, but the right of action here. "It appears to me," said Lord Chief Justice Cockburn, "that the mere statement of the question affords an answer to it;" but the answer which appeared to be thus afforded was not that which the Court ultimately gave.

The principle upon which this decision proceeded is that a remedy for a wrong committed out of England may be had in an English Court, but that the question whether there is a wrong or not must be decided by the law of the country where the wrong is alleged to have been committed. Suppose that, instead of legislating ex post facto, the Legislature of Jamaica, in anticipation of future events, had passed a statute authorizing the proceedings complained of in the action. In such a case no right of action would arise here. When by the law of another country the act complained of is lawful, though it would have been by our law wrongful if committed here, it cannot be the ground of action in this country. The rule which obtains in respect of actions on civil contracts—that they are governed by the lex loci—is applicable to acts occasioning personal injury. It was, however, necessary to consider whether the same principle would apply where an act which was unlawful when done had been legalized and deprived of its tortious character, and had had immunity afforded to it by virtue of ex post facto legislation. But it can hardly be doubted that an independent State is equally competent for anticipatory and for retrospective legislation. And the colony must be considered for this purpose as an independent State. The local Legislature having been established with plenary power of legislation, the same comity which exists between independent nations will be extended by the Courts of this country to the colonial law when it conflicts with ours on matters within the jurisdiction of the colonial Legislature.

The foundation of the English law applicable to this case was laid by the case of Mostyn v. Fabrigas, which was decided nearly a hundred years ago. It was an action by a native of Minorca against an English Governor of Minorca for trespass and false imprisonment committed, as the declaration stated, "at Minorca, to wit, at London, in the parish of St. Mary-le-Bow, in the ward of Cheap." This curious example of a legal fiction was rendered necessary by the rule of law which required the venue or vicinetum to be stated in a pleading. This rule originated in another and very ancient rule which required the jury who were to try the cause to come from the immediate neighbourhood where it arose. In order that the officer of the Court might know from what district to summon the jury, it was necessary that the plaintiff should inform the Court not only of the county, but also of the hundred or vill where his complaint emerged. The simplicity of very early times did not contemplate the possibility of a transaction which might form a ground of complaint happening partly at one place and partly at another. But when this difficulty was felt, it was evaded by distinguishing between transitory matters, such as a contract, which might happen anywhere, and local matters, such as a trespass on land, which could only happen in one particular place. This distinction between transitory and local actions, which was thus invented by the Courts to relieve themselves from difficulties about venue, has been made to serve a more important purpose. For, if an English lawyer be asked whether his Courts will afford a remedy for a complaint originating abroad, he will answer by inquiring whether the complaint is transitory or local in its nature. The question which he thus asks cannot always be answered without difficulty. The English Courts held originally that an action for trespass on land was local; but an action was brought against Captain Gambier for pulling down houses at Nova Scotia by order of Admiral Boscawen, and a thousand pounds damages was recovered. A similar case was that of Admiral Palliser, who had an action brought against him for destroying fishing-huts on the coast of Labrador. But an action for trespass and false imprisonment is clearly transitory, and therefore such an action arising abroad may be maintained here; though the Court in adjudicating upon it would be governed by the law of the country in which it arose. The distinction to be observed in cases of this description is between the cause of action, which is to be considered with reference to the law of the country where it originated, and the mode of procedure, which must be adopted as it exists in the country where the action is brought. Now the cause of action which arose in Jamaica by the imprisonment of Mr. Phillips was taken away by the Act of Indemnity passed by the Legislature of Jamaica, so that no cause of action existed which could be made available in an English Court. When the case is thus plainly stated, the decision upon it is not only intelligible, but inevitable.

There was a recent case of Scott v. Lord Seymour, in which damages were sought to be recovered for an assault committed in the kingdom of Naples. The decision in this case turned upon the construction which the Court placed upon the defendant's pleas, and the greater part of the report of the case is occupied with a verbal discussion, which is at once intricate and unprofitable. But Mr. Justice Wightman, in his judgment, did say something, although not very much, which might be thought to be opposed to the judgment lately delivered by the Court of Queen's Bench. Two constructions had been proposed of the defendant's plea. According to the construction which the majority of the Judges did not adopt, the plea stated that by the law of Naples no damages for the alleged trespass were recoverable in any form of procedure in the Courts of Naples. Mr. Justice Wightman said that, if this construction were adopted, his opinion, nevertheless, was that an action would be maintainable in England by one British subject against another British subject for an assault committed in a foreign country. "I am not aware," says the learned Judge, "of any rule of law which would disable a British subject from maintaining an action in this country for damages against another British subject for an assault and battery committed by him in a foreign country, merely because no damages were recoverable by the law of the foreign country, and without any allegation that such trespasses were lawful or justifiable in that country." Applying these words to the case before the Court, and treating Jamaica, as for this purpose it may be treated, as a foreign country, they merely amount to this, that Mr. Phillips would not be disabled from suing Mr. Eyre for damages for trespass committed in Jamaica merely because no damages for such trespass were recoverable by the law of Jamaica. But if Mr. Eyre could allege in his defence, not only that damages were not recoverable in Jamaica, but also that the trespass for which he was sued was lawful and justifiable in Jamaica, then it would seem to follow from Mr. Justice Wightman's language that Mr. Phillips would be disabled from maintaining his action in the English Court; and Mr. Eyre could make the necessary allegation, at least to this extent, that the trespass was legalized and justified by the Act of Indemnity. We are dealing, however, with a mere opinion of a single judge, which was not adopted by other judges who assisted in the decision, and this is all that can be produced in the shape of authority against the recent judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench. On the other hand, the Court relied on cases which establish that an act authorized by the law of the country where the act is done cannot be the subject of legal proceedings here. One case was that of an action against the late Admiral Sir Charles Napier, who, in the service of the Queen of Portugal, captured a British ship for breaking blockade. We may remark, by the way, that British admirals, in addition to all their other claims to their country's gratitude, are entitled to the credit of having illustrated some of the more obscure portions of international law, and have, so to speak, furnished charts and soundings of the legal ocean, by becoming defendants in many actions at law, in some of which it is to be feared that they have had to pay damages and costs. We cannot but feel pity for the fate of Captain Gambier, who actually brought home in his own ship from Nova Scotia the injured sutler at whose suit he was immediately afterwards summoned to appear and defend himself in a Court of law. In the case of Admiral Napier, however, the Court was able to find a sufficient justification for his conduct, "because the Queen of Portugal in her own territory had the right to make the seizure lawful, so that the defendant could justify the act done." This case and others which were cited establish the principle upon which the Court of Queen's Bench proceeded, and, indeed, in the instance of Portugal or of Chili it is indisputable. The difficulty of the question only arises when we come to apply to the island of Jamaica this principle, which undoubtedly applies to an independent State. But, as the Lord Chief Justice said, "plenary power to make laws having been conferred on the local Legislature, subject to the assent of the Sovereign, it cannot be disputed that it was within its competence to pass the law referred to in the defendant's plea," and the effect of that law had already been declared by the Court.

Supposing this decision to be well founded in law and reason, Mr. Eyre will be required to make no further answer to the greater part of the complaint of Mr. Phillips. There remains, however, a small fragment of the charge unanswered. The plaintiff was sent by sea from the place of his arrest to the place of trial, and it may be that the ship which carried him passed beyond the limit of the territorial authority of the Legislature of Jamaica. To this extent, an act for which the defendant would be responsible would remain uncovered by the indemnity, and the defendant would be liable to pay damages in respect of it.

REVIEWS.

LIVES OF LORD LYNDHURST AND LORD BROUGHAM.*

Of all Lord Campbell's biographies, the Lives of his two eminent contemporaries are in tone and feeling the worst. It happened that they both survived him; and in later years he was on friendly terms with his more brilliant rivals; but, although Lord Campbell exhibits no depth of malignant feeling, he is almost uniformly ill-natured. Having long ceased to hate Lyndhurst, and living at the time on intimate terms with Brougham, he seems to have retained his early feeling of dislike to both, unless indeed he does himself injustice by a mere trick or habit of ungenerous depreciation. If any person feels an interest in the reputation of Lyndhurst or of Brougham, his susceptibility may perhaps be relieved by observing the impartial ill-will of Lord Campbell to all his professional competitors. Even his own father-in-law owes his pre-eminence at the Bar to "his own merits and the partiality of Lord Tenterden." Gifford, "though acute and shrewd, lamentably exposed his defective education, and proved that his sudden and unexpected rise was a mere frolic of fortune." It is perhaps not surprising that the lapse of more than twenty years should not have abated Lord Campbell's resentment at Lord Melbourne's appointment of Lord Cottenham as Chancellor, and of Lord Langdale as Master of the Rolls, over the head of the Attorney-General, in 1836. "Pepys being known to be very feeble in debate, the object was to select an assistant champion for the defence of the Government. A most unfortunate choice was made, and it was very speedily repented of." Speaking of the Session of 1838, Lord Campbell candidly admits that Lord Cottenham was acquiring reputation as an Equity judge; but he adds that he "showed no improvement as a debater, and avoided a conflict with Brougham as with an evil spirit." Lord Brougham and Lord Lyndhurst, it seems, formed a combination to drive Lord Truro from the woolsack in 1851. "They took a dexterous advantage of his antipathy to law reform, which he had not the prudence to disguise." Gossip, political, professional, or ordinary, has always an excusable tendency to become censorious, if only because an infusion of harmless calumny adds a cheap zest to conversation; but one-sided criticism affords poor materials for history, or even for biography. The spiteful acrimony of Voltaire's memoir of his visit to Frederick the Great is almost redeemed by its inimitable wit; yet there is something unworthy in the literary use of the most sparkling ridicule when it is founded on personal acquaintance. Lord Campbell's sneers and charges of dishonesty are not entitled to the toleration which attends humorous malice, for his style reflects the prosaic character of his intellect, and betrays his want of scholarly training. An epigram, though it may by design or by accident inflict a wound, is constructed in larger or smaller proportion for purposes of intellectual amusement; but the propagation of unadorned scandal merely gratifies unamiable feelings. The contrast between abuse and satire may be illustrated by a comparison between Lord Campbell's incessant carping and Lord Lyndhurst's deliberately mutilated quotation from Macbeth on the occasion of Lord Campbell's accession as Chancellor:—

> Thou hast it now, king, Cawdor, Glamis, all
> That the weird women promised.

A recent writer has added the words which supplied the motive, not only for the quotation, but for the speech in which it occurred:—

> And, I fear,
> Thou playd'st most foully for it.

It was unlucky that no member of the House of Lords was sufficiently well read in Shakspeare to remember one of the most familiar passages in Macbeth. Lord Lyndhurst's implied attack, notwithstanding its ostensible severity, was essentially playful and innocuous, inasmuch as it was notorious that Lord Campbell had not earned his promotion by any kind of foul play. The jest lay in the certainty that it would not be understood by its object, while there was a reasonable though ill-founded hope that it would be appreciated by one or two of his audience. Lord Lyndhurst's peculiarities, or failings, seem to have been more distasteful to his biographer than the eccentricities of Lord Brougham. In both cases there was abundant ground for moral disapprobation; and it would seem that Lord Campbell's intellect was rebuked by Lyndhurst's, as Antony's spirit was by Cæsar's. With Brougham he could measure himself on more equal terms, for although far his inferior in versatility of intellect and in general attainments, he knew himself to be a better lawyer, a better judge, and a more steady and prudent politician. Lord Lyndhurst surpassed both in robustness and subtlety of understanding; and, throughout a public career which often exposed him to censure, he was adroit, and on the whole fortunate.

Lord Campbell is never tired of repeating the statement that Lyndhurst had in early life been a Jacobin; and he assumes that he suddenly changed his opinions on obtaining, at the mature age of forty-five, a seat for a Government borough. As Lord Lyndhurst repeatedly contradicted the charge when it was raised in the House of Commons, and afterwards in the House of Lords, the burden of proof falls on his accusers, and it is remarkable that Lord Campbell never attempts to support his own assertion except by the testimony of Lord Denman. The truth appears to have been that, after professing extreme doctrines in his youth, Lyndhurst had for many years before his entrance into Parliament wholly ceased to be a politician. It is highly probable that, at the mess of the Midland Circuit or elsewhere, he may have amused himself by startling commonplace Whigs and Tories by revolutionary language; but it is difficult to conceive that he can [illegible] idered almost worthless by his careless confusion of inferences or conjectures with facts. It is known from other sources of information that, holding at the time the office of Chief Baron of the Exchequer, Lord Lyndhurst was summoned to assist the King in forming a Government, on the resignation of Lord Grey, in the spring of 1832. According to Lord Campbell, "Now was the most splendid moment of Lyndhurst's career. One fine morning, while he was sitting in the Court of Exchequer, listening to the argument on a special demurrer, and asking Bayley which way he should give judgment, a letter was delivered to him from Sir Herbert Taylor." The apocryphal fine morning may pass as a cant phrase or figure of speech; but it is unlikely that Lord Campbell should have taken the trouble to ascertain that the Court was, on the fine morning in question, occupied in hearing arguments on special demurrers. It is perfectly certain that neither Lord Lyndhurst nor Baron Bayley ever told him that the Chief Baron was at the moment asking his puisne colleague how he should give judgment. It is only because the biographer wishes to combine a graphic picture with a collateral sneer that he encumbers his narrative with mythological details. The special demurrer and the application to Baron Bayley matter little in themselves, but the fiction throws a doubt on the truth of more important statements, and even on the meaning of the writer. In a paragraph with the marginal note "Lyndhurst's obliging disposition," Lord Campbell, after mentioning a trifling favour conferred by Lord Lyndhurst on himself, proceeds to assert that in 1841, "to excite me to discontent and desertion, he pretended to say that the Whigs were very much to blame in leaving me without any retired allowance or provision of any sort." Instead of pretending to say anything of the kind, Lyndhurst evidently said it; nor is there any reason to doubt that he thought what he said. The supposed object of inducing Lord Campbell to desert his party is not only conjectural, but in the highest degree improbable. The Government of which Lord Lyndhurst was then a member had an overwhelming majority in the House of Commons, and it commanded the almost unanimous support of the House of Lords. It was not likely that Lord Lyndhurst should wish to detach from the Opposition an additional candidate for office, especially as he was already provided with an auxiliary in the person of Brougham. It is only by internal evidence that it is possible to distinguish between Lord Campbell's authentic information and the supplementary details which he invents as ornamental or instructive. "He was a Whig, and something more, or, in one word, a Jacobin. He would refuse to be present at a dinner given on the return of Mr. Fox for Westminster, but he delighted to dine with the 'Corresponding Society,' or to celebrate the anniversary of the acquittal of Hardy and Horne Tooke." A careful student of the manner of Lord Campbell, who had just before said that he often met Copley at that time at public dinners, will probably incline to the conclusion that the biographer had heard neither of the disinclination to celebrate the election of Fox, nor of his attendance at the Corresponding Society. Lord Campbell correctly asserts that Lyndhurst never possessed the hearty confidence of Peel; and it is strange that he fails to mention the intrigue which Lyndhurst at one time meditated against his political leader. The story was told, with many ornamental additions, in the biographical obituary of Lyndhurst in the Times; and it appeared that the writer must directly or indirectly have derived his information from Mr. Disraeli, who was to have been brought into Parliament by Lord Lyndhurst's aid. It was intended, according to the narrative, that Lord Lyndhurst should become Conservative leader and afterwards Prime Minister; and the most remarkable circumstance of the story is that it is at least partially true. About 1836 or 1837 Lord Lyndhurst's satellites constantly hinted at an arrangement in which Sir William Follett, who had probably never been consulted, was to have been leader of the House of Commons. It is surprising that Lyndhurst should have contemplated an impracticable project which would never have shaken the supremacy of Peel; but his later attempt to reunite the Conservative party after the repeal of the Corn-laws showed that his judgment was sometimes unsound when it was disturbed by personal ambition. It is not incredible that William IV. may have countenanced a scheme which promised to relieve him from the hated presence of the Whigs. If Lord

Campbell had known of the existence of the plan, he would have rejoiced in an additional proof of the political obliquity which he has so sedulously denounced and illustrated.

The Life of Lord Brougham is fuller and more interesting than the Life of Lord Lyndhurst, and the narrative, notwithstanding the spirit of detraction which pervades it, conveys a vivid impression of restless and imperfectly regulated energy. As the biography was completed several years ago, Lord Campbell is an independent witness to the accuracy of Lord Grey's account of the celebrated prorogation of Parliament in 1831. The romance which Lord Brougham afterwards imagined has once more been shown to be entirely fabulous, although Lord Campbell seems to think that the Chancellor mainly directed the policy of the Reform Cabinet. In discussing his subsequent exclusion from office, Lord Campbell unexpectedly takes the side of Lord Brougham, and, with his usual candour in confessing the faults of his friends, he admits that Lord Melbourne and his principal colleagues were guilty, not only of harshness, but of treachery:—

> In my opinion Brougham was atrociously ill-used on this occasion. Considering his distinguished reputation, considering what he had done for the Liberal cause, considering his relations with the Melbourne Government, I incline to think that at every risk they ought to have taken him back into the Cabinet, however difficult it might have been to make conditions or stipulations with him as to his future conduct and demeanour. But sure I am that, in the manner in which they finally threw him off, they showed disingenuousness, cowardice, and ingratitude.

It happened that Lord Campbell considered himself deeply aggrieved in the course of the same transaction. He had been for a year or two Attorney-General, and on finding that Lord Brougham was to be excluded from his former post, he demanded the Great Seal for himself. Lord Melbourne told him that the arrangement was for the present impossible; and the Great Seal was put into a Commission consisting of Pepys, then Master of the Rolls, of Vice-Chancellor Shadwell, and of Bosanquet, a Common Law Judge:—

> Lord Melbourne gave me no explanation then, but in a little time I knew all. Brougham being absolutely and definitely excluded, the great object was to give him as little offence as possible, and as long as possible to ward off his active hostility. To have made me Chancellor would have instantly thrown him into a paroxysm of fury. On the contrary, they resolved to keep the office vacant for an indefinite time, and diplomatically to hold out to him the hope of still filling it. They told him that from his proceedings in Scotland during the last autumn having been misrepresented to the King, his Majesty had conceived a strong, though groundless prejudice against him, which would gradually wear away. . . . Therefore, to give a little time for things to run smooth, the Great Seal would be put in Commission. . . . I earnestly and honestly remonstrated, foreseeing that the plan could not possibly work well, and that the interests of justice would be sacrificed by it to party convenience. But Brougham was duped and acquiesced—nay more, he undertook, as "an independent peer," to patronize the new Government.

Lord Campbell's lax theories of historical accuracy leave a doubt whether the statements attributed to the Ministers were really made by them; but there can be no doubt that they represent the impression produced on Lord Brougham's mind. During the remainder of the Session of 1835 he cordially supported the Government, and it was not until Lord Cottenham was announced as Chancellor that he recognised the hopelessness of his return to office. According to Lord Campbell, his reason was temporarily affected by the disappointment, and during the ensuing Session he remained in seclusion in Westmoreland. He was not consoled, although, according to Lord Campbell, he ought to have been "gratified, and even amused, by finding that Bickersteth (Lord Langdale) had from the beginning proved an utter failure. Without any opponent the Ministerial champion had actually broken down." The injury which Brougham had suffered, although it was not altogether undeserved, rankled in his mind for the rest of his life:—

> I have myself heard him say, with tears in his eyes, "If Melbourne had treated me openly and kindly, he might have done what he liked with the Great Seal, and we might have ever remained friends. The pretence about the King's dislike I found to be utterly false. William may have been angry at the moment, and perhaps justly, for things I had said and done; but in April, 1835, when he was forced to dismiss his Tory Ministers, he did not care a button what individuals succeeded; and I was not a bit more disagreeable to him than Melbourne himself."

During his long administration, Lord Melbourne had thenceforth no more implacable adversary; and after a time Lyndhurst gladly relinquished to his new ally the ordinary conduct of active hostilities against the Government. Although no opponent could be singly more formidable or more troublesome, Lord Brougham's faculty of annoyance was largely curtailed by his isolated position. After his separation from the Whigs, who had never cordially adopted him, he fought thenceforth for his own hand. The Conservatives, availing themselves of his services, never tendered him office, or received him into their ranks. For many years he sat on the Opposition bench whether Whigs or Tories were in office, and, if his biographer may be trusted, he saw with pleasure the coalition of the Whigs with the Peelites at the beginning of 1853. "Instead of the formidable Sugden, he saw on the woolsack the meek and pliable Rolfe, created Lord Cranworth, whom he expected easily to manage." To Lord Campbell the temptation of sneering at a rival law lord is always irresistible. "The only interested object which Brougham now had in view for himself or his family was to obtain a remainder of his peerage for his brother William. He once had a great desire to become an Earl, but this was entirely extinguished by the elevation of Cottenham to that dignity." The "formidable Sugden" himself is not safe from Lord Campbell's attacks. Lord St. Leonards, during his Chancellorship, had proposed to repeal a Bill of Lord Camp[illegible] and "I was called in by Brougham to assist in repelling this aggression. We gave our 'noble and learned friend' a lesson which made him comparatively modest and humble during the remainder of his short tenure of office." Private friendship seems, according to Lord Campbell, to have afforded no security against the attacks of law lords on one another; but it may be doubted whether there was at any time an intimacy between Lord Lyndhurst and Lord Campbell. "Lyndhurst, in conversing with me, abuses and laughs at Brougham; Brougham abuses and laughs at Lyndhurst. I am morally certain that Brougham and Lyndhurst when talking together abuse and laugh at Campbell. Yet, instead of checking them, I am afraid that I join with them in this wicked propensity." The confession, though it is amusing and good-humoured, conveys an unpleasant impression of the characters described. In general it is indelicate, if not dishonourable, to join successively with two persons in ridicule and abuse of their respective faults. It may be collected from Lord Campbell's more deliberate criticisms that the comments on Lyndhurst and Brougham were not restricted to trifling foibles. "Although Brougham's statements were not much relied upon, he had never the reputation of a wilful teller of falsehoods, and he always maintained his position in society as a gentleman. His supposed entire want of sincerity may perhaps be explained by the diversity of feelings which agitated his mind at different times, rather than by his consciously expressing sentiments which at the time of expressing them he did not entertain." On the whole, the great legal dignitaries of the last generation seem to have deserved the questionable reputation which they sedulously strove to fix upon one another. Lord Lyndhurst was one of the most accomplished and one of the acutest of mankind; Lord Brougham was a considerable orator, and a marvellous intellectual gymnast; and Lord Campbell himself acquired and deserved a great reputation as a Judge; but a finer moral sense would have enabled them all to command more unmixed admiration, and probably it would have been found in their public lives an additional element of power.

THE EASTERN CHURCH AND THE NONJURORS.*

IT is not many years since "the Orthodox Church of the East" was to the majority of Englishmen a kind of terra incognita which they only thought of, if at all, in connexion with the bearing of Russia's policy on the future condition of Turkey. The Crimean war brought us into more direct, though hostile, contact with the religious life of "Holy Russia," and a mutual feeling of respect grew up between the British and the "orthodox" soldiery. Since then the interest in the Eastern Church, which was previously confined to one or two crotchety theologians, as they were generally regarded, has become much more general. Dr. Neale's History of the Holy Eastern Church, and Mr. W. Palmer's Dissertations on the Orthodox Communion, had already appeared, but they appealed to a very limited circle of sympathetic readers at the time. And an occasional article on the same subject from Dr. Neale's pen in the pages of the Christian Remembrancer, however learned, was apt to be put aside for the more exciting topic of controversies nearer home. Even the ill-omened scheme of the Jerusalem Bishopric woke but a languid interest among the great body of English Churchmen of whatever school, and was chiefly remarkable for the scandalous infraction, on the part of the prelates in partibus who were sent out to occupy that somewhat uncomfortable post, of the original terms of the compact with their Eastern brethren. Thirty, or even twenty, years ago, the notion of restored communion between the Anglican and Oriental Churches was at best the dream of a handful of ecclesiastical theorists, and anybody who had predicted that official overtures to that effect would shortly be made by the highest authorities of the one Communion, and favourably entertained by the highest authorities of the other, would have been looked upon as almost a monomaniac. But we live faster than our fathers, and what in 1850 would have been looked upon as an idle chimera was already, in 1862, beginning to be a fact. Perhaps the strangest part of the matter was the unexpected quarter from whence the movement was begun. Quod minimè reris, Graiâ pandetur ab urbe. If there was one part of the Anglican Communion where Orthodox and hierarchical sympathies would à priori have been supposed to be weakest, it was certainly the "Protestant Episcopal Church of America." Yet the first overtures for intercommunion with the East came from the General Convention of the American Church in 1862, when a Committee was appointed for that purpose. In the following year the Lower House of the Convocation of Canterbury appointed a Committee to communicate with the American Committee, and in 1866 the scope of their labours was extended under the authority of both Houses of Convocation and with the sanction of the late Archbishop of Canterbury, who took a warm interest in the scheme. At their suggestion, the following Resolution was unanimously adopted by the Lower House of Convocation at its last Session, July 4, 1868:—

> That this House humbly prays his Grace the President that he will be pleased, in conjunction with his brethren of the Episcopal Order, to take steps towards opening direct negotiations with the Eastern Patriarchs and

. . . . with a view to establish such relations between the two Communions as shall enable the Laity and Clergy of either to join in the Sacraments and Offices of the other without forfeiting the Communion of their own Church.

The author of the volume before us, Mr. G. Williams, Senior Fellow of King's College, Cambridge, is one of the few English divines of the day who have made the Eastern Church their speciality. And his present monograph, though it does not contain much new matter, puts what was previously known in a new light, and in a form accessible to many readers who would hardly care to wade through the instructive but somewhat ponderous pages of Lathbury's History of the Nonjurors, to the value of which he pays a just tribute. There is certainly something at first sight almost grotesque in the notion of a small and uninfluential community, which began to die out as soon as it began its separate existence, opening negotiations with the Greek Patriarchs and Russian Governing Synod as "the Bishops of the Catholic Church of Britain." And our sense of the incongruity of the whole procedure is not diminished when they coolly start with the whimsical proposal that the Greeks should defer to their suggestion by reversing the traditions of some fourteen centuries, and transferring the primacy of their patriarchal thrones from Constantinople to Jerusalem "for an idea," as Mr. Williams happily expresses it. His estimate of the position of the Nonjurors, both ecclesiastical and theological, is so temperate and just, and so different, we may add, from the enthusiastic ideal commonly accepted by High Churchmen, not many years ago, as sober fact, that it is worth while to put it on record here. Notwithstanding the vehement contentions about the "usages"—certain ceremonies in connexion with the Eucharist, not prescribed in the Prayer-Book, but very widely practised in the present day—their doctrines appear hardly to have risen to the level of what is now considered to be moderate and "safe" teaching, and were by the Greek Patriarchs denounced as sheer blasphemy. The following is the author's judgment of them:—

Whatever admiration we may entertain for the flower of the English Episcopate who refused, from conscientious motives, to transfer their sworn allegiance from the infatuated monarch, whose arbitrary and illegal proceedings they had so nobly resisted, to one whose title appeared to them to be based on mere usurpation; whatever allowances we may make for their learned and pious adherents among the clergy, who like them "took joyfully the spoiling of their goods" rather than compromise honour and loyalty and ecclesiastical order, by recognising uncanonical Bishops intruded by an Erastian Government, the question of whose jurisdiction must have presented a complication of difficulties, which we of this age, at least, may well have learned, by the painful experience of a Colonial Province and Diocese, to appreciate; there can be no difficulty now in condemning the policy which attempted to perpetuate the succession of a Nonjuring Hierarchy: a policy to which some of the most pious of the deprived Bishops were decidedly opposed. Of the canonical consecration of the substituted Bishops there had never been any doubt, and the question of their jurisdiction had been determined by the demise of the last survivor of the Nonjuring Bishops (Ken) in 1711; who had indeed voluntarily ceded his jurisdiction to his second successor in the See of Bath and Wells in 1704. The newly-consecrated Nonjuring Bishops did not even pretend to be the legitimate successors of the deprived Bishops in their several sees; for they never assumed territorial titles; and the presumptuous claim of Collier to be "Primus Anglo-Britanniæ Episcopus," was a distinct usurpation on the Metropolitan See and on the Primacy of Archbishop Wake, who succeeded Tenison in 1716, and whose dignified protest against this violation of all hierarchical order will call for further notice presently.

Ecclesiastically then, the Nonjurors were in an utterly false position; and it is not a little remarkable that the confusion of their ideas on the order and precedency of the Christian hierarchy should be found reflected in the very first of their proposals to the Eastern Church. Their cool suggestion for subverting the gradations of the Patriarchal thrones, settled nearly fourteen hundred years before by the authority of General Councils, and for transferring the Primacy of the Universal Church to Jerusalem, for no conceivable reason—or at the most "for an idea"—was as great a blunder as they could have committed at the outset of their correspondence; for it could not fail to create a prejudice against them as innovators of the first water, in the minds of those who were so wedded to ancient traditions, and so jealous of their privileges and prerogatives, as the occupants of the three Patriarchal Sees, which it was thus proposed to degrade and subordinate to the fourth, were sure to be.

Doctrinally, they were perhaps hardly better qualified to represent fairly the Catholic aspect of the Reformed Anglican Church; for although they undoubtedly maintained the distinctive principles of Sacramental Grace as opposed to the grace-evacuating tenets of the Puritans, and were very far indeed from being identified with the Luthero-Calvinists, as the Easterns mistakenly insinuated; yet they had certainly imbibed some of the peculiar notions of their Scottish associates—with reference especially to the doctrine of the Real Presence in the Eucharist—which appeared nothing short of blasphemy to the Orthodox of the East.

There is a curious account in the Introduction of a plan concerted with the Eastern Patriarchs, at the end of the seventeenth century, for the education of Greek youths at Oxford, by turning Gloucester Hall (the present Worcester College) into an establishment for the purpose. The design originated in a petition of the Metropolitan of Samos to Archbishop Sancroft, setting forth in touching language the ignorance and sufferings of the Greeks under Turkish tyranny. Compton, who was Bishop of London—or, as Dr. Woodroff calls him, "the Most Godly Metropolitan of Great London"—from 1675 to 1714, took up the scheme, which, however, never had any great success, and Dr. Woodroff, canon of Christ Church, was appointed president of the new Greek College. The Metropolitan of Samos, Joseph Georgione, who had suggested it, was driven from his see, and became a resident in London, where a church was erected for him in the then aristocratic quarter of Soho, used at present for Anglican worship, under the name of St. Mary's, Crown Street. During the brief existence of the Greek College at Oxford, another Oriental dignitary, "the Most Reverend and Honourable the Metropolitan of Philippopolis, Exarch of all Thrace and Drovogia," paid a visit to England in 1701, attended by three of his clergy, and was received in state at Oxford and Cambridge, and created a D.D. in both Universities, the degree of M.A. being at the same time conferred on the Archdeacon, Archimandrite, and Protosyncellus, who accompanied him, and his physician being made "D. Med." His Grace acknowledged the compliment at Oxford in "a very excellent speech, all in plain, proper hellenistick Greek," which lasted half an hour. At Oxford he was entertained by Dr. Woodroff, and at Cambridge by Dr. Covel, Master of Christ's College, to whose hospitality Archbishop Tenison had recommended him.

The next Eastern visitor to England of similar dignity, about ten years later, came under very different circumstances. Arsenius, Metropolitan of Thebais, with several companions, was sent by the Church of Alexandria to solicit English assistance against one Cosmas, who had been simoniacally intruded into the Patriarchal Chair by the Grand Vizier. The whole party seem to have been in great poverty, and, in fact, to have lived upon alms during their stay in this country, and the Bishop of London (Robinson) was very impatient to get rid of them, but was not able to do so for some time, even by an offer of 200*l.* for travelling expenses. "The poor Archbishop cried like a child when my Lord of London told him they must depart." It was through him that the Nonjuring Bishops, in July, 1716, first opened negotiations with the Eastern Patriarchs, and he carried a letter from them to the Czar. It appears from a theological statement, extorted from them with much difficulty by Dr. Covel, that they were so illiterate as to know nothing about the Synod of Bethlehem, which had about forty years before put forth a confession of faith, afterwards accepted by the Russian Church, and agreeing in all important particulars with the definitions of the Council of Trent. Yet the Eastern Patriarchs at the same time insisted on the acceptance of this confession by the Nonjurors as a sine quâ non of intercommunion; and the negotiations finally broke down from their refusal to accept it.

In conclusion, we may give Mr. Williams's statement of facts as to the creation of the Anglican See at Jerusalem, with which he was personally mixed up, and which has attained a certain historical interest since the publication of Dr. Newman's Apologia, as having materially influenced his decision to quit the Church of England. The correctness of the account of the matter given is attested by letters, which we have no room to insert, from Archbishop Howley, the Bishop of Oxford, and the late Lord Aberdeen, who was at the time Foreign Secretary, and who was an intimate friend of the Archbishop's:—

I crave indulgence to add to this public testimony of the veteran statesman my own private witness. When I had been nominated by the Archbishop as Chaplain to Bishop Alexander, I was instructed by his Grace to pay special regard to the Oriental Churches, in which he knew me to be already deeply interested: and he spoke to me of the Christians of the East with feelings of the most tender and compassionate sympathy and affection; claiming for them the utmost consideration and loving forbearance, on account of their long subjection to a degrading bondage; citing on their behalf, almost with tears, the Homeric adage:

> Ἥμισυ γάρ τ' ἀρετῆς ἀποαίνυται εὐρύοπα Ζεὺς
> Ἀνέρος, εὖτ' ἄν μιν κατὰ δούλιον ἦμαρ ἕλῃσιν.

If then the operations of this peaceful mission have been utterly contrary to what was designed; if, instead of contributing to heal the divisions of Eastern Christendom, it has aggravated them rather; if, instead of conciliating the Prelates of the Oriental Church, it has incurred their suspicion and contempt, if not their enmity, by petty aggressions on their lawful jurisdiction—feebly emulating the Latin Propaganda, without the same excuse; if, besides exhibiting the scandal of public faith broken before the Infidels, and ecclesiastical order violated in the face of all Christendom, it has rudely shaken the confidence of learned and pious members of our Communion, and alienated their attachment from the Church of their baptism; yet let the pious memories of William of Canterbury, of Charles James of London, and, I will add, of Frederic William King of Prussia—the author and promoters of the scheme—be exempted from the blame. Let all lie at the door of those who are even eager to bear the responsibility.

HER MAJESTY'S TOWER.*

THE first difficulty suggested by this book is, What is the meaning of its obviously silly title? Which, of all the towers in all the royal castles in Her Majesty's dominions, is Her Majesty's Tower in some special sense above all the others? By the light of nature we might have hit upon the Round Tower of Windsor as a tower which is obviously brought into a closer and more constant connexion with modern royalty than, for instance, the Eagle Tower of Caernarvon. But by the light of nature we should certainly not have fixed upon the Tower of London. The Tower of London has associations of its own, and names of its own, but there is certainly nothing which specially connects it with her present Majesty or her family. That "Her Majesty's Tower" was a sensation title was plain on the face of it; but even a sensation title might have a kind of propriety, and here we can find no propriety at all. Then immediately comes the further question what the book so called is. Is it a novel, or a book of gossip, or what? It is of course part of the joke, part of the sensation, to keep people on the tenter-hooks by putting forth a title which does not convey its own meaning. And, when we come to examine the book, our state of puzzledom is lessened by one degree, but only by one degree. The book is not a novel; it is not a topographical or architectural book; it is not a history in any intelligible sense of the word. It is simply a book in which the Tower of London is made into a peg on which to hang a great deal of sketchy writing about various people, mainly people who had to do with the Tower in the way of being prisoners therein.

* Her Majesty's Tower. By William Hepworth Dixon. London: Hurst & Blackett. 1869.

The second great difficulty is why Mr. Dixon should have written the book at all to which he gave so grotesque a title. The probable answer would be that there are people with whom this kind of thing goes down, and that, where there is a demand, there will also be a supply. This answer, however, will not satisfy the critic. Mr. Dixon's book will most likely sell, but, as critics, we still ask why it should have been written, because, as critics, we can find no place for it. It is not a description of the Tower; it is only in the first few chapters that something of the kind is attempted in a very poor way. And no description of the Tower is needed. The thing has been already done by the hand of a master. We presume that Mr. Dixon's book is, in some way or other, an expansion or development of a paper which he read at the London meeting of the Archæological Institute. But at that meeting the greatest living master of ancient military architecture made the Tower of London his own for ever. After Mr. G. T. Clark there is really no room for Mr. Hepworth Dixon. But from Mr. Dixon's book no one would ever learn the fact of Mr. Clark's existence.

But, if the book is not a description of the Tower, neither is it in any sense a history of the Tower. The Tower itself is lost in the history of the people who were at such and such times its inmates. Such and such people were confined in the Tower; many of them were put to death within the precincts of the Tower. Mr. Dixon gives us a sketchy account of them and their doings, the Tower itself being often left quite out of sight. Some of the actors in the Pilgrimage of Grace were imprisoned in the Tower. Therefore Mr. Dixon gives us a history of the Pilgrimage of Grace. But then we do not want a history of the Pilgrimage of Grace, at all events not from Mr. Dixon. Mr. Dixon has no more business on Mr. Froude's ground than he has on Mr. Clark's. Of course he no more thinks of mentioning Mr. Froude than he thought of mentioning Mr. Clark. But the ground is Mr. Froude's all the same. That is to say, it is Mr. Froude's as against Mr. Dixon. We can very well believe that Mr. Froude may some day be dispossessed, but Mr. Dixon has shown no signs of any right to dispossess him. We have taken the trouble to compare Mr. Froude's account with Mr. Dixon's. Mr. Froude's narrative of the Pilgrimage of Grace is one of the most characteristic parts of his book. All his merits and all his faults come out in it. There are plenty of affected expressions and of inconsistent metaphors. There are plenty of sentiments right in the teeth of common sense and common morality. But it is a noble and fascinating narrative all the same. He who begins it is pretty safe to go on to the end. After Mr. Froude we do not want Mr. Dixon. But we can see that Mr. Froude's narrative and Mr. Dixon's do not always agree; so perhaps Mr. Dixon writes to correct Mr. Froude. Now Mr. Brewer has made good his right to correct Mr. Froude—Mr. Dixon has not. Mr. Froude may be wrong, but, as regards Mr. Dixon, he keeps his vantage-ground. Against Mr. Dixon judgment must go by default. We can accept no statement, great or small, on the authority of a writer who does not vouchsafe us a single reference from one end of his book to the other.

And so with other chapters of the book. As we do not want Mr. Dixon's version of the Pilgrimage of Grace after Mr. Froude, neither do we want his version of Northumberland and Lady Jane Gray after Mr. Froude's, nor his version of Cranmer after those of Lord Macaulay and Dr. Hook. In short, in a large part of his work, Mr. Dixon cannot stir a step without trespassing on the domains of better writers than himself.

This is how Mr. Dixon's position appears to us. But as it may possibly appear different to other people, we will give our readers the benefit of Mr. Dixon's own account of himself. Here, then, is his preface, written in the very grandest, and to us the very darkest, form of the grand style:—

> Twenty years ago I wrote some chapters on the Tower—especially on the human interests which cling around it; and since that time I have noted, with care, such passages in either the State Papers or printed books as threw light into the cells once occupied by the heroes and heroines of English story. This volume—a book of identifications—is the fruit of this long-continued search.
> In the labour of reading and deciphering the State Papers, for the purposes of this work, I stand indebted to Her Majesty's Deputy-keeper of the Records, Mr. T. Duffus Hardy, to an extent which no words of mine can adequately express.

Two or three things strike us here. Mr. Dixon does not tell us where the chapters on the Tower which he wrote twenty years ago are to be found, or whether they are to be found anywhere. But it is odd that the obvious connexion of the book with the meeting of the Archæological Institute is wholly kept out of sight. To be sure, Mr. Dixon's chapters could hardly have found a place in "Old London." They would have been too obviously out of place beside Mr. Clark's wonderful monograph, to say nothing of Dr. Guest on Aulus Plautius, and Mr. Green on King Stephen. Mr. Dixon perhaps acted wisely in keeping himself out of the reach of such competitors, but there is something queer about the thing all the same. Then we should like to know exactly what it was that Mr. Duffus Hardy did for Mr. Dixon. That Mr. Hardy, if he chose, could set Mr. Froude, or indeed most other people, right on a great many points we have not the least doubt. But here we have no means of knowing how much is Hardy and how much is Dixon. We should fancy that Mr. Hardy's information, translated into Mr. Dixon's form of fine writing, would come out something very different from the original article. Then, again, if Mr. Dixon has noted with care so many passages both in the State Papers and in printed books, why on earth does he not give his readers the benefit of his notes in the form of references? Then what is a book of identifications? We have not the faintest notion, and we can only guess that it means that most things in Mr. Dixon's book are identical with things that have been already said by better writers. We need hardly say, indeed we have said already, that Mr. Dixon writes in the grand style, so grand sometimes as to be unintelligible to plain people. We do not know, for instance, why Henry the Third should be called a "prince of epical fancies." Some queer theology seems to lurk in the expression (p. 105) "that the Spanish party in the Church" was "prone to accept irregular aid from heaven." We do not exactly see the point of describing Queen Margaret's marriage, or pretended marriage, with Angus, by saying that "She took to herself the handsome and wedded Thane." But Mr. Dixon can do greater things than these. Here is a specimen of Mr. Dixon at his grandest and worst, when he is dealing with scenes which "come back with warm rich colouring to the inner eye":—

> Now:—it is London in the reign of that Henry the Builder, who loved to adorn the fortress in which he dwelt. Whose barge is moored at yon stair, with the royal arms? What men are those with tabard and clarion? Who is that proud and beautiful woman, her fair face fired with rage, who steps into her galley, but whose foot appears to scorn the plank on which it treads? She is the Queen; wife of the great builder; Elinor of Provence, called by her minstrels Elinor la Belle. A poetess, a friend of singers, a lover of music, she is said to have brought song and art into the English Court from her native land. The first of our laureates came in her train. She has flushed the palace with jest and joust, with tinkle of citherns, with clang of horns.

And so it goes on with a great deal more, "Will the Commons let her go? Proudly her barge puts off," and that sort of thing, till we come to this:—

> Her son, the young and fiery Edward, never forgot this insult to his mother; by-and-by he will seek revenge for it on Lewes field; and by mad pursuit of his revenge, he will lose the great fight and imperil his father's crown.

With which side Mr. Dixon's feelings lie on the field of Lewes it might be idle to ask; what we have here chiefly to do is to point out the main peculiarity of this style of writing, the spasmodic or gasping style, a style of which, it may be remembered, we once had the pleasure of quoting some fine specimens from Mr. Kingsley's Roman and Teuton. The great point is the excommunication and interdict pronounced against the historical tenses. Nothing ever "was" or "would be" or "had been," it always "is" or "will be" or "has been." Mr. Dixon, having put one Queen through the torture of this sort of description, goes on to inflict the same peine forte et dure upon another:—

> Again:—it is London in the reign of Bluff King Hal—the husband of two fair wives. The river is alive with boats; the air is white with smoke; the sun overhead is burning with golden May. Thousands on thousands of spectators dot the banks; for to-day a bride is coming home to the King, the beauty of whose face sets old men's fancies and young men's eyes agog. On the wharf, near the Queen's stair, stands a burly figure; tall beyond common men; broad in chest and strong in limb; dressed in a doublet of gold and crimson, a cap and plume, shoes with rosettes and diamonds, a hanger by his side, a George upon his breast. It is the King, &c. &c.

So we go on with the procession, and we hear how the Lord Mayor lands, and how the bride trips, and the picturesque city companies stream out, and the cannons roar, and the bells fling out, and all the rest of it; and the following is given by Mr. Dixon as the reason:—

> For this is not simply a great day in the story of one lovely woman; but a great day in the story of English life. Now is the morning time of a new era; for on this bright May—
>
> "The gospel light first shines from Boleyn's eyes," > and men go mad with hope of things which are yet to come.
>
> The King catches that fair young bride in his arms, kisses her soft cheek, and bears her in, through the Bye-ward tower.

We need not go on with "Is it the same? The Queen—the stair—the barge—the crowd of men—all these are here. Yet the picture is not the same. No burly Henry stands by the stair," and so forth. Has Mr. Dixon really been led away by Gray's verse, which after all he cannot quote rightly? Mr. Dixon must surely be one of those very hot gospellers who went mad with hope of things which have yet to come. Did he overlook, or did he not understand, the fact which he himself records in his next page, that this suffered Protestant Queen "begged to have the Sacrament in her own room" "that she might pray with a pure heart"?

Here again we make our protest. Mr. Dixon is once more trespassing on the preserves of his neighbours and betters. We pronounce Anne Boleyn to be the lawful property of Mr. Froude till Mr. Brewer comes to take her away. Mr. Dixon has no part or lot in her. And as for Mary Stuart, about whom, though her connexion with the Tower is of the very faintest, Mr. Dixon has also somewhat to say, after weighing arguments all round we pronounce her to be the property of Mr. Burton.

Such is Mr. Dixon at his worst. But we are bound to say that Mr. Dixon at his worst is quite an exceptional state of things. Mr. Dixon never writes many pages together in which a critical eye cannot pick out marks of affectation and bad taste; still it is not often that he writes with the exceeding badness of the passages which we have just quoted. His narrative often goes on for many pages in a way which, by comparison at least, may be called sober and straightforward. Ever and anon he makes remarks which show that in the main he understands what he is writing about. We by no means consign Mr. Dixon to the place of punishment of hopeless blunderers. Still we cannot understand why he should have written this book at all. We cannot understand why he should go and tell over again so much that has so little connexion with his professed subject, and which has been already so much better told by better writers. And the fact that he can write better when he chooses only makes the extravagance of such passages as we have quoted still m[ore] unpardonable. Mr. Dixon is no doubt a clever man, and, had he not been spoiled by self-conceit and affectation, he might even have made an useful writer; but he is spoiled by self-conceit a[nd] affectation, and that is the end of it.

It is only fair, however, to give a specimen of Mr. Dixon in his better moods. The following passage on the difference between the North and South of England in the time of Henry the Eighth contains, among some queernesses, much that is true and forcible:—

The divorce of Queen Catharine and the bull of Paul the Third had produced among the lower ranks in these northern shires a ferment for which the men of Kent and Essex were unprepared. In the home counties, opinion was with the King. In London, and in all the provinces lying near London, the creed and the cause of Spain had fallen at a word—had fallen at once, and for ever; the decrees which were to frame a true English order in the family and in the church having been issued by the commons long before they were put into legal phrase by Parliament and King. Not so in the north. The partition of England into two church provinces was in the reign of Henry the Eighth, but echo to an actual fact. The Trent was like the Tweed; a border line between counties jealous of each other; counties apt to fall out, and when they fall out, to fight. The two provinces had a different custom, in some things a different law. York was a great capital; Yorkshiremen spoke with contempt of the city on the Thames; and most men living beyond the Trent thought shame of the King for not holding his Court and Parliament in York. Yet, in every point of culture and civility, the northern shires were a century behind those of the south and west. All that made England great, all that was helping to make her free, was found in that reign, not on the Humber and the Tyne, but on the Severn and the Thames. The thinkers who were moulding her mind, the poets who were fixing her speech, the politicians who were shaping her laws, were men of the southern race. Below the Trent, the peasant was better clothed, the gentleman was better served, the parson was better read, than their fellows above that stream; and any fight for sway between north and south was in fact a conflict of the brooding darkness against the growing light.

This way of Mr. Dixon's of talking about Spain runs through the whole of this part of his book. And it is mixed up with other queernesses, as "The defiance of Spain and Rome—the establishment of an English Church," as if an English Church needed to be established for the first time in the sixteenth century. In a sense this talk about Spain may be justified, inasmuch as Charles the Fifth was dangerous and Charles the Fifth was King of Spain. But to talk about Spain in this way gives a very inadequate notion of the position and greatness of the last full Emperor, and it is better kept back for the days of his son and of Elizabeth.

Mr. Dixon has much to tell us about the great difficulty of knowing who was the lawful heir to the Crown at the death of Edward the Sixth. He gives us a long list of possible claimants, in which, by the way, he has a queer trick of calling every lady of royal descent "Princess." Frances, Duchess of Suffolk, becomes "Princess Frances," a title at which she would have been a little amazed. Mr. Dixon tells us

The two sisters of Edward the Sixth had been set aside by acts of Council, acts of Parliament, acts of the Church, and so far as State decrees could put the King's sisters out of court, they were out of court. Their mothers had been cast away on the ground that they had never been lawful wives; their birth had been assailed; their titles had been quashed; their rank had been reduced; their rights, as king's children, had been extinguished. These public acts had never been repealed. In his old age, their father had in some sort owned his daughters; but the act in which this show of justice had been done was of doubtful force, since the previous statutes which defined their bastardy were left untouched. Indeed, his act for regulating the succession had only named them, in so far as they were his children. They were not restored in blood; they were not declared to have been lawfully born; they were not adopted into the regal line, except as additional heirs, and with the risk of being excluded by a final will.

Now all this rigmarole is nothing to the purpose. Mary's claim was perfectly good, and equally good whether she was legitimate or illegitimate, whether she was the daughter of Henry or of anybody else. Parliament had given Henry the power to bequeath the Crown, and he had bequeathed it in a certain way, and, on the death of Edward, Mary stood next in succession by virtue of her father's will. The only conceivable source of doubt would be that subtlety as to the validity of Henry's signature which is discussed by Hallam, but of which Mr. Dixon takes no notice. Again, one might think that, as Henry died at the age of fifty-six, he can hardly be said to have done anything in his old age.

On small matters we will not enlarge. Mr. Dixon will probably think us very pedantic, because we object to calling Lady Frances Princess Frances in days when the word Princess had quite another meaning. He would probably think it still more pedantic if we objected to his calling Bishop Gundulf, or anybody else, a Benedictine friar. Nor can we see the reason for calling Henry the Third Henry the Builder, as if it were a received title, or the good taste of heading a chapter about Richard the Third "Uncle Gloucester." But we will end with a sentence which we can [appr]ove, as pointing out a popular mistake, though we have some qualms about what Mr. Dixon elsewhere calls the "Italian" and here the "Universal Church":—

Few wrong notions thrive so rankly in our books as the popular delusion that these Howards of Norfolk, Arundel, and Surrey, have been strictly loyal, through good and evil times, to the universal Church. No house in England has been so wayward in its faith.

PROFESSOR LÜBKE'S HISTORY OF ART.*

THIS ponderous work gives promise in its design, but brings disappointment by its execution. The author aims to be in advance of his age; he proposes to accomplish more than his predecessors. He rightly deems that the time has come when the study of art may be prosecuted on broadly historic, if not on strictly scientific, bases. Certainly the accumulation of data is tempting to his project, while the advance of sundry sciences or philosophies might indicate that the art of history, instead of being treated empirically, can be brought under inductive law. Critics were formerly content to indulge in vague generalities concerning the idealism of Greek sculpture or the spirituality of early Italian painting; art dissertations sounded sufficiently well when paragraphs were rounded with "the airs of Guido or the corregieocity of Corregio." But something more searching and thorough is now expected. Accordingly Dr. Lübke probes and plunges beneath the surface of phenomena, till he touches underlying causes. The chapters in this weighty "history" have their preludes in sketches of physical geography. Thus it is made to appear that the valley of the Nile and the plains of the Tigris and the Euphrates are something more than mere landscape backgrounds to Egyptian temples and Assyrian palaces; the very soil is, as it were, fertile in national arts. Yet, in the conduct of the argument, the connexion between effects and assumed causes is seldom close enough to satisfy a strict logician. It must be confessed, indeed, that the process by which conclusions are wrought out is somewhat pleasant and pretty, and possibly art philosophy may profit by the operation. Nevertheless the general scope of these volumes is stated somewhat too grandiloquently when the author says that his purpose has been "to help the cultivated reader to a deeper understanding of art and its productions, to afford him a survey of the whole course of development, and to give him an outline of the historic progress of art," and "especially to show the inner spiritual connexion, in the artistic creations of the various epochs, from the time of the Egyptian pyramids up to our own day, and to discover in them the grand ideas of the advance of the human race in civilization." Thus the author's programme, cast by the translator into miserable English, has promise, and even pretension; only we regret to add that the performance, carried through nearly a thousand pages, somewhat disappoints the expectations raised.

Dr. Lübke has been well trained to his labours; we trace him through thirteen volumes which date from 1853 down to the present year. These works are after the true German type, laborious, persistent, and possibly profound. The author's judgments may be accepted as mature, and his materials are certainly sufficiently bulky and heavy. The Professor has from time to time produced monographs on specific themes; thus, for instance, we find treaties or tractates on "Ancient Swiss Glass Painting," on "Mediæval Art in Westphalia," on the "Dance of Death in the Marienkirche, Berlin," &c. But for the most part the author's investigations have taken wider range; from details he has proceeded to generals, till at length, in the work before us, he compasses a universal history of art, extending over all kingdoms and embracing all times. It would seem that several of these volumes have attained a success which speaks well no less for the author than for the German people who thus eagerly welcome opportunities of art culture. We find that Dr. Lübke's "Antiquities of Art" have been cast into a people's edition, and that German Ecclesiastical Art of the Middle Ages had reached, two years since, in amplified form, a "fifth edition." In the title-page of one of the aforesaid volumes Dr. Lübke is designated "Professor of the History of Art in the Polytechnic of the Swiss Confederation, Zurich." These facts argue well for the critical research of German Professors, and for the art education provided for the people at large. We need not point out how far England is still behind Continental nations in those respects.

Art criticism is in Germany pursued persistently as a profession; æsthetics assume the pretensions of science; art sentiments or intuitions are revered as dictates of the pure reason. Art critics in Germany constitute a specific school. Dr. Waagen, the most prosaic of writers, was accustomed to interlard dry facts with certain slow meditative thoughts, and the whole material he wrought into a not disagreeable mixture of philosophy, moralizing, and gossip. Kugler, a man higher in the order of intellect, made his English readers familiar with speculative methods and emotional tones of criticism; he brought the feelings as well as the reason into play; he clothed and coloured his judgments in warm sentiments; he accosted pictures in terms of endearment; and he became at once impressive and incomprehensible in the somewhat meaningless use of set phrases, such as "objective," "subjective," "motive," &c. Likewise Grimm, whose Life of Michael Angelo [is] disfigured by rhapsody, belongs essentially to that Teutonic school which, in critical tone, is wholly unlike aught that sees the light in our own country save through translations. Now Professor Lübke, in the History of Art, betrays consanguinity to this same order of critical intellect—high-flown yet plodding and prosaic, speculative yet matter of fact, emotional and transcendental yet withal historic. Our Professor is at once eclectic and onesided, catholic and sectarian; mounting his professorial chair and donning stately robes, he delivers himself with more than becoming dignity of trite principles and trivial facts. The law of the hereditary transmission of talent ought scarcely to be deemed a discovery even in a German university, yet our Professor, when discoursing upon Holbein, cannot state the simplest of facts save under the following awkward circumlocution:—"And as is often the case with grandchildren that they resemble their grandparents, so the young Holbein inherited the mental peculiarit[y of] his grandfather." We naturally desire to learn how much [Hol]bein owed to "the mental peculiarity" of his grandmother. [The] grandmothers of genius ought not to be slighted by German [Professors].

tors. As a characteristic example of the Professor's literary styl and philosophic treatment, we venture to quote the following passage, which if cloudy in idea, confused, and possibly even ungrammatical in diction, soars, it must be admitted, into sublime region of speculation—mountains of thought some fifteen thousand feet high, but unfortunately invisible by reason of vapours:—

The intricate complexity [says Dr. Lübke] of things around us impel man to seek a knowledge of the spiritual laws which affect their internal connexion. Only by the assurance of the deep necessity for such a connexion can he calmly and clearly survey the apparent arbitrariness of the separate parts, and perceive, in the successive phases of life afforded by the history of mankind, a progressive development of the ideas and spiritual matter underlying them. If anywhere indispensable, it is especially so in the realm of art, as in its works the character of nations and centuries is sensibly manifested. The question, therefore, of the origin of art is one that affects us closely.

Professor Lübke has before him a subject sufficiently large and comprehensive—the relation between art developments and national civilizations. For the solution of this problem the author's reasonings are not sufficiently cogent or searching; the assumed connexion between effects and causes, between scattered details and governing principles, is often merely conjectural. The causes which have induced art creations may for convenience be distributed under the distinctive divisions of race, climate, and chronology or time. But the misfortune is, as becomes but too evident in the course of Dr. Lübke's inquiries, that these several agencies or conditions are unascertained and ill-defined. Whenever, for instance, whether in the pages of Mr. Fergusson or in some ethnographic chart, an attempt is made to elucidate art phenomena by races, we are prepared for much entertainment and little instruction. Müller, in his well-known work on Ancient Art, was content to speak grandly but vaguely of the genius of "the Indo-Germanic race." And it would seem to be the inevitable fallacy of all such reasoning, whether in Germany or England, that the whole question is begged from the beginning; thus the Hellenic peoples are shown to be artistic on the evidence of their arts, and then again their arts are accounted for by the artistic character of the race. It is evident that there can be no progress in such reasoning; the argument ends where it begins, in some gratuitous assumption or foregone conclusion. Nevertheless, it is impossible to ignore causation between races and national arts; indeed, a true history and philosophy of art probably await the decision by ethnologists of certain moot points as to the antiquity of man and the unity of the human species. Certain well known data quoted by Professor Lübke seem to point to unity; thus figures in the paintings and bas-reliefs of Egypt and Assyria bear alike the Semitic type, while in the decorative arts of the two nations forms occur in common. Moreover, among Oriental nations may be traced germs of the Greek honeysuckle. These facts seem to indicate that national arts throughout the world may have sprung from some common centre. Yet, on the other hand, it is not difficult to point out even between the works of Egypt and Assyria—notwithstanding mutual plagiarism—marked divergence. It is indeed manifest that the artists of the two nations were capable of independent creation. Egyptian sculpture, by its subtlety and refinement, not to say feebleness, bears comparison with the subsequent Byzantine school; while the swelling limbs, stalwart bodies, and heroic movements presented in the plastic works of Assyria bespeak a nation vigorous and rude. In later epochs, like contrasts distinguish and divide the works of Constantinople from the arts of the Western Empire; that is, the Southern arts of Byzantium from the robust products of Lombard and other Northern races. Dr. Lubke leaves all these questions, which lie on the threshold of his inquiry, just where he found them. It still remains impossible upon the evidence adduced to determine whether national arts had one common birthplace and cradle, say somewhere in the East; or whether the great kingdoms into which national arts are now divided may not have had several distinct and successive centres of creation. The data which even an ordinary museum of antiquities affords would seem to favour the latter hypothesis.

Climate, with all that pertains to physical geography, necessarily plays a prominent part in Professor Lübke's History of Art. National schools of architecture, sculpture, and painting are bounded by latitude and longitude, and hold possession of zones, continents, and hemispheres. Climate generally gives complexion and colouring to intellect, imagination, and emotion; the romance of Canova was kindled in the South, while the severity of Thorwaldsen was the offspring of Northern latitudes. Certain it would seem at any rate that, if Athens had been planted at the North Cape, Phidias could not have modelled gods and men in the nude. As to landscape art, of course it is a self-evident position that painters must wait upon climate and weather; and, as a matter of fact, it has happened that Claude, Both, Berghem, Turner, and others, all born under Northern skies, were warmed into poetry and romance under Southern climes. There are indeed unmistakeable signs that Professor Lübke has himself, through like migration, fallen under these transmuting agencies. When, for example, he passes under review his own countrymen, Holbein, Albert Dürer, and others, and when likewise he castigates, for its base naturalism, the modern art of this nineteenth century, he is less German than Italian and Grecian in the tone of his criticism.

Chronology—which Goethe, if we remember rightly, designated a science of sciences—Professor Lubke deals with most unscientifically. Dates he distributes and dispenses as figures in a cata... In short, he scatters chronology over his page without ...tion or causation; epochs are without sequence, and schools without onward development. That an author should fall into confusion and contradiction about Egypt may be readily forgiven, but the general impression produced by this history is that chronology has proved to the author not so much a chart as a labyrinth. The doctor is at home in the dark ages; his chronology is shadowed by twilight incertitude.

Dr. Lübke, by careful compilation, presents faithful pictures of national arts under the dynasty of the Pharaohs, the age of Pericles, the rule of Augustus, and the sway of the Medici; yet the student is scarcely now for the first time taught that, through Egyptian servitude art was petrified for centuries, or that under Grecian freedom architecture and sculpture burst into life and developed into beauty. We cannot but think that the author, in bringing these well-known facts once again into view, might have given to the collective panorama of the world's assembled arts more of pictorial colour and perspective light and shade. His narrative is flatter than a bas-relief, and his philosophy has more moralizing propriety than a school-book. But it is fair to state that these volumes are nicely bound, admirably printed, and somewhat copiously illustrated.

German Professors carry the world's history on their shoulders as a heavy weight; and the record of art in particular is often the burden of their lives. Heroic attitudes of mind naturally beget noble diction; thus Dr. Lübke, as a prelude to Greek art, speaks of "that mighty habit of thought inclining to monumental productions, which belongs to all primitive epochs of art." Yet the sequel, as usual, is elementary and curt. Thus upon Greek art the Professor has little new to relate, save possibly the following, on the classic system of polychrome:—

While in opposition to the former supposition of the perfect colourlessness of the Greek temple, opinion has recently fallen into the other extreme, and sought to prove a thorough painting of the whole, calm investigation has gradually arrived at the conviction, after careful attention to the few traces left on monuments, that in the marble temples only the upper parts exhibited coloured ornament; that the pillars, walls, and architrave sparkled in the unbroken lustre of the brilliant marble; that on the architrave, at the most, there were only golden inscriptions and gilded shields hung up as monuments of victory, and that it was alone on the frieze and ceiling that the colouring began.

The reader will have gathered that these handsome volumes are remarkable for careful compilation rather than for original research. Whether we turn to the annals of early Christian art in the catacombs of Rome, or to later Gothic developments in Northern Europe, we find little that adds to existing historic stores. Yet we incline to the opinion that the time has come when the chronicles of the world and its inhabitants may be readjusted on the basis of grand national monuments. The arts lie scattered as on the shores of time, along the track of ancient civilizations. It is only comparatively of late years that travellers and archæologists have collected the data needful for this still unedited history, written in national arts. It may be admitted that Professor Lübke has thrown the scattered materials into a vast mosaic or tesselated pavement, but the picture he has wrought does not bear the touch of a master-hand.

BOUQUET'S EXPEDITION AGAINST THE OHIO INDIANS.*

WE may perhaps assume that few of our readers have ever heard of Henry Bouquet, or could mention the campaign in which he distinguished himself. And, to say the truth, there is very little in that campaign which can possess much interest for dwellers on this side of the Atlantic. It was merely a trifling, though creditable, episode in that long war which began with the first arrival of English emigrants in America, and to which Sherman and Sheridan are now putting some of the final touches. The record of it now published, and which is for the most part a reprint of an account published in 1765, deserves a moment's notice, partly as an illustration of the state of America a hundred years ago, and partly also as illustrating a peculiarity of the modern American. It is a misfortune of life in a new country that the inhabitants have no visible connexion with the past, and are too apt to regard it with indifference. Americans are of course descended from as long a series of ancestors as ourselves; but they often speak of themselves, and others speak of them, as if they had collectively sprung into existence at the Declaration of Independence, or, at the earliest, when Captain John Smith landed in the James River. The historical instinct, however, though confined to a limited field, shows some strong signs of vitality. Every American of English descent takes a pleasure in tracing back his pedigree equal to that of any nobleman in the old country. Such relics of historical interest as survive the ceaseless change of American society are studied with special zeal. Plymouth Rock, the windmill at Newport, the tree under which Washington took command of the continental army, and a few more such fragments of the past have to satisfy the whole appetite for antiquities which in England may seek satisfaction at innumerable monuments from Stonehenge to St. Paul's Cathedral. The limitation of the field has a certain charm. An English student of history may stand aghast at the vast mass of accumulated material. In the United States it is easy to become familiar with the whole recorded history of the continent, and to be a profound antiquary at a comparatively easy price. The Historical Societies of the various States do what they can to stimulate and satisfy this curiosity. Minnesota, we know, had an Historical Society a fortnight before the State was founded; and the American of the distant future will at any rate have the advantage that his history is recorded as soon as it is made, and will be freed from the necessity of feeling his way by the dim indications of unwritten tradition. This account of Bouquet's expedition, which announces itself as "the first of the reprints of the Ohio Valley Historical Series," is another manifestation of the desire of the population to know something about their grandfathers, or rather about the population which was ousted by their grandfathers; and certainly the description brings before us in a singularly vivid form the amazing contrast between the aspect of the country at two not very distant epochs.

Bouquet was a Swiss officer of some experience, who received a commission in the corps of "Royal Americans" raised in the Seven Years' War. The conquest of Canada had for its immediate effect the outburst of an Indian war under Pontiac. Englishmen and Americans have, it seems, a peculiar facility for making themselves disagreeable to barbarous races; the French always succeeded in gaining the goodwill of the native tribes, whereas a manifest destiny—or some less mysterious cause—has always led us to trample them out with the greatest possible rapidity. Perhaps the instinct is generally more convenient than praiseworthy. The result, however, was that the Indian tribes, as soon as they found that the continent was to be given over to English rule, flamed up into a sudden insurrection, took all the small posts in the interior with the exception of Detroit and Fort Pitt, and scalped and tomahawked in every direction according to their amiable fashion. In 1763 Bouquet was ordered to relieve Fort Pitt, and accomplished this duty after a severe fight at Bushy Run. The next year he marched into the "untrodden wilderness of Ohio," and there received the submission of the tribes and forced them to deliver up their English prisoners. The story is told by a certain Dr. William Smith, on the authority of documents supplied by Bouquet, and is warranted by Mr. Parkman, the able editor, as authentic. It is for the most part a meagre journal of the expedition, varied by occasional reports of speeches from such orators as Keissinautchtha, Eweecunwee, Keighleighque, and others. The speeches bear every mark of being genuine; that is to say, they are no better than one would naturally expect from savages before their language has received the editorial services which Jefferson rendered to Logan in the Notes on Virginia. We have, too, certain official compliments which sound a little strangely at the present day. Bouquet, for example, tells the Assembly of Pennsylvania that "next to the approbation of His Sacred Majesty and my superior officers, nothing could afford me higher pleasure than your favourable opinion of my conduct"; and the Assembly wishes him above all things "a safe and pleasant voyage to England, with a kind and gracious reception from His Majesty." Evidently George III. was not yet at a discount in his affectionate colonies. Once the worthy Dr. William Smith thinks it necessary to work himself up to a bit of rhetoric. He tells us that, to avoid breaking the thread of his narrative, he has reserved to the end the description of a scene "which language indeed can but weakly describe, and to which the poet or painter might have repaired to enrich their highest colourings of the variety of human passions, the philosopher to find ample subject for his most serious reflections, and the man to exercise all the tender and sympathetic feelings of the soul." This scene was the restoration of the English captives. The most remarkable part of it seems to have been that the Indians had treated them well, become very fond of them, and only delivered them up with "torrents of tears." Indeed, a young Mingo was so attached to one woman that he persisted in following her to the settlements, at the risk of being killed by the relatives of those who had been "captivated or scalped." Indeed, it is a fact which should be mentioned to the credit of the Indians, that, when they did not kill their prisoners, they always treated them like their own people. "From every inquiry that has been made," says Dr. Smith, "it appears that no woman thus saved is preserved from base motives, or need fear the violation of her honour. No child is otherwise treated by the persons adopting it than as the children of their own body."

Virtuous or not, the Indians were doomed; and we read of the terror they inspired with the same feeling with which the New Zealanders in 1969 will read of the massacres of the last few years. Bouquet speaks with extreme respect of the capacities of the Indians for warfare. He explains at length an elaborate plan, founded on his own experience, for meeting their tactics successfully. He proposes to enlist a sufficient force of men from the frontier; they are to be trained in running, swimming, and shooting; they are to be taught how to throw up an entrenchment, to make fascines, to fell trees, and so on—arts which we should have fancied to be almost instinctive with an American backwoodsman. They are to be accompanied by a body of light horse, and every horseman is to have a bloodhound to discover ambushes, to follow "tracks," to guard the camp against night surprises, and "to seize the naked savages." Moreover, there are to be companies of artificers, composed of the most useful tradesmen; and settlements are to be formed in the woods adapted to the purposes of military defence. There are elaborate calculations as to the number of men, horses, and oxen necessary for an expedition into the woods, and careful instructions as to the order of march. The general principle of Bouquet's own expedition consisted in always preserving such a formation that, at a moment's notice, the troops would compose a hollow square, with the baggage and provisions in the centre. All the Indian battles were fought on a very similar plan. A disciplined force found itself in the centre of a vast forest, stretching for an unlimited distance. Suddenly it found itself surrounded by a troop of yelling savages, who gave way at every charge, easily escaping through the woods, and then returned to weary out their unfortunate prey. The great difficulty was to bring the enemy to close quarters, where the advantages of discipline would tell. Bouquet was attacked in this way at Bushy Run, and for a time was in danger of suffering the fate of Braddock. At last, by a simple manœuvre, he drew the Indians into a position where the fire of the troops might be concentrated upon them, and after a short struggle they were effectually crushed. In a very few years the disappearance of the enemy made all these preparations of light horse and bloodhounds and artificers unnecessary. The next generation settled the question by the victories of Wayne and Jackson, and within a few years Boone found that settlers were becoming unpleasantly numerous even in Kentucky, and had to migrate beyond the Mississippi. A list drawn up by a French trader, "a person of considerable note," gives a careful estimate of the number of Indians in the Western territory. If his estimate is correct, the various tribes could bring into the field a force of 56,500 warriors, which implies a population of something under 300,000. According to the last census, there were in the State of Ohio about 2,300,000 whites, and 30 Indians—22 men and 8 women. In New York the Indians seem to have numbered 140. The figures are eloquent enough without further comment. A few years ago a stockade might still be seen in the suburbs of Boston, which had been erected for defence against the Indians. An Indian is now almost as great a curiosity in Boston as in London.

The worst of American history is that, for the most part, the eloquence is of that kind which is translatable into statistics. So many years ago a certain site was a prairie; now it is occupied by a city whose inhabitants count by the hundred thousand. In 1760 a force had to pick its way slowly through vast woods, exposed to incessant attacks from savages, and advancing at the rate of five or six miles a day. It started from a frontier village, and ended at a fort protected by stockades. In 1850 we might cross the same distance in a railway in two or three hours, with no danger from savages, though a good deal from accidents, and the termini would be Pittsburg with 50,000 inhabitants, and Cincinnati with three times as many. The facts are impressive in a way, though the constant repetition of similar statements becomes rather monotonous. One has a certain regret that the picturesque figures of the backwoodsman and the Indian chief have as good as disappeared, and left not a trace behind. Railway "depôts" have taken the place of stockades, and manufacturing towns of trading stations. We can understand the pleasure which Americans feel in seeking out the few remaining traces of a state of society which, though barbarous, was picturesque, as a certain relief to the too monotonous aspect of an improvised civilization. Such scraps of antiquarianism as this record of Bouquet's expedition will have an interest for them which we cannot fully share.

COUNT CAVOUR'S THOUGHTS ON IRELAND.*

THE condition of Ireland has ever been a favourite subject with the publicists of the Continent. Many reasons concur to give it an interest in their eyes. In the first place, the majority of the people are co-religionists; in the next place, they have given soldiers and statesmen to all the Catholic Courts of Europe; then, their characteristics resemble those of the Continental nations rather than those of Englishmen. Above all, Ireland is the sore and ulcerous point of English polity; the point on which "the foe and the stranger" can fix with self-complacent pity or contemptuous indignation. It is a subject on which every foreigner who regards England with hatred or jealousy can be fluent and declamatory. It is a subject, too, which, if it is exceedingly difficult to fathom, is far from difficult to skim. There are facts in abundance and beyond all controversy; just the sort of facts which suit the pen of a Continental Liberal, who is animated by envy of English prosperity or a dislike of English policy. With three-fourths of these critics Ireland and Poland are convertible instances of the most unrelenting and unmerited oppression. And they declaim on both with equal facility and asperity.

It is refreshing, therefore, to turn from the ruck of European critics to the work of a thoughtful and dispassionate statesman. Cavour was a man to whom Ireland must have been an object of profound contemplation. An admirer of the English Constitution, equally desirous and appreciative of English sympathy, at the same time habituated to struggles for national independence, animated with antipathy to monarchical and clerical despotism, and not without views of landed property consistent rather with the French than the English theory; accustomed, moreover, to subordinate mere theoretical conclusions to practical expediency, he was not likely to be betrayed into the hasty or prejudiced judgments of ordinary European critics. The time at which he wrote gives additional interest to his essay. It was while the Repeal agitation was at its height, and before the Chief Agitator had become entangled in the meshes of the law. Since it was composed, great changes have taken place. The popular tribune, whom many foreign publicists expected to see dictating terms to the Lords and Commons of England from Stephen's Green, was soon to be prosecuted by the Ministry, which he defied, convicted by countrymen whom he professed to champion, sentenced by Courts which he proposed to elevate in dignity, and to be relieved from penalties by a Senate which he had often denounced as at once alien and odious. A famine was to be inflicted, more terrible than any which Ireland had yet known or imagined. An emigration was to ensue, more complete in its extent and more important in its consequences than any previous experience could have justified us in expecting. The relief from over-population was to be counterbalanced by the interference of alien invaders. All these things were not foreseen by Cavour, any more than they were foreseen by ourselves. But, though he was not in all things a prophet, this little book proves him to have been a very shrewd and not at all an ill-natured observer.

* Thoughts on Ireland: its Present and its Future. By the late Count Cavour. Translated by W. B. Hodgson, LL.D. London: Trübner & Co. Manchester: Ireland & Co. 1868.

As an Italian, and the countryman of insurgents against a foreign yoke, he has sympathies with Ireland. But his sympathies do not blind him to facts. He sees at once that it would have been better for Ireland if she had been welded with England even by a greater thoroughness of conquest. He says:—

> In spite of the admiration excited by the generous efforts of the Irish to maintain their independence, we are compelled to admit that it would have been well for them had they been thoroughly subdued in the reign of Henry II. Had the Norman barons once settled and consolidated their sway over the Celtic population of Ireland, they would no longer have regarded themselves as the chiefs of an army encamped in a conquered country; they would in time have become attached to their country, and they would have endowed it with beneficent institutions, such as, from the middle ages onward, ensured the prosperity and the glory of England. Four centuries would have been more than enough to fuse the conquering and the conquered races, so that, when their religious disputes broke out, these would not have been frightfully envenomed by the antipathies of race and nationality.

He is acute enough to see that the grievances of Ireland in the last century were complex and almost contradictory; that the Ireland which claimed legislative and commercial equality was Protestant Ireland, which, in its turn, ignored or disparaged the claims of Catholic Ireland to civil and religious equality. He sees in the fury of the French Revolution the force which made one class of Irish patriots loyal Conservatives, and another class eager rebels. On the union of the two kingdoms he speaks with the moderation of a wise and practised statesman. Coming from a foreigner, and a foreigner of Southern Europe, whose temperament and sympathies might be presumed to be Irish, the following opinion has great weight:—

> There can be but one voice in condemning to infamy those who made traffic of the independence of their country, who bartered their rights and their political influence against gold and places, who sold their vote and sanctioned an act which their conscience disapproved. But must we equally condemn the government which purchased those corrupt men? I would not hesitate to do this if, by a fatal error, public opinion in ages past, and even in our own, had not in some measure sanctioned on the part of Government a morality different from that which private persons recognise; if it had not, in all times, treated with excessive indulgence the immoral acts which have brought about great political results. If we would brand with disgrace the character of Pitt for having practised parliamentary corruption on a great scale, we must treat with equal severity the greatest monarchs of past times, Louis XIV., Joseph II., the great Frederick, who, to reach their ends, offended far more grievously against the inflexible principles of morality and of humanity, than did the illustrious statesman who established the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland.
>
> But, putting aside the appreciation of the conduct and the merits of those who took part in the Act of Union, let us examine this measure in itself, and let us see if, in fact, it has been unjust and iniquitous towards Ireland, and if it deserves all the hatred which it excites even at this day, all the vituperation which O'Connell and the orators of the popular party lavish upon it without ceasing.
>
> For myself, I declare frankly that I do not think so. In accomplishing the legislative union of the British islands Pitt was not moved by a narrow desire of domination; he did not act in the exclusive interest of one political party or of one religious sect. It was not in order to enslave Ireland, to impose upon it his despotic will, that he sought to unite all the Parliamentary powers under one roof at Westminster.
>
> The aim of Pitt was noble and great. By uniting under the same government the two islands which St. George's Channel severs, he hoped to strengthen, to consolidate the edifice of British power, then exposed to terrible attacks. He realized the thought of one of those men who have possessed in the highest degree the instinct of government—Cromwell—who nearly two centuries before desired to fuse the Parliament of Ireland with that of Britain. But, if the dominant thought was to strengthen the Government by simplifying the machinery of legislation, he thought also, I dare affirm, of performing an act useful to Ireland, by withdrawing it from the dominion of a blind and persecuting Church. He wished to give to the Catholics, by means of the Parliament of the United Kingdom, complete political emancipation, which they would never have obtained from the Irish Parliament. If he did not realize these generous plans, it was because he found in the will of George III. an obstacle which he had not the courage to surmount, at a time when the support of the Crown was to him indispensable in order to save the nationality of his country, threatened by the power of France.

The summary which Cavour gives of Irish events from the time of the Union is fair and candid. With the exception of the suggestion that Canning's was a Reforming Administration, it is free from error; and this one error is neither strange nor inexplicable. To a foreigner, cognizant of the liberalism of Mr. Canning's foreign policy and his advocacy of religious toleration, it must seem quite a matter of course to speak of him as a Reform Minister. The sketch of the policy of the two Whig Administrations under Lords Grey and Melbourne is vigorous and lively. The justification of O'Connell's changeful and inconsistent tactics is more temperate than that of an Irish partisan would have been. The record of the many benefits conferred on Ireland between 1831 and 1839 will be read by many Englishmen with surprise, not untempered with a sentiment of regret that, where so much effort has been expended, so little return should have been realized. On the Repeal agitation, which O'Connell took up in earnest after the return of the Conservatives to power, Cavour speaks in a tone far different from that of foreign publicists in general. They, as reckless of the Irish as of the English consequences of Repeal, saw in the agitation only a repetition of the Belgian and the Polish cry for nationality. To them it was a challenge of defiance to England, which might herald the destruction of English power. The capacity of Ireland to stand alone they never condescended to consider. The one thought in their minds was the great injury which Repeal would inflict upon England, and the compensation which they might thus extort for the numerous and unmerited successes of perfidious Albion. Cavour saw things in a different light. He saw that half the evils of Ireland were social, that they sprang from the antecedent history of the country, which it was impossible to undo or erase, and that their cure would not come from the destruction or prostration of England. Granted that Ireland might gratify her Continental friends by shaking off the yoke of England, how could that benefit the mass of the people who were pigging in hovels on the miserable subdivisions of underlet and ill-cultivated land? The Irish famine had not yet come; it was not even brooding over the people's minds. Yet in 1843 Cavour saw the normal curse of the country, and wrote thus:—

> The relative superiority of the two agricultural systems, of large and small culture, will for a long time be a problem unsolved; but up to this time we may declare without fear of error that the tillage of the soil consigned to small farmers without capital, without intelligence, without affection for the soil they till, is the most deplorable kind of agriculture it is possible to conceive.

Again, what would be the burdens of Ireland, and her ability to bear them, after she was severed from her more opulent sister, and had obtained separate legislative independence? Cavour, who will not stop to imagine the entire separation of the Governments, thus answers the questions:—Ireland would be unable to pay her own just proportion of the joint national debt, to support her magistracy and her police, without a larger revenue than she now possesses; so that the first dawn of her legislative independence would witness the imposition of fresh taxes on the poorest population of Europe. Neither would Repeal increase the commerce and industry of a purely agricultural country, which is essentially dependent on England for manufactured articles, and which, in an insane attempt to rival her, would begin a fatal war of tariffs. National education in its present unsectarian form would be ill encouraged when its direction was virtually left in the hands of a bigoted and uneducated priesthood. Nor would those public works which are so often proclaimed to be necessary for developing the resources of Ireland be promoted when the capital which was formerly at the disposal of the United Parliament was no longer forthcoming to defray their cost:—

> The country itself possesses little; if it wish to undertake great works, it must have recourse to British capitalists. Those who already hesitate to invest their money on the other side of the St. George's Channel would probably refuse altogether to risk it in a country which had become to them a quite foreign land. For a long time, if Repeal were effected, the Protestant coins of London would distrust the good faith of the democratic Parliament of Dublin. It is, then, probable that this measure would retard, rather than advance, the execution of the public works which the interests of Ireland imperiously demand.

The principal remedies which Cavour propounded for Irish evils, and which he said could be granted quite as well by the United Parliament in London as by an Irish Parliament in Dublin, were these:—1. The disestablishment of the Protestant Church. 2. A continuance of an unsectarian public education. 3. A change in the law of succession and settlement of landed estates, which should transfer the soil of Ireland from Protestant to Catholic proprietors. 4. Extension of railways by the Government. The tone of assurance in which he proposes his first remedy sounds now somewhat prophetic. His fourth proposition was sanctioned by the approval of some statesmen who are dead, and by the regrets of others who still survive. His second is met by the increasing hostility or indifference of those whose characters and fortunes he is most anxious to elevate; while his third will probably supply material for the next grand conflict between Parliamentary factions. It is impossible to read his suggestions and compare them with the list of benefits already conferred on Ireland, without asking, will these be as bootless as the others? Suppose the Church disestablished, the land transferred, railways extended, and education promoted; will these make Ireland one jot more happy and contented than Catholic Emancipation, the Abolition of Tithes, the Reform and Municipal Acts have made her? Will they change the attributes of the Irish soil and the qualities of the Irish character? Great changes have been wrought by the English Government in Ireland since Cavour wrote. Of these many have been highly beneficent, but none are comparable to that great change which has taken possession of the popular mind, and has perverted the reckless, rollicking Irish peasant into a sour, grim, semi-Yankee Republican. This change Cavour neither prophesied nor foresaw. But had he foreseen the American civil war, and the great training-school it was to supply to Irish sedition, we believe he would still have written as he has done on the sterile results of Irish independence, and on the joint interest of both islands in perpetuating their united government.

The essay is a short one, but its matter is pregnant; and the vigorous thought of the author loses nothing of its effect in the English garb in which Dr. Hodgson so ably presents it.

UNDERGROUND LIFE.*

IN the days when eager multitudes were for the first time thronging the aisles of an International Exhibition, and before men's eyes had been opened to the bombast and incompleteness and jobbery of those too often recurring displays, its official trumpeters and a host of equally half-educated scribblers boldly proclaimed that a new era of education had begun. No longer was ingenuous youth to be tortured by wading through countless books, and wearied by sad years of dull lessons; but for the future mere promenades among the collections in Hyde Park, with plenty of bravely-coloured diagrams, and an occasional popular lecture, were the smooth ways to be substituted for the rugged old path of hard grinding. It was in fact through the eye, and by simple inspection, that knowledge was to be won, and a good deal of unnecessary abuse of the older systems of learning was showered out by writers and speakers who probably owed them a grudge in respect of their own ill-furnished condition. A similar notion, so far as regards pleasant modes and copious illustrations, seems during the last half-dozen years to have actuated certain French purveyors of books on the sciences. The "spirited publishers" catch an author gifted with ready pen and fluent style, and, confident of his ability to work up at short notice any given subject, they engage an artist who copies well from nature, and another who, to get his striking views, can soar at will to distant continents or back through the unnumbered ages of the primeval earth; then, with the aid of first-rate wood-cutters and a bold, clear type, they produce a series of handsome volumes on Astronomy, the World before the Flood, the Ocean World, and sundry other branches of natural science. The successive issue of these sumptuous tomes testifies to their popularity. In France they have claimed a place among the objets de luxe in the salons of Parisian ladies, and the number of editions of their translations into English produced by London publishers shows that a voluble and picturesque account of scientific matters is not without attractions for a large class of readers.

We confess to some misgivings as to the wholesomeness of the dainty dishes thus set before the public; and with all our admiration for the ingenuity of the French cooks, and our full acknowledgment of the piquant flavour of their sauces and the consummate taste of their dressing of the table, we have a grave suspicion that the quality of the meat is not quite the thing, and that we ought to look at least so far beneath the surface as to avoid mistaking a mere vol-au-vent for solid food. The inquiry on a broad scale is one of no little importance, for there are in the reading world persons in abundance who may be allured to, and even in some degree benefited by, the lighter flummery, whilst they might be wholly incapable of relishing or digesting the more nutritious article. It is, however, not our object at present to touch the general question, but simply to notice the last emerging star of this showy galaxy.

The author of Underground Life appears to have studied in the coal-producing districts of South France, and subsequently to have been engaged in mining affairs in Tuscany and America. His object, as stated in the preface, is to describe the struggles of the miner, as Victor Hugo, in his Toilers of the Sea, has pictured those of the mariner; but, on advancing fairly into his task, he adds a quantity of material which hardly belongs to the poetical side, and his entrance upon which justifies us in requiring technical exactness and a certain fulness of handling. The first and chief division of the work includes coal, with its history and the means by which it is wrought; a second part deals with the sources of the metals; and a third with the mines of precious stones. Maps geologically coloured, woodcuts, and chromolithographs are scattered broadcast throughout the volume; and so remarkable are many of these that we own the soft impeachment of having been seduced into a thorough look at the "pictures" before we could dip into the text. And if, after this first glance, unaccompanied by inspection of the title-page, we had been required to guess the name of the book, we should assuredly have missed the idea of Life, and must have replied "Underground Death," for never before has there been depicted in a single volume so vivid a series of horrors, so plausibly imagined a representation of the many casualties which decimate the ranks of the miners. But at this point we must join issue with our author; he professes to discard fiction, yet his catastrophic plates are mostly pure products of the imagination. It needs no ghost to tell us that the actual moment of an explosion of fire-damp, or the smashing of a group of workmen by collapsing rock and timber, can never have met the gaze of an artist; and the experienced eye of a viewer or colliery engineer will in a moment detect the imposition by the incorrectness of the details. Thus, to impress on us the fatal results of an underground inundation, a ghastly plate presents us with a thrilling chiaro-scuro of dark waters with floating corpses of men and horses, hideously stark and swollen; but we take comfort on finding that various lights, shown burning along the line of the excavations, where in fact they were artistically needed, prove that the water cannot have reached high enough to drown even a small boy. And again, in the less murderous scenes, we put it to our mining friends of Northumberland or the Western counties, whether the timber by which the roof should be supported is not in several instances represented as set in a fashion quite impossible in prosaic daily practice. Lapses of this kind may not seriously affect the value of the book with those who may take it up for a perusal of the exciting anecdotes with which it abounds, but they militate strongly against its usefulness as a vehicle of serious instruction.

On surmounting the wonderful headings of the chapters—the Field of Battle, the Perilous Passage, the Soldier of the Abyss, the Sisters of the Catacombs, and so on—we are prepared for the windy exaggerations and fine writing in which our semi-poetical neighbours across the Channel are apt to indulge; but, knowing as we do the sound observation of many of the well-educated engineers of France, we are disappointed to find a marked deficiency of acquaintance with the features of our more notable mines, and a too boldly expressed assurance of English inferiority which savours certainly of want of knowledge on the part of the author:—

> It may be remarked [he says, p. 142] that England, in the working of her coal-mines, has not that practical superiority which is generally ascribed to her. . . . The English may deliver their coal at a much lower rate, it is true, for reasons which have been already given; but, as regards artistic constructions, modes of working, internal management, and surface arrangements, everything is with them inferior to what is seen in many coal-mines in France and Belgium.

And a similar tone—pervading, like some of the gases he describes, many recesses of the work—only satisfies us the more as to the cause of the vaguenesses and omissions and misstatements which stamp a number of M. Simonin's pages with the effect of jottings from hasty tours. But we can scarcely find it in our heart to quarrel with a traveller so generally good-natured, and so clever in giving every nationality in turn more or less of a compliment. Some one in England or in America seems to have set him up with the stock phrase of the energy and aptitude for work of the Anglo-Saxon race—qualities which he allows to have done something for this isle, so bountifully endowed by nature, as he truly enough alleges. Yet in ascribing our undeniably respectable position in the commercial world partly to this ethnological accident, and partly to a total absence of Government interference, our visitor overlooks the scores of thousands of laborious, strong-armed Celts who, in North and South Wales and in Cornwall, daily assist in rearing the great edifice of British mineral produce; and he is fortunately unacquainted with the meddlings of those benevolent popularity-hunters who are constantly endeavouring to check the freedom of labour, and to fetter the workers with legislative enactments of which they are not competent to foretell the issue. M. Simonin's recollections of the reopening of ancient mines in the mountains of the Tuscan Maremma are among his most interesting and happy descriptions; though we derive from the context some idea that they were not so satisfactory to his countrymen, the proprietors. But even when lauding the good qualities of his Italian workmen he cannot resist the temptation of a playful hit at our dull islanders. There, the people employed in breaking up metallic ores at the surface often sing, and sing well, whilst at their work. "In England," he says, "the women and girls either do not sing, or, if they do, sing out of tune." It seems very probable that the author is not musical, or that his prejudices may have suggested the ungallant conclusion, for we have been assured on good authority that the Cornish people are, like all their allied races, strongly imbued with a taste for music, and that the women when engaged in similar tasks are noted for singing choruses in parts with a correctness rarely exceeded, unless perhaps in Germany.

The English translation retains most of the objectionable features which we have described, but has been purged of a great amount of fanfaronnade on which no comment has been made. It is, moreover, rendered vastly more useful to the English reader by the excellent series of maps of the most important mineral districts of Great Britain, compiled from the Government surveys; by one of Chile, with valuable notes, by Mr. David Forbes; and by others of the Lake Superior, Californian, and Victorian regions of copper and gold. The editor, Mr. Bristow, is well known as an accomplished geologist, and has done much to render more complete and trustworthy the earlier chapters which treat of the nature and origin of the coal seams. If in subsequent portions devoted more especially to engineering and metallurgical details he has not succeeded equally well, it must be ascribed in part to the difficulty of neatly patching bits of English cloth on a very Frenchy coat, and in no small degree to that inaptness in the use of technical terms which may mar the efforts of a writer accustomed both to plain English and to scientific terminology. But we believe that he would have done well to exercise more vigorously his powers of selection and excision. Who that knows anything of South Staffordshire coal-working would condone the ridiculous, though effective, figure (58) which professes to depict the pillars adjoining the shaft of a colliery in that dusky region? What geologist will answer for the false impressions conveyed by the section or profile showing the coal-measures as extending beneath the so-called basin of Paris? Why retain the numerous misstatements as to the present practice of English mining? Here and there, again, strange assertions occur, obvious at a glance to the engineer as mistakes, but fraught with undesigned mischief to the unlearned. We read in Chapter V. of a recently executed operation, a great triumph of one Herr Kind—a borehole of above 3,000 feet deep, at Creuzot, which at the outset had a diameter of $1\frac{2}{10}$ inch, and at the bottom retained one of $\frac{5}{8}$ of an inch (sic). The effect of such an announcement is much as if an architect should describe to us the well-proportioned shaft of the Duke of York's column as being 83 feet in height, with a diameter of six inches. After a gasp of surprise we look again, and find that the French measurements are respectively 30 and 16 centimètres, diameters approximating nearly to twelve inches and six inches—a calibre consistent with the magnitude of the operation.

On the whole, if we may revert to our former metaphor, it may be conceded that the translator, in catering for the British consumer, would, but for the exercise of a considerable amount of editorial tact, only have cooked up a hash; as it is, he has produced a highly ornamental pot-pourri, offering a varied and pretty ... piced repast, that may not come amiss to those who are ...ng for very substantial fare.

THE WOMAN'S KINGDOM.*

IN the present crisis of the great Woman Question, this novel may almost be regarded as a manifesto. With ladies knocking, as the phrase is, at the gates of the Constitution, and threatening to wrest from the opposite sex the selfish monopoly which it has hitherto enjoyed in the various professions, the view which an accomplished authoress takes of the social position of woman is well worthy of attention. We know what Mr. Mill thinks, and what Dr. Mary Walker thinks, as well as what the Revising Barristers, the Court of Common Pleas, and the College of Physicians think. But to which side in the great controversy the sympathies of the mass of the fair sex incline is, to say the least, uncertain. There is no uncertainty, however, about the opinion of the authoress of John Halifax. She pronounces, roundly, for what may be called the domestic theory of woman. Without exactly falling back on the antiquated ministering-angel theory, which is too tame even for her, and fitter for a drudge than a "queen," she adopts the good old conservative doctrine that the proper sphere of woman's work and woman's influence is the household. True she is a "queen," not a mere doll, or an echo, or a spaniel. And hers are the queenly privileges of advising, regulating, and controlling. But the realm over which she queens it lies within doors, not outside. It is home. Men make or mar the outside fortunes of a family, but its internal comfort lies in the women's hands alone. Men may be bad enough out of doors, but their influence is limited and external. It is women who are in reality either the salvation or the destruction of a household. "Until women feel this," observes our authoress, "and recognise at once their power and their duties, it is idle for them to chatter about their rights." The rebuke is just and seasonable. It is refreshing, in these days of "chatter," to find an authoress of reputation reaffirming the view of woman's work which is so well expressed by Molière in the Femmes Savantes:—

> Former aux bonnes mœurs l'esprit de ses enfans,
> Faire aller son ménage, avoir l'œil sur ses gens,
> Et régler la dépense avec économie,
> Doit être son étude et sa philosophie.

Our authoress takes higher ground, no doubt, than Chrysale. His sentiments are rather too culinary to satisfy her lofty notion of female prerogative. Still, as against the fair chatterers for emancipation, her protest is quite as vigorous as the good bourgeois's was against the learned ladies who left his dinner to spoil while they studied astronomy.

The medium whereby the theory, that woman is, within certain limits, a queen, is developed in this work, is Edna Kenderdine, one of those good, true, plain little women to whom society is so much indebted for their unobtrusive usefulness, and whom lady-novelists are so fond of employing to point the time-hallowed nursery fable that it is better to be good than to be pretty. Going to the Isle of Wight in charge of a lovely invalid sister, she falls in with an equally good and true young doctor, one of those beings who unite tenderness with strength, and give that impression of a reserve of power which so specially fascinates the good, true, plain little girls of fiction. As he has an invalid brother to nurse, which he does with exemplary patience and skill, a bond of sympathy is at once established. The consequence of shutting up two young women and two young men in the same sea-side lodging without a chaperon—the Miss Kenderdines were in circumstances too humble to think of chaperons—is inevitable. A pretty quartet of flirtation is struck up between them, in which the two invalids and the two nurses pair off together very nicely. Julius, the younger and temporarily disabled brother, is an artist with a soul for the beautiful, though no great stability of purpose, and naturally he is more fascinated by the lovely Letty than by her plain but excellent sister. On the other hand, quiet Dr. William Steadman, though rather dazzled at first by the beauty of Letty, soons discerns the sterling merits of Edna. After a blissful fortnight, in which they enjoy long walks together "like happy children," and indulge ad libitum "in pleasant refreshing talk such as clever good men can make with good and not stupid women," and are caught by the tide under the cliffs—an adventure in which Edna shows heroism, and is carried home insensible by the tender and athletic doctor—they part, the ladies to rejoin their pupils in Kensington, and the gentlemen to follow their professions in town. Our authoress will have it that it was no mere accident which guided the Miss Kenderdines and the brothers Steadman to the same lodgings. Fatalism in love is a grand article of her creed. "In all true marriages now, as in Eden, the man and the woman do not deliberately seek, but are brought to, one another." What a pity that scheming dowagers cannot be brought to adopt this Adamical view of matrimony, and, instead of "seeking" eligible sons-in-law, be content to leave them to be "brought" to their daughters by the hand of an over-ruling Providence. Our authoress's personifications of destiny operating on the sweet innocents in the Isle of Wight borders on the ridiculous. "As the sisters cross the threshold, the Grim Invisible Woman sits there, laughing at them, knowing that she had her will—not they." And the trifling accident of the "diurnal coach" being too full to carry them away in it suggests the following paragraph:—"Coachman shook his head remorselessly as Fate, and Fate, laughing from under the coachwheels and making mouths at them from the dickey, set at naught all the excellent schemes of these four young people."

The grins of Fate notwithstanding, they part without any positive declaration. And, of course, "these four young people" meet again in Kensington Gardens. Two of them in the interval have succeeded in analysing their mutual sentiments pretty correctly. Edna had realized that the deep-hearted and high-minded young doctor with the broad shoulders and the shabby coat was "very near her ideal of what a man should be," and thought of him tenderly as "the one man in the world to her now." The deep-hearted and high-minded young doctor, on his part, had fairly "succumbed at last." The desperate nature of his passion may be inferred from such soliloquies as this:—"My darling, my little bright active loving darling! she is all spiritual; makes me believe in spirit without the flesh," &c. &c. So deeply is his nature, in which there is by the way a spice of temper, stirred, that in a dispute with his brother about calling on the Miss Kenderdines, about which he had honourable scruples, he so far forgets himself as to shake his brother by the collar, and, worse still, to comment on himself afterwards "as a —— fool." "Forgive him," exclaims our authoress sweetly, "gentle souls of gentle women, if he used stronger language than I care to record." The gentle souls apostrophized will no doubt show as much leniency as Sterne's Recording Angel did to a similar naughtiness on the part of Uncle Toby. On regaining his composure, the doctor resolves to propose at once, and is promptly accepted by his gushing little mistress; and a good and great lady offering him the post of physician to a charitable institution, they marry on 300*l.* a year. At this point the Woman's Kingdom comes more prominently into view. Dr. Steadman's bachelor household "passed into feminine sway." It was small and simple, but everything about it was nice and tidy, and in the midst of her domestic realm sat the little queen, "sewing, always sewing," and "a deal prettier since her marriage." Now and then a tiny breeze ripples their domestic felicity. The doctor gets on slowly in his practice, and proposes to extend it by starting a carriage. This Edna thinks would be a wicked sham until they can afford it, and the "little queen" gains the point in the conjugal discussion. But after lecturing her husband on the immorality of the proposal she rewards him by a significant whisper about a possible event in the course of next summer. Accordingly at that date their happiness is completed by the arrival of what elderly male relatives insist on calling a "young rascal," who in process of time is succeeded by four other young rascals, all endowed with their mother's sentiment and their father's manly virtues. The final glimpse of the Woman's Kingdom is through the windows of a cosy house in Brook Street, whither the flourishing doctor had removed, and from which Edna takes improving walks with her five sons to the National Gallery, as well as placid drives in a fairly earned brougham with her still fondly devoted William.

In the other half of this work, the reverse side of this happy family picture is exhibited. In the fortunes of Letty Kenderdine we see a fatal example of the abuse of the "queenly" prerogative of woman. She is intended, we suppose, for "one of those idle and careless queens, grasping at majesty in the least things, and abdicating it in the greatest," who are glanced at in the scrap of sentimental rant which our authoress has borrowed as a motto for her book from Mr. Ruskin. As often happens, the character of which the author is least personally enamoured is far the best conceived and drawn. Letty, with her love of dress and luxury and admiration, her ready tears and her cold heart, her surface good-nature veiling a settled selfishness of purpose, is lifelike enough, and, if one may say it, pace Dr. William Steadman, far more interesting than her sister, who does not rise above the conventional type of the virtuous and romantic governess. And her character is developed by some skilful touches as the story advances, and when, as the wife of the wealthy Mr. Vanderdecken, she has attained the summit of her hopes and wishes. Perhaps the moral of the story requires that she should be represented as a fretful, discontented woman, in the midst of the wealth and splendour of Holywell Hall. But the authoress is throughout hardly fair to her. Entertaining, as she does, a hyper-sentimental view of love and destiny and souls inextricably mingled, and all the rest of it, she cannot bring herself to make any allowance for poor Letty's infidelity. Of course it was very wrong of her to jilt Julius. Her conduct in stopping at the Cape to marry a rich Dutchman, instead of going on to rejoin her lover in India as she had promised, was quite indefensible. But there is this excuse for her, that she had been induced to accept him against the dictates of her cooler judgment, more from worry and pity than any deeper feelings. However, the whirligig of time brings round his revenges, and, in spite of diamonds and fine dresses, Mrs. Vanderdecken is miserable. Two special scourges afflict her—a stingy husband and a terribly precocious little girl. Imagine a child of twelve striking up a romantic friendship with a discharged common soldier, speaking of her parents' quarrels as "convulsions of nature"—in which phrase, by the way, we see no "pathetic drollery"—and regulating her conduct by fine casuistical distinctions. But, as our authoress observes, nature stirs in a child's heart often sooner than we think. The discharged soldier who haunts the Vanderdecken grounds is no other than Julius, who, instead of being drowned in the Hooghly, as had been reported, had enlisted, and, after serving in the Indian mutiny, returned to England in feeble health and very low spirits. He conceives the fanciful project of punishing the parent through her child, to whom he tells his sad story, which she repeats to her mother, with indignant comments of her own. After giving Mrs. Vanderdecken a succession of terrible frights, he is generous enough to leave her in peace, and departs to spend the evening of his days with Edna and her five sons.

One good point about this book is that its interest is concentrated upon four characters alone, instead of being frittered away, as it too often is, among a crowd of supernumeraries. The portraiture is of unequal merit, but the authoress has evidently taken great pains with each member of her central group. She is more successful with her women than with her men. The analysis of their emotional phases is often delicate and truthful, and it is obvious that the presumably more angelic sex stands the process of idealization from a Pelagian point of view better than the other. A spice of the old Adam would be positively refreshing in Dr. William Steadman. A man of whom no graver peccadillo can be recorded than that he once indulged in a mouth-filling expletive in the course of a soliloquy, may fairly lay claim to superhuman virtue. Even the injured Julius, who is naughty by comparison, is naughty only after a transparently make-believe fashion. His notion of punishing Letty by confiding his sorrows to her little girl is a specimen of the sort of revenge which would occur to a schoolgirl whose feelings had been hurt in a tiff. In short, the Steadman brothers exhibit unmistakeably the stamp, which John Halifax exhibited even more unmistakeably, of being evolved fresh and pure out of the depths of the female consciousness. It does not follow that they will be on this account less acceptable to the class of readers for whom this book is intended. They expect a Bowdlerized edition of humanity, and probably prefer delineations in which sweetness is in excess of force. And no one can complain of any lack of sweetness in this work. The authoress seems to write in a crescendo strain of enthusiastic sentimentalism. In one of the quaint stories of Mr. Gilbert we remember an elderly monomaniac who labours under the delusion that he is growing each year younger. As a sexagenarian he frisks about the asylum in the frilled trowsers of childhood. In her literary capacity, the authoress of John Halifax is apparently inspired by a similar amiable craze. In each new work she becomes more girlish and gushing. Each fresh message is couched in a more redundant flux of Rosa-Matilda sentiment. But when this is said, her nice young men and virtuous young women remain pleasanter to read about, and much more profitable to study, than the muscular ruffians and lovely murderesses who typify the sexes in more highly-seasoned works of fiction.

THE AGRICOLA AND GERMANY OF TACITUS.*

THE two English scholars who four years ago proved by their version of the History their claim to be our modern translators of Tacitus, have laid us under a further obligation by translating his Agricola and his Germany. The task is a lighter one for them, but one not less gainful to readers, especially in days when it is a patent defect in our literature that there is scarcely a writer who brings his biography or history within moderate compass, and when an author's hardest task appears to be when and how colophonem libro imponere. The two remarkable monographs now translated anew might teach a lesson in this seemingly forgotten art, and show how conciseness, when brought to bear upon the fruits of reflection and research, produces more lasting results than the spun-out volumes which are lengthy and wordy because their author lacks the leisure or the industry to be succinct. Each of these distinct subjects Tacitus has contrived to deal with in forty-six chapters, or, to put the case more plainly, as ancient chapters are of a very different length from modern, in the space of a modern pamphlet; and this too, though in the case of the Agricola, without doubt, he used his pen as a two-edged sword, to fight the battle of his father-in-law's fame, and to satirize Domitian and the state of military and civil society under his rule; while, according to the best judges, with whom Messrs. Church and Brodribb partially concur, the drift of the Germany was not simply to describe a foreign country, but to point to degenerate Rome, in the midst of its civilization, the moral of the rude and simple virtues of barbarism. Tacitus is indeed a model as to the limits which, with this double scope, he prescribes to his pen. He seizes the main incidents of eight campaigns, and embodies them in less than as many pages. A modern writer makes a campaign or a country serve for as many volumes as a patient public is inclined to purchase, often with an interval between each instalment.

In reviewing the translation of the History, we welcomed a more masterly and sufficient apprehension of the characteristics of Tacitean style, and a more conscientious effort to represent them in English, than had been exhibited by previous translators. Messrs. Church and Brodribb have not deviated from their proposed standard in their new experiment, nor allowed themselves to be influenced by fitful and exigeant critics, who, looking on with Olympian serenity, discuss questions of translation without laying a finger to the burdens they would bind upon translators' shoulders. With some of these an exact translator is branded as a manufacturer of cribs; with others freedom is reproached for having wandered wide of the lines and landmarks of the original. But sensible translators know that, to make their work real and useful and popular, a mid-course must be steered, eschewing servility on the one hand, and not substituting their own ideas for those of their author on the other. The present translators seek "to make their version such as may satisfy scholars who demand a faithful rendering of the original, and English scholars who are offended by the baldness and frigidity which commonly disfigure translations"; and if, in compassing this aim, they succeed in realising some counterpart of the original in manner and matter, it is hard to see how their work would have approached nearer to the ideal of translation had they moulded its sentences to the fashion of Macaulay, or their periods to the measure and the fulness of Burke. Enough if the essence of the Latin is reproduced; and if, in recasting the original materials, as little as possible of what is native be lost, and of what is foreign substituted. But, supposing it to be ruled that translation need not concern itself with the manner of what is translated so long as it sticks fairly to the matter, we do not see what demand there will be for an article which might be superseded profitably by the freer hand of the historian. Yet even the historian, when he would be very lifelike, is apt to don the close-fitting robe of the translator; and it is curious to note the moderate amount of license which the scholarly historian of the Roman emperors allows himself in excess of Messrs. Church and Brodribb, in recording the suspicions of Tacitus as to foul play on Domitian's part having caused the death of Agricola. (Cf. Merivale's Romans under the Empire, c. lxii. p. 177, with Church and Brobribb, Agric. p. 38.) A comparison of the one with the other will show that translators and historian have wrought upon the same basis of the Latin text with very much the same guiding principles.

And, assuredly, the result of the principles which have actuated our present translators is one which will satisfy all save the needlessly fastidious, whether their work is tested in its narrative passages, or in those speeches which Tacitus puts in the mouths of Agricola and Galgacus, or in those philosophical reflections which teem in the panegyric on the conqueror of Britain, and are interspersed not infrequently in the description of Germany and its tribes. Our excerpts must be confined to the Agricola as the more diversified field, although there is equal proof, in the companion monograph of Tacitus translated in the volume before us, of the skill and ability of Messrs. Church and Brodribb, and of their thorough recognition of those various qualities which go to make up a readable translation. One of the most effective bits of narrative is the 35th chapter of the Agricola, which details the order of the Roman army as drawn up against the forces of Galgacus; but perhaps more vivid is the description of the vanquished after the battle (in p. 33, c. 38), and the utter demoralization of the Britons:—

> Meanwhile the Britons wandering amidst the mingled wailings of men and women were dragging off their wounded, calling to the unhurt, deserting their homes, and in their rage actually firing them; choosing places of concealment, only instantly to abandon them. One moment they would take counsel together, the next, part company, while the sight of those who were dearest to them sometimes melted their hearts, but oftener roused their fury. It was an undoubted fact that some of them vented their rage on their wives and children as if in pity for their lot. The following day showed more fully the extent of the calamity, for the silence of desolation reigned everywhere; the hills were forsaken, houses were smoking in the distance, and no one was seen by the scouts.

An examination of Latin and English simultaneously will satisfy our readers how easy and yet faithful a version is that which we have quoted. Skill in breaking up the Latin does not tempt the translators to any serious deflection from the asyndetic structure of the original. And the result is a vivid representation of the scene even to its closing feature, the "vastum ubique silentium." Equally successful is the treatment of those "finest gems of Tacitean eloquence," the speeches which the historian puts into the mouths of the Roman and the Barbarian commanders. Take this extract from the appeal of Galgacus for a sample:—

> Former contests, in which, with varying fortune, the Romans were resisted, still left in us a last hope of succour, inasmuch as being the most renowned nation of Britain, dwelling in the very heart of the country, and out of sight of the shores of the conquered, we could keep even our eyes unpolluted by the contagion of slavery. To us who dwell on the uttermost confines of the earth and of freedom this remote sanctuary of Britain's glory has up to this time been a defence. Now, however, the furthest limits of Britain are thrown open, and the unknown always passes for something peculiarly grand. But there are no tribes beyond us, nothing indeed but waves and rocks, and the yet more terrible Roman, from whose oppression escape is vainly sought by obedience and submission. Robbers of the world, having by their universal plunder exhausted the land, they ravage the deep. If the enemy be rich, they are rapacious: if he be poor, they lust for dominion: neither the east nor the west has been able to satisfy them. Alone of men they covet with equal eagerness poverty and riches. To robbery, slaughter, plunder, they give the lying name of empire, and where they make a solitude they call it peace.—C. 30, p. 25-26.

Few will venture to characterize this as a bit of Latinized English, and yet it is, as inspection of the original would prove, a translation in which neither the style, nor the gist, nor yet the striking expressions of the Latin are lost sight of. That fine thought about a liberty uncontaminated by any sight of neighbouring bondage comes out again well-nigh entire. The difficult and debated phrase, "recessus ipse ac sinus famæ," is rendered plausibly and, we think, rightly. It seems most natural to regard "sinus" in its sense of "bosom," and it is pressing the rhetorical figure too hard to inquire whether it is "rumour's lap" or "glory's lap" that is referred to. To us the speaker seems, by a bold figure, to describe his native fastnesses as the bosom, shrine, or sanctuary in which glory has reared him and his clan to give back now, as it were in the very sight of their nursing-mother, the price of their nurture. And the character of the rest of the passage is well preserved. Its antitheses, its trite sayings, among which are "Omne ignotum pro magnifico," and "Ubi solitudinem faciunt pacem appellant," reappear in faithful rendering, and the English reader has in truth a bonâ fide substitute for the original.

The mention of "trite sayings" suggests to us a curious feature in the Agricola which may not have been remarked by some with whom it is a favourite, and which those who have laid it by as a school task will have forgotten, if they ever noted it. Incidentally there occur little traits of British character, under the portraiture of Tacitus, which a modern observer would recognise in the remote posterity of those whom Agricola subdued. In the 13th chapter he says, "Ipsi Britanni delectus ac tributa et injuncta imperii impigrè obeunt, si injuriæ absint." "The Britons themselves bear cheerfully the conscription, the taxes, and the other burdens imposed upon them by the Empire, if there be no oppression." Most of our rebellions have had something to do with a disregard of this saving clause, and to this day there is probably no country in which a tax-gatherer is so well treated, if he does his work civilly. Again, a patent comment upon the parenthetical remark on the queenship of Boadicea (c. 16), "Neque enim sexum in imperiis discernunt" is that the Salic law has never obtained in Britain, and that the throne of the Edwards and the Henrys is the throne at this moment of Victoria. These and similar passing coincidences will be sure to strike such as take up the Agricola again, and a pleasanter or more valuable aid in doing so than Messrs. Church and Brodribb's version could not be suggested to them. The maps are careful and exact; the notes few and to the point; the introductions critical, scholarly, and reliable. And in choosing their interpretation of a doubtful phrase or sentence, their judgment is generally as independent as it is sagacious. Thus, in the famous chapter upon Domitian's complicity in the death of Agricola, the interpretation of Dr. Merivale might have led them to render the sentence, "Speciem tamen doloris animo vultuque præ se tulit, securus jam odii, et qui facilius dissimularet gaudium quam metum" (c. 43), as if the italicized words had regard to Domitian's attitude to the outer world generally, and not his state of feeling towards his supposed rival. We cannot doubt that the translators are right in rendering the words in question "for he could now forget his enmity," rather than "though reckless by this time of popular hatred." Still it is significant of their characteristic modesty that in a note on these words they support their opinion by the judgments of Lipsius, and Orelli, and Louandre the French translator, to which we may add that of their English predecessors, Gordon and Savile. There may be a slip or two occasionally—in p. 11, e. g., for "sunlight" we suspect they mean "sunset," as the Latin is "finem lucis;" and in c. 31 we should have thought that they would have acquiesced with Orelli and Ritter in reading "Trinobantes" for "Brigantes." But their work is well and truly done, and it deserves to find such favour as may give them heart to lay their hands to the Annals, and so to complete, as they have begun, a remarkable version of one of the most remarkable of Latin writers.

FRENCH LITERATURE.

THE list of illustrated French works for the present season includes several publications of more or less permanent interest and value. Passing over M. Gustave Doré's rendering of Dante's Purgatorio and *Paradiso, as belonging to the domain of art rather than of literature, we must say a few words of the sumptuously got up narrative of M Paul Marcoy's journey to the equatorial regions of South America.† M. Hachette's well-known periodical, Le Tour du Monde, had already given occasional episodes detached from the traveller's note-book. The entire impressions de voyage now appear in the shape of two quarto volumes, profusely illustrated with landscape-scenery, portraits, maps, &c. M. Marcoy himself has a strong leaning to the comical and to caricature; he cares comparatively little for scientific details such as Humboldt would have given, but racy anecdotes succeed one another without intermission throughout his book, and the manners, feelings, and temper, both of the natives and of the settlers, are described from the most amusing point of view. If the climate of those favoured lands is inexpressibly delightful—if a luxuriant vegetation makes every spot, as far as we may judge from the woodcuts, a kind of Eden—we cannot, on the other hand, speak very favourably of the inhabitants. The dramatis personæ in M. Paul Marcoy's volumes are, without comparison, the ugliest specimens of humanity we have ever seen, and we include under that designation the civilized Europeans as well as the uneducated Indians. One of the portraits given by our author is that of a missionary priest, who, like a second Friar Tuck, was distinguished no less by his muscular powers than by his sense of virtue. He did not hesitate to inform M. Marcoy that the lash, soundly and frequently applied, was the only remedy for polygamy; adding, that after one year of such discipline, the natives under his charge had become as docile as lambs. In plain truth, the men who have undertaken to civilize those countries are sometimes little better than the tribes amongst which they live; and consequently an immense tract of territory which might, if properly governed, be one of the most productive on the face of the earth, is now comparatively valueless.

M. Dauban has devoted his time and energy to the elucidation of the important period of modern French history which begins with the storming of the Bastille, and ends with the 18th Brumaire.* After reading the volumes which he has already published—his editions of Madame Roland's Memoirs, for instance—and also books like M. Mortimer Ternaux's Histoire de la Terreur, it would be hardly possible to affirm that the annals of the Revolution have as yet been thoroughly investigated. Every day brings to light fresh documents which the violence of party spirit had suppressed, and facts which have hitherto been misconstrued or explained away now begin for the first time to be properly interpreted. M. Dauban draws in his preface a contrast between democracy and demagogy, and by describing, on the evidence of Aristophanes, what Athenian government of yore was, he shows what the evils were which in 1794 marred the destinies of France, prevented the healthy working of republican institutions, and rendered the coup d'état of Brumaire quite unavoidable. The materials of the volume before us are taken from a variety of documents which are either of rare occurrence or, in many cases, completely inédits; amongst other interesting episodes they give us very curious details as to the downfall of Robespierre, and they are illustrated by facsimiles of contemporaneous engravings. M. Dauban had originally intended to give an account of the Paris prisons during that memorable epoch, but the abundance of written evidence accumulated by him on that special subject could not receive full justice as mere part of a history of the year 1794; it required to be dealt with in a separate form, and is accordingly reserved for a second volume.

The shortest way to go from one revolution to another, says M. Ch. de Mazade, is by reactionary measures. This proposition serves as the text to a collection of interesting articles on Spain, originally published in the Revue des Deux Mondes.† If we would appreciate fairly the revolution which has just altered the destinies of the Peninsula, we should study its antecedents, and examine one by one the political crises through which Spain has passed during the last fifteen years. In 1854 the errors and crimes of the blindest of despotisms brought about a revolution; exactly the same causes have now swept away from Madrid the throne of the Bourbons, and opened a new field to the theories of conflicting politicians. If, however, the revolution of September last has taken place very much in the same manner and by the same means as the one which preceded it, on the other hand its character is more conspicuously negative, because the Spaniards do not seem to know what edifice they are to raise on the ruins of Queen Isabella's throne. Views, too, which fifteen years ago would hardly have found a single advocate, are at present openly discussed; religious freedom, for example, is at least ostensibly recognised as one of the conquests which the revolution has secured.

It is some months since we noticed the two volumes of M. Victor Jacquemont's Correspondance inédite ‡, published by Messrs. Lévy, and to which M. Prosper Mérimée had added a remarkable preface. The work we have to speak of to-day is the original collection of letters written from India by that accomplished traveller, and to which he was indebted for the reputation which has placed him in the front rank of French epistolographers. As M. Mérimée introduced the former recueil to the public, so M. Cuvillier-Fleury, on the present occasion, enables us to appreciate M. Jacquemont's undoubted excellences. For although irony, satire, and a disposition to look chiefly at the unpleasant side of things, are qualities with which we do not feel much sympathy, yet we must confess that on many occasions our author's satire was rightly directed, and his irony not a whit too severe. M. Jacquemont allows very little scope to imagination; common sense is his forte, but it is that Voltairean common sense which chills and makes one sad. Living in the midst of a people remarkable for their gravity, he seems to delight in scandalizing them by his mirth; they are superstitious, and attached to their old traditions; he opposes to them a free-thinking disposition which purposely exaggerates. M. Cuvillier-Fleury confesses that he used to think M. Victor Jacquemont very impertinent sometimes. The correspondence before us justifies this remark. The perpetual tone of chaff which runs through the whole work becomes very wearisome.

If M. Jacquemont belongs in some degree to the school of Voltaire, M. Louis Jacolliot is a second edition of the Abbé Raynal.‖ We hoped that we had got rid of dithyrambic philosophers who attitudinize before the admiring multitude, and utter their oracular sayings in short paragraphs which look like stanzas, and bristle with notes of exclamation. No; M. Jacolliot takes up his parable, and endeavours to show that Europe has borrowed from the Hindoos, not only its language, but its religion. Why is the pure doctrine of the Vedas forsaken? why are the old epic poems now set aside? and why does no one care for the traditions which placed India in former days at the head of civilization? Simply because the successors of the Brahmins have entered upon a compact with kings and princes to enslave the people, and the whole nation thus degraded has been given up to a handful of English tyrants. M. Jacolliot declaims loudly against the mania of representing the Greeks and Romans as our sole intellectual ancestors; but he is quite as exclusive himself, although in another direction. According to him, we are poor copyists of Hindoo lore, and Christianity is a mere tame repetition of legends and theories originally developed on the banks of the Ganges. It would be a waste of time to criticise such ideas; yet it is worth while just to refer to them, because they give an idea of the violence with which anything in the shape of positive religion is assailed by some of our French neighbours.

There are in the history of France certain reigns which seem to stand out with special brilliancy as landmarks in the path of civilization and of progress. Some kings have left their stamp powerfully marked upon the times in which they lived, and their very name recalls distinct features of home or foreign policy. Thus Charlemagne, Louis XI., Henry IV., and Louis XIV., are in the fullest sense of the word representative men; for good or for evil the influence they exerted has been widely felt, and it may be truly said of them that they helped to make the France of the nineteenth century what it is. Charles VIII. is not one of those master minds.* Placed between the mediæval epoch and the Renaissance, his reign seems colourless and unimportant. On the one hand, the wars of Charles VII. and the subtle policy of Louis XI. make the short administration of the young King look very tame; whilst the unsatisfactory but dazzling career of Francis I. casts into obscurity the few years which immediately preceded his accession. And yet Charles VIII. has found an historian, and the two substantial volumes of M. de Cherrier have shown that what appears to us one of the dullest epochs in history can, if properly treated, be made highly interesting. It is true, indeed, that the wars of the French in Italy are more particularly associated with the Roi-Chevalier; but it was during the reign of Charles VIII. that the ill-judged expedition was planned, and actually begun. The work we are now glancing at is therefore chiefly taken up with an account of the Italian campaign; and in order to make his readers understand thoroughly both its causes and its results, M. de Cherrier has devoted a series of interesting chapters to a description of the political state of Italy towards the end of the fifteenth century. In preparing this part of his work he has been able to avail himself of a number of official documents preserved in the State Paper collections of Venice and Florence, documents which the researches of M. Armand Baschet and M. Rawdon Brown have already to a certain extent made us acquainted with. References are carefully given, and many valuable illustrative quotations from contemporary MSS. swell the appendix at the end of both volumes.

The new instalment of Napoleon's Correspondence,† brings us to the end of the year 1813, and closes with the Emperor's short answer to the address made by the Senate. Hemmed in on all sides, he talks of peace, but he cannot consent to see the territory of France entamé, and he appeals to the patriotism of the provinces still free, for help to maintain the integrity of the districts invaded by the allied armies. The National Guard is called to arms, and Cambacérès is ordered to give a scolding to the pusillanimous Senators and Councillors of State, who are already trembling lest their master should finally be obliged to succumb. "I am sorry," Napoleon writes from Mentz, "not to be in Paris; for people would see me more composed and more calm than I have been at any period of my life." At the same time this voluminous correspondence betrays at almost every page the Emperor's anxiety and dissatisfaction; his commands are either neglected or misunderstood; the bulletins, clumsily drawn up, spread false news, and money is squandered to no purpose. The document headed Notes pour le Ministre de la Guerre is one of the most curious in the whole volume. It contains a summary of the Report which the Minister was to present to the Senate in September, 1813, when he applied for a Bill ordering a fresh levy of troops. Napoleon's pretended grievances are there depicted in the strongest colours, and the sinister designs of England are denounced with the usual bitterness.

Now that lectures have become fashionable on the other side of the Channel, and that every town has its conférences or popular institutes, a new class of literature has sprung up which is growing daily more important. M. Paul Albert's Leçons sur la Poésie ‡ may be named here as a very fair specimen of it. They are twenty-two in number, and contain an excellent criticism of the best models of ancient and modern poetry. M. Albert's audience being French, he was obliged at the outset to discuss the once celebrated theories invented by Le Bossu for the due manufacturing of epics, tragedies, and comedies; and he had to show the absurdity of binding down poets to the observance of rules which may help to foster respectable mediocrity, but which true genius sets at defiance. If Le Bossu's axioms were right, Dante, Milton, Shakspeare, Lope de Vega, must be considered as downright barbarians, devoid both of taste and style, and unworthy of occupying the notice of sound critics. M. Albert, of course, has no difficulty in demolishing this artificial system, and in proving that the masterpieces of poetry in every age and country should be judged from a more liberal standpoint.

The directors of the railway company in the South of France have, in imitation of Paris, organized a series of lectures at one of the Bordeaux termini. Three lectures are almost exclusively devoted to the discussion of scientific topics, Count Kératry's description of the Pompeii ruins being the only part of the series which bears no reference to natural philosophy, natural history, or domestic economy.* Generally speaking, the popular lecturers of the day avoid literary questions, we know not why; and confine themselves to material science. Thus, in the eight volumes already published of the Entretiens populaires, otherwise so admirably edited by M. Évariste Thévenin, we have been able to find only four addresses on subjects connected with literature and the fine arts. The present livraison†, to which M. Franck has contributed an excellent lecture on selfishness, is introduced by a short biographical notice of M. Perdonnet, who for many years acted as chairman of the Association polytechnique.

M. Durand (de Gros) has published in a separate form a lecture read by him before the Paris Anthropological Society.‡ The subject he discusses is the influence of what he calls media on the characteristics which mark the different races of men and animals. The Department of Aveyron offers, for instance, two geological conformations entirely distinct from each other, and which, as they have determined the growth of certain plants and the absence of certain others in these respective districts, must likewise, he argues, have modified in the most remarkable manner the physical appearance of man, his temper, his habits, and even his language. Some of M. Durand's statements are extremely curious, whatever may be thought of his theories, and his analysis of the two Aveyronnese patois commends itself to the notice of philologists. He is, however, rather inclined to make too much of the principle of which he has constituted himself the champion, and his fellow-members of the Paris Anthropological Society accuse him of attaching too little importance to the law of hereditary transmission as an essential element in the determinations and classifications of races.

The thirteenth volume of M. Louis Figuier's Année scientifique § contains the usual review, methodically arranged, of scientific progress during the year 1868. On reading the necrology which terminates this interesting work, we are painfully struck by the number of losses we have to deplore—Sir David Brewster, Schönbein, Léon Foucault, Matteucci, and Flourens, amongst many others.

The education question has lately been discussed in France with increased energy, and the old dispute between the upholders of exclusively secular training on the one side, and of education based upon Christian principles on the other, seems as far as ever from being settled. In this case we have seen what so often happens when great principles are at stake; the merits of the argument suffer from the unfitness or indiscretion of the advocate. If Roman Catholicism were always identified with men like Monseigneur Dupanloup, instead of having as its mouthpiece M. Louis Veuillot, it is probable that the upholders of secularism would not be so bitter as they are just now. The volume which the Bishop of Orleans has just published ‖ is written in that fervid style so characteristic of the learned prelate, and is full of excellent advice which both young and old can profitably meditate.

One of the chief faults of the present school of novel-writers is vulgarity. If you want to be sensational, you can hardly help being vulgar, because you must not only exaggerate the proportions of the dramatis personæ, but deprive them of everything which can border upon the ideal; and your plot must derive from the most improbable complications that interest which a plain story unaffectedly told fails to excite in most readers. Such are the faults of M. Deligny's Mémoires d'un Dissipateur ¶, and they are the more to be regretted as he evidently has the power of delineating character, and of giving an air of reality to the scenes he brings before us.

In M. Edmond About's Mariages de Province  we have a collection of novelettes which have the merit of being amusing without degenerating into coarseness, and humorous without being caricatures. M. About has seldom been better inspired than when he wrote the first tale of his new volume, La Fille du Chanoine; and if the Album du Régiment is slightly overdrawn, yet, on the whole, the Mariages de Province may be pronounced an excellent specimen of the accomplished author's characteristic style.

THE QUEEN'S SPEECH.

IT will be with sincere pleasure that the country will learn that the inevitable absence of the QUEEN from the opening of Parliament is to be repaired by her coming in person to receive the Address, and thus to show how cordial are the relations which she wishes to establish between herself and the Reformed Parliament. There was nothing in the Speech, which but for illness she would have read, to replace the interest which her presence would have afforded. Still the Speech had the merit of being sensible and inoffensive. The utmost caution was evidently bestowed so that its contents should provoke as little adverse comment as possible. That the Irish Church would furnish the main business of the Session, and that the Government would bring forward a sufficient amount of other work to employ the House of Commons, was quite obvious before the QUEEN's Speech was read. The only interest lay in knowing what the other measures would be to which the attention of Parliament would be directed. The choice that has been made is judicious. The subjects that are to be dealt with are all of real importance, and all need early consideration, while on none of them is there likely to be a regular party contest. One such subject as the Irish Church will give ample room for impassioned debates, invectives, sarcasms, appeals to high principles, and coarse personalities. The rest of the Session may be usefully devoted to practical legislation. Rating, Scotch education, English endowed schools, county financial boards, and bankruptcy, are dull, respectable subjects on which much useful labour may be employed, and on which a hardworking House of Commons may hope before August to pass practical and adequate measures. It will be creditable to the Government, and still more creditable to Parliament, if so much is done; and to have attempted more would have been utterly useless. The wide field of controversy, theological strife, and social jealousies which may be opened whenever the subject of the primary education of the English poor is taken up in earnest, made it out of the question that the Government should attempt to deal with it in a Session which is to be mainly occupied with the settlement of the Irish Church. Then the Estimates are to be framed on principles of strict economy, while the efficiency of the Services is maintained; and Estimates so framed will probably take some time to discuss. Real economies cannot be effected to any great extent by mere vigilance and retrenchment. If a few pounds are saved here and there, some good has been effected; but it is a good which will not make any very great difference to the nation, and it will be inevitably compensated by a proportionate amount of evil hereafter. The next time the Conservatives come in they will gratify their followers, and consult the traditions of their party, by a little general extravagance all round. The present Ministry are quite right to set a good example even in small things, and Mr. LOWE's scruples about letting our officials always use a new pen whenever they write are to be justified by the consideration that cheeseparing is sometimes a proper infliction on those who are spending other people's money. But nothing serious will be done in the way of retrenchment unless new principles are laid down on which our expenditure is to be based. If, by a reorganization of the army and navy, we can get as good an article as we now have for a less price, those who show us how it is to be done will be national benefactors, and will establish a system from which their successors will not find it easy to depart. But anything like even the first beginning of reorganizing the army and navy will provoke much opposition and much discussion of a bitter and personal kind. This will take up a good deal of time, and when we add the consideration of Estimates, framed on new principles, to the five subjects selected by the Government, to the proposed inquiry into the conduct of elections, and to the great subject of the Irish Church, it must be confessed that a good six months' work seems cut out for the enthusiasts who have lately borne and spent so much in order to have the delight and honour of doing it.

The passage in which the intentions of the Government with regard to the Irish Church are shadowed forth must have cost the most trouble to prepare, and the successful result has been attained of putting at least a dozen lines together from which nothing whatever can be learnt, and yet which do not seem utterly contemptible. This is a considerable feat in the way of Queen's Speech composition. Possibly it may not seem quite beyond all criticism to speak of promoting religion by doing equal justice to all, as that is, in fact, begging the question that Ireland is henceforth to be governed on the Liberal principle of equality among the sects, and not on the principle of Protestant ascendency. But, with this one exception, every phrase used might have come from Mr. DISRAELI. There shines through all that is said in the QUEEN's Speech on Ireland the desire to do what has to be done in as gentle and palatable a manner as possible. If the thing to be done is strong, the way of doing it will be mild. This mode of approaching the great question of the Session harmonizes with the feelings both of the country and of the House. The hope of keeping up the Established Church in Ireland has died away so entirely, that no one is sore or nervous or anxious about it any longer. A good-humoured apathy was the state of mind in which the Opposition listened to the production of their rivals. The Conservative journals pronounce this to be the hush before the tornado; but the tornado would seem not quite decided whether it will blow or not. Mr. DISRAELI confessed that the Ministry had escaped making some blunders which he thought he might have relied upon their making. The Bill is to be brought in early in the Session; it is to be a measure whole in itself, and not broken up into fragments, and ample opportunity is to be given to Parliament to pass a comprehensive measure this year. Hints had been given that Mr. GLADSTONE would devise some plan of breaking his Irish Church Bill into two halves, and that preparations were already being made beforehand for carrying on [illegible] of dealing with the Irish Church into another Session [illegible] these errors have been avoided, and in a few days it [illegible] known what is the whole policy of the Government on [illegible], and how it proposes to carry it out. Very fortunately [illegible] QUEEN was able to announce that [illegible] now [illegible] enough in Ireland to admit of the law [illegible] ordinary course, and the Habeas Corpus Act [illegible] longer suspended. That there is no prospect [illegible] England having to use her military power with the one hand while she tries to bribe the Irish into friendliness [illegible] destroying the Established Church with the other, is very much to be rejoiced at. The Opposition will naturally say that the present state of tranquillity in Ireland is owing to the wise and salutary measures of repression and precaution they took while in office. The Government will say, equally naturally, that even the promise of just and fair treatment has already brought about a better state of things. Probably both causes have worked together. Fenianism has burned itself out for the present, because its chances were altogether hopeless, and the Irish, just as they were beginning to yield to stern necessity, were conciliated and pacified by the persuasion that England was going to set to work in earnest to redress the grievances of which they think they have to complain.

The Government is enabled to pronounce that the relations of England with all foreign Powers are eminently satisfactory. Peace prevails everywhere within the limits of the British horizon. In New Zealand certain disturbances have taken place of a rather unpleasant kind. But, in the first place, we may hope that they are transitory, and we know they are local; and in the next place, we are prepared to let the entire burden of putting things straight again fall upon the colony. The portion of the QUEEN's Speech in which the English inhabitants of New Zealand are distinctly warned that they must expect no help from England in crushing the outbreak that has threatened their repose has commanded general approval here. Such a sign of the times is not to be neglected; and colonists should take notice that the natural sorrow which their sufferings awaken here is in some degree counterbalanced by the satisfaction with which the opportunity has been seized of enforcing the lesson that England will not bear a burden that ought properly to fall on persons perfectly capable of bearing it. It is also satisfactory to know that no apprehension need be felt lest the quarrel between Greece and Turkey should lead to a general war. The Conference has been successful, and if Mr. DISRAELI is right in suggesting that a Conference which merely laid down general propositions of international law scarcely justified its own existence, yet it is something to find that for once a Conference has not been wholly unsuccessful. It appears that the idea of a Conference originated with Prussia, and the Emperor of the FRENCH may feel some natural regret at discovering that one of the very few Conferences that have not proved utterly abortive has not owed its origin to him. It is a very good thing that he can console himself by thinking that this moderately successful Conference was held at Paris, and that a French diplomatist was selected as the bearer of the message which the Conference had to send to Greece. It would be interesting to know where the functions of Conferences are supposed to stop, and whether it would be possible to refer to a Conference the delicate question now agitating France, whether Belgium ought, even against its will, to be made, by the pressure which a Conference can exercise, to permit the amalgamation of a French with a Belgian railway. The tone adopted in speaking of Greece was not, however, sustained when the framers of the QUEEN's Speech passed to notice the recent negotiations between America and this country. All that could be done was to express a vague hope that these negotiations might not prove utterly abortive. We now know that this hope is not to be realized. The Senate has declined to ratify the Convention; and we must comfort ourselves with the thought that we did our best to bring about an amicable settlement, and that, in the dissatisfaction with which the Convention has been received in America, we may see a proof that we were not completely outwitted in agreeing to accept its provisions.

GREECE AND TURKEY.

THE Paris Conference has happily held its last meeting for the formal purpose of recording the acquiescence of Greece in its decision. Sanguine and philanthropic statesmen persuade themselves that a precedent has been established of international arbitration as a substitute for war. Less enthusiastic disciples of optimism may perhaps attribute the final submission of the Greeks rather to the imminent danger of collision with a superior force than to the courteous suggestions of the Conference. To induce the Great Powers to meet in council on the transparent merits of a one-sided quarrel was in itself a kind of triumph; and from the moment at which it was arranged that the Conference should be held, Greece was practically safe from an attack on the part of Turkey. If the fear of detaching Russia from the general concert had not inspired the absurdly deferential language of the Protocol, the Greek Government would scarcely have presumed to keep all Europe waiting for a fortnight or three weeks, before it formally welcomed the opportunity of escaping from an untenable position. According to Mr. GLADSTONE, King GEORGE has had a share in accomplishing the inevitable result. The Greek Constitution reserves to the Sovereign a real though undefined freedom of action, which an able and experienced Prince might employ to the great advantage of his country. On the present occasion the KING has probably confined his efforts to the acceptance of the resignations of his former Ministers, and to the appointment of their successors. The partisans of war will claim a reputation for patriotic self-denial in sacrificing office to their convictions; but, when the average duration of a Cabinet is five or six months, the popular imagination will not be deeply impressed by a change of Cabinet. The KING has had the courage to disregard the imaginary danger of a public indignation which was probably only felt by the writers in Ministerial newspapers. Even the idlers of Athens must have been fully aware that the pretended demand of war must subside if at any time it appeared likely to be granted. There was no money; there were no troops; the enemy had a considerable army on the frontier; and since the pacification of Crete there was nothing to fight for. The crisis was certain to yield, like the pugnacity of VIRGIL's bees, to the application of a little dust; and the late Ministers had the satisfaction of persuading the European Powers that it was necessary to employ the remedy by handfuls.

Arbitration is undoubtedly often useful between nations, sometimes in the solution of doubtful questions, and more often as a mode of reconciling concession with honour and self-respect. In the recent dispute Greece was so clearly in the wrong that the judicial functions of the Conference were left almost entirely in abeyance. In taking the Turkish ultimatum for a basis of discussion, the Plenipotentiaries implied that the only question was whether the terms imposed on Greece involved any unnecessary humiliation. It would hardly have been worth while to enter on so trivial an inquiry, but for the supposed expediency of soothing the susceptibilities of Russia. The affronts offered to Turkey proceeded from a confidence, authorized or assumed, in the aid of a powerful patron, who ultimately declined to acknowledge or fulfil a burdensome engagement. At the last moment the Russian Government would have maintained the cause of Greece if the Emperor of the FRENCH could have been persuaded to modify his Eastern policy, in the hope of securing a Russian alliance against Germany. The failure of the intrigue or negotiation rendered it necessary to postpone the attack upon Turkey, which Russia will never undertake until the complicity of some other Great Power is assured. As peace was to be preserved for the present, it only remained to protect Greece as far as possible from the consequences of premature and ineffective turbulence. The other members of the Conference were, like prudent ecclesiastics in a Synod, more anxious for harmony than for sound doctrine; and the articles of the Protocol were accordingly adopted, not because they were orthodox, but as the only confession of faith which all parties were ready to sign. It is now affirmed on the highest authority that acts of almost open hostility are not consistent with the duties prescribed by international law. As the proposition was formally communicated to the Greeks, it must be supposed to concern them; but they may reasonably infer that their self-appointed advisers are not deeply impressed with the guilt of the irregularities which they mildly censure. It would have been impossible to intimate more gently or more indirectly that, on the whole, they must either conform for the present to the ordinary rules of good neighbourhood, or take the consequences in the form of a declaration of war by Turkey. The certainty that no foreign Power would interfere to protect them would have elicited the same answer to the Turkish ultimatum which has now been returned to the Paris Conference. If the armaments of the Porte had not been in the background of the negotiations, the commonplaces of the Protocol would have produced little practical effect.

The Turks are not in the habit of citing Latin maxims, but they have shown their thorough apprehension of the doctrine that preparation for war is the best security for peace. While the Greeks have, after many ceremonious flourishes, been compelled to discontinue their hostile menaces, other troublesome neighbours have profited by an opportune warning. The Roumanian Ministry, which was occupied in fomenting rebellion beyond the Danube, has been forced to resign; nor have the Servians or Montenegrins ventured to attack an enemy well prepared for resistance. The equipment and increase of the army and navy have undoubtedly been costly; but the soundest economy for a country in the condition of Turkey is to spend whatever may be indispensable to the preservation of independence. Perpetual threats of internal disturbance and of foreign invasion are fertile sources of expense; and no armament can be superfluous which serves the purpose of intimidating hostile neighbours. It is unfortunately true that the weakness of Turkey arises in great part from misgovernment, which might be corrected without military preparations; but, when Greece neglects internal improvement for dreams of external aggrandizement, it is unreasonable to blame the Turks very severely for a similar mistake. The Greeks have, by their recent proceedings, done their cause the questionable service of confirming the Turkish supremacy in Crete, and of diminishing the hopes of malcontents throughout the Empire. The warmest supporters of their pretensions must allow that unsuccessful attempts at aggrandizement are not to be encouraged. Public opinion in Europe, and even in America, has been more visibly alienated from the Greek cause within the last few months than at any former time. In the long run, ingenious and versatile Christians will be preferred to obstinate Mahometans; but they are bound to justify the predilections of their admirers by political sagacity, if not by moral superiority. In mere diplomatic strategy, since the inchoate rupture with Turkey, the Greek Ministers have displayed a certain adroitness; but all the substantial benefit of the transaction has been realized by their adversary.

The motives of the agitation which has caused so much general anxiety were probably not of the highest order. Mr. BULGARES, who had previously professed a pacific and legal policy, found that his Government was labouring under the chronic inconvenience of financial embarrassment. As it was equally difficult to raise new taxes or to borrow money from incredulous capitalists, retrenchment might, to an ordinary Minister, have appeared the only remaining resource. The Greek CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER preferred the opposite plan of incurring unlimited expense, by forcing on the commencement of a war which foreign Governments would almost certainly prohibit before the commencement of actual hostilities. The people, who had apparently never desired a rupture with Turkey, were assured that their warlike enthusiasm was irresistible, and official journalists broadly hinted that the throne itself might be in danger if any impediment was offered to the supposed outburst of patriotic zeal. The Turkish Government was driven, by deliberate affronts and repeated injuries, to break off diplomatic relations; and the Greek Ministers, relying on the eventual support of Russia, and on the toleration of Europe, answered a temperate exposition of intolerable grievances by an insulting despatch. In the very crisis of the dispute, it was remarkable that no visible preparation was made for war, except in the form of some anomalous financial operations. The Deputies convoked in an extraordinary Session voted themselves a considerable sum in direct violation of the law; and they conferred on the Ministers unlimited power to raise money by any method which they might think advisable. Extreme resolutions of the kind may sometimes be justified by the necessity of preparing sudden armaments; but it seems never to have occurred to the Government or to the Assembly that it was expedient to provide troops, ships, or munitions of war. The great idea which inspired the Minister for the moment was not to crown the King of GREECE in St. Sophia, but to lay his hands on the specie of the National Bank of Athens. When the treasure was in the hands of the Government, and when an inconvertible paper currency was substituted for silver, it became expedient to listen to diplomatic counsels, although a show of pugnacity was still maintained. It may be hoped that the new Cabinet is somewhat more respectable; but if any serious attempt is made to protect property or to promote general prosperity, the character and traditions of Greek administration must have fundamentally changed. The country will not be richer or happier because its temporary rulers have contrived, after exciting general alarm in Europe, to escape from the consequences of their violence and imprudence by the connivance of one or more of the Great Powers.

THE DEBATE ON THE ADDRESS.

LORD CAIRNS and Mr. DISRAELI, in the debate on the Address, showed sound judgment in postponing the discussion on the Irish Church. As they both candidly admitted, the Government is pledged, by the circumstances of its accession to office, to propose a measure for carrying into effect the Resolutions of the last Session. The Opposition, on the other hand, is at liberty to object both to the principle and to the details of the Bill; but it may easily be foreseen that the provisions of any scheme which may have been devised will be more open to damaging criticism than a policy which the House of Commons has virtually accepted. There is some reason to suppose that but faint resistance to the measure will be offered in either House, although the Peers may perhaps attempt to modify some of its provisions. None of the speakers deviated from a prudent reserve, with the exception of the seconder of the Address in the House of Lords, who unnecessarily expressed his own personal objection to all religious establishments. If Lord MONCK's opinion had possessed any political importance, it would have furnished an argument to the opponents of the Ministerial proposal; for the prevalent Erastianism of English laymen is only reconciled to the separation of Church and State in Ireland by the anomalous condition of the Protestant Establishment. An abuse is most effectually defended when it can be closely connected with some useful or popular institution. Lord MONCK ought to have learned by long practical experience that an assailant ought, if possible, to isolate the object of his attack, instead of provoking superfluous antagonism. A mover or seconder of an Address happily involves the Minister who selects him in no direct responsibility for his opinions; but Lord MONCK's imprudent declaration will be quoted by advocates of the Irish Church as an official announcement of hostility to Established Churches in general. Mr. HENRY COWPER, who made a speech of considerable promise, may perhaps be charged with unseasonable modesty on account of his confession that the Liberal party had learned its present opinions from Mr. GLADSTONE. The occasion for adopting a definite policy must often be chosen by a political leader, but it is the business of his followers to assume that they had long cherished the conviction which only awaited an opportunity of utterance. The House of Commons probably welcomed with satisfaction the interval which was allowed to elapse before the threadbare subject of the Irish Church is once more submitted to discussion. Within two or three months they have all been forced to make speeches for or against it, and they have heard or read the prolix debates of the last Session. It is the fashion to assert, with Lord CAIRNS and Mr. DISRAELI, that great advantages result from the omission of all disputable questions in the Address. If the late Government had met Parliament, an amendment to the Address would have decided the fate of parties. It would have been idle to move an amendment on Tuesday last; not that there would have been any difficulty in finding grounds of dissent, but because the Opposition would have been hopelessly beaten.

The paragraph in the Speech which refers to the law of rating must have been more than ordinarily distasteful to Mr. DISRAELI. The only semblance of a principle which survived the complete transformation of his Reform Bill consisted in that personal payment of rates which could only be accomplished by the annihilation of the compound householder. The House of Commons was perhaps more to blame than the embarrassed Minister for its indolent readiness to escape a political difficulty at the expense of a social and economical convenience. In spite of the sanguine theories of financial reformers, poor people cannot or will not pay direct taxes either to the Imperial or to the parochial collector. The overseers had long since found it worth while to allow the landlords of small tenements a discount for taking the rates upon themselves, and numerous Acts of Parliament had legalized the practice. The occupiers who have been summoned for non-payment of rates, the parish officers who have obtained distress warrants, and all other parties concerned, except the landlords who have kept up their rents and put the amount of the previous deduction into their pockets, may justly complain of the hasty vote which has cost them so much trouble and loss; nor was Mr. DISRAELI himself forward to protest against the reversal of thoughtless legislation. Indeed the courtesy and moderation of his entire speech suggested an invidious suspicion that he meditated some unusually violent and unscrupulous attack on the Government. Mr. GLADSTONE, himself the chief patron of the persecuted compound householder, generously promised to redress the existing evil with all possible consideration for the feelings of his adversaries. There is no reason why the house-owner should not be allowed to pay the rate on behalf of the tenant, with or without deduction. If all parties agree in the wish to escape from a renewal of the discussion, a few ambiguous phrases will remove all ground of quarrel. Mr. GLADSTONE has only to assert, and Mr. DISRAELI to persuade himself and his party to admit, that rates are personally paid when they are paid in whole or in part by any person. His avoidance of any discussion of the question in the debate on the Address perhaps indicates a determination to maintain a watchful and non-aggressive attitude. As it was necessary to find some fault with the Government, Mr. DISRAELI selected the most harmless ground of attack in his complaint that the Crown had violated either the Constitution or Parliamentary precedent by recommending the House of Commons to appoint a Select Committee. According to the law of tournaments, as laid down in Ivanhoe, a knight was adjudged to have been defeated if he lost a stirrup, while his more fortunate opponent retained all his trappings. It appears that there is, in fact, no precedent for the proposal in a Queen's Speech of a Parliamentary inquiry, and the leaders of the Opposition are entitled to the triumph of hitting the blot. Mr. GLADSTONE, however, argued with some force, that it is the duty of the QUEEN, or rather of her advisers, to notice in the Speech from the throne all the important measures which are to be laid before Parliament. The conduct of elections is so peculiarly within the province of the House of Commons that a Royal Commission of Inquiry would have been evidently inappropriate. If the Government moves for a Committee on the subject, the possible consequences may be sufficiently considerable to justify a formal intimation of the Ministerial intentions. Mr. COWPER evidently interprets the announcement as a preparation for the introduction of the ballot; nor can it be doubted that the scheme will be proposed in the Committee. Mr. MUNDELLA was the only speaker who remarked that one of the most important parts of the proposed inquiry referred to municipal elections. He added that the bribery practised on such occasions was more extensive than at Parliamentary elections, but the scandal is partially explained by the earlier institution of household suffrage as the municipal franchise. There will be less difference of opinion on the expediency of abolishing nominations and hustings speeches, especially as all other public meetings for the purpose of discussion have long since become obsolete.

It was impossible to say much in the debate or conversation about the Paris Convention, or about the treaty which has perhaps ceased to please Mr. REVERDY JOHNSON since the Committee of the Senate has almost unanimously refused to ratify it. It will not be worth the while of Parliament to discuss the terms of an abortive arrangement; but it would be well to express the general opinion that Lord CLARENDON has gone to the extreme limit of admissible or excusable concession. Mr. GLADSTONE performed with facile fluency the duty of representing both transactions as creditable to all parties concerned. The Conference, which neither pledged its members to act on its conclusions, nor put any pressure on the wrongdoers whom it censured, has, it seems, furnished an admirable precedent of arbitration as an alternative of war. Mr. GLADSTONE's opinions on the merits of the quarrel are not to be collected from his language, except that he found something to admire in the conduct of the young King of GREECE, who sanctioned the outrageous policy of his late Ministers, and the more judicious resipiscence of his present advisers. It may be collected that the Government had no expectation that the Alabama Treaty will be ratified. Even Mr. COWPER, who perhaps went out of his way to justify the pugnacity of the Americans, remarked with justice that England, after making every possible concession, is no longer responsible for the continuance of the quarrel. The debate was necessarily uninteresting, because it suited the convenience of the Opposition to adjourn any attack upon the Government. For once the speeches of the respective movers and seconders were fuller of matter than the more authoritative statements of the party leaders. Perhaps the best part of Mr. GLADSTONE's speech was his judicious apology for the postponement to a future Session of measures which, however urgent, would in all probability not have been passed.

BELGIUM AND THE FRENCH OFFICIAL PRESS.

THAT a man may do what he will with his own evidently counts for an exploded fallacy in Government circles in France. The Belgian Chamber of Deputies has lately fallen under the high displeasure of the semi-official journals of Paris for daring to act on this antiquated theory. A Bill has actually been passed, by a large majority, prohibiting the sale or lease of Belgian railways without the consent of the Belgian Government. If this prohibition is violated, the offending line will be taken possession of by the State, and worked for the benefit of the shareholders. If the Company denies that the alleged sale or lease has taken place, it may appeal to a court of law, and, if it proves its case, it will receive an indemnity during such time as the line remains in the hands of the Government. It is possible that the Bill might have passed without notice if it had not been for the speech delivered by the MINISTER of FINANCE in support of it, and for a passage in the Report of the Committee by which it was recommended to the Chamber. Some of the opponents of the measure in Belgium maintain that its real object is not identical with its professed object. What the Government wants to do, they say, is to prevent any combination of railways in Belgium itself which might prove injurious to the State lines. If this purpose had been avowed, the Bill might never have become law; but the circumstance that the Eastern of France Company had lately been negotiating for the purchase of the Great Luxemburg Railway from Arlon to Brussels enabled M. FRERE to make a telling appeal to Belgian patriotism. He justified the prohibition on the plea that it was necessary to prevent Belgian railways from passing into the hands of foreign Companies, although as a matter of fact the cession of the Great Luxemburg line had actually been annulled by the Belgian Government before the introduction of this measure. Except in Belgium itself, this aspect of the question is of little moment. For our purpose it may be assumed that the design of the Bill is to give additional facilities for preventing the sale of railways to foreign Companies. At all events, the position taken up by a portion of the French press is founded on this supposition, and it is the fact that it is so founded that gives interest and importance to the discussion.

It is hardly conceivable that any one but a semi-official journalist under the Empire would have regarded the question as properly coming within the cognizance of French critics. No matter how unreasonable the fears or suspicions of the Belgian representatives might be, they had a perfect right to entertain them. A man who bolts his door at sunset, and requires every visitor who arrives after that hour to state his business through the keyhole, may be set down as needlessly cautious. But even this exhibition of timidity is not usually held sufficient to justify threats of assault and battery on the part of his next neighbour. This, however, is exactly the line which some of the French papers have taken. The most moderate suggestion they have to offer is that Belgium should be made to feel, "at least by commercial reprisals," how great her crime has been. The more pronounced journals have not been able to content themselves with so mild a proposal. In venturing to claim her railways as her own, Belgium has tried the magnanimity of France to the very utmost. Can the honour of the country put up patiently with such a provocation? If it proves impossible for it to do so, if this crowning insult can only be avenged by the just punishment of the State that has offered it, the offender will only have himself to blame. The French Government has done all it could to soothe the wounded feelings of the nation, and if its well-meant efforts fail, and its long-suffering subjects, refuse to be longer trampled under the feet of haughty Belgium, it will be only the natural consequence of this last act of the Chamber of Representatives. These writers do not give Belgium the credit of having devised this policy for herself. She is but the instrument, they assert, of a stronger Power in the background. The arrow has come from the Belgian quiver, but its flight has been directed by a Prussian arm. The punishment which is justly due to Belgium for allowing herself to be used for such a purpose can hardly be delayed much longer. The great majority of the French people is described as having all along desired the annexation of this truculent State, and of late the sentiment has become almost ungovernable. Belgium has no friend in France, except the magnanimous Government which she is always attacking. That Government will try now, as it has tried before, to stem the popular torrent, and to prevent this ill-advised people from falling a sacrifice to the wounded honour of the great nation whose susceptibilities have been so recklessly trampled on. But unless some help is obtainable in Belgium itself, unless, for example, the Senate will hold itself ready to reject the Bill which is now awaiting its consideration, it can hardly be expected that even the whole weight of official influence will be sufficient to ward off the blow.

We thought we had sufficient experience of semi-official journalism in France not to be surprised at any exhibition of its peculiar characteristics. But we confess to some astonishment at the matchless impudence of this last outburst. That newspapers whose connexion with the Government is perfectly well understood, should allow themselves, or rather be allowed by their masters, to make the domestic legislation of a neighbouring State an occasion for a series of insolent attacks, continued day after day, and claiming, though happily without any justification, to represent the whole public opinion of France, is certainly a phenomenon of very serious import. Whether the act of the Belgian Legislature showed distrust of France or not, whether it was in itself wise or foolish, necessary or unnecessary, is nothing to the purpose. It related to a matter upon which every State has a full right to judge for itself, and to make the exercise of such a right an occasion for complaint, would in itself be a direct aggression on the independence of Belgium. True, the French Government has not, so far as we know, made any diplomatic representations on the subject. It was reserved, we are sorry to say, for an English journal to suggest that it should do so. But the French Government has instructed its organs to do everything in their power to give it a colourable pretext for taking this course, and by this means it has necessarily aroused a suspicion which had of late promised to die out. It might have been expected that if the EMPEROR could not make up his mind to attack Prussia, he would at all events be superior to the mean compensation derivable from bullying a weaker State. That expectation has unhappily proved groundless. In the Imperial mind the possibility of making Belgium atone for the sins of Prussia, of leading the French people to regard the Meuse and the Scheldt as a cheap substitute for the unattain-l working. That it is so is not favourable for the maintenance of tranquillity in Europe. A war with Prussia is sufficiently formidable in anticipation to induce even a more reckless ruler than NAPOLEON III. to count the cost before setting out. But a war with Belgium, though it might, and probably would, prove an equally serious business in the end, would not present the same difficulties at starting. It is conceivable, therefore, that a Sovereign whose caution would avail to preserve him from the former step might be led on by a fancied prospect of impunity so to commit himself in respect of the latter as to have no decent means of retreat. There is however one solid ground for satisfaction in this miserable business. The independent French journals have not followed the lead of the Imperial organs. The widely-differing schools of political opinion represented by the Journal des Débats, the Journal de Paris, the Temps, and the Siècle, are all agreed upon this point. No section of the genuine Opposition desires war. They are all aware that in the preservation of peace lies their only chance of driving the Government into the concession of more liberty at home. The outcry against Belgium is confined to the Absolutist and Socialist papers in the pay of the Government, and to the eccentric print which represents—M. ÉMILE DE GIRARDIN.

It is with very real regret that we are compelled to number the Times among the journals which on this question have made common cause against Belgium. No doubt in the article which appeared on this subject yesterday there were sentences thrown in here and there asserting the right of Belgium to manage her own affairs. But at this moment provisoes of this sort will be forgotten in the general condemnation which the Times thinks fit to pronounce upon the conduct of the Chamber of Representatives. It talks of not encouraging Belgium "in a policy of suspicion or isolation," and stigmatizes the measure as "an unnecessary precaution," and one wholly out of accord "with the Liberal policy of the past." It conceals the fact that the agitation in Paris is confined to a single class of newspapers, and regrets that "journals "semi-official and independent, Imperialist or Liberal," should be alike ready to appeal to the passions of the army and people. And it scoffs at the notion that there can be any military danger to Belgium in the line which connects Brussels with all the Eastern fortresses of France being in the hands of a French Company, and under the control of the French Government. We have no hesitation in saying that such writing as this can only be characterized as a disgrace to the nation which—most falsely we feel sure in this instance the Times claims to represent.

PARLIAMENTARY AND MUNICIPAL ELECTIONS.

THE passage in the QUEEN'S Speech in which Parliament was recommended to inquire into the present mode of conducting Parliamentary and Municipal Elections was probably the only part of the Speech which caused its hearers the faintest surprise. It is not usual for the Crown to recommend Parliament merely to make an inquiry; and if the state of public opinion and general knowledge on a subject is not such as to make immediate legislation possible or desirable, it seems out of place to notice the matter at all in what is intended to be the programme of the proposed legislation of the Session. It also seemed strange that an inquiry should be thought necessary now, while the new system devised last year for trying election petitions is being worked out with care, patience, and great success, by the Judges who have been appointed to perform the unpleasant duty. It is not beyond possibility that the real reason why this unusual step of recommending a Parliamentary inquiry from the Throne has been taken, and why it is to be instituted at once, may be that the Ministry see in such an inquiry the readiest mode of procuring a definite opinion on the Ballot. It is not difficult to imagine that the Ballot has in the Cabinet some ardent supporters, some earnest opponents, and many half-hearted advocates who are not quite sure whether they have really come round to it or not. If the Ballot is merged in the general subject of the mode of conducting not only Parliamentary but Municipal Elections, the Cabinet may have plenty of time to make up its mind before it commits itself to a definite decision. In the present temper of the Liberal party, the Ballot would certainly command a great majority in the House of Commons, unless the Government were to set themselves resolutely against it, which they are not likely to do. On the other hand, there is a strong feeling in the country, and in a section of the Liberal party, that it would be a great pity to adopt the Ballot in a hurry and without reflection. Even assuming, as we think it must be assumed, that the Ballot will be adopted if it can be shown to be the necessary complement of a Bill which has given votes to weekly labourers, yet what is wanted is a great body of evidence, from very various parts of the country, that the protection of the Ballot is really needed. Nor can the Ballot and intimidation be taken by themselves, or one sort of election be separated from another. What is wanted is exactly what the Government proposes—a general inquiry into the whole mode of conducting elections, both Parliamentary and Municipal. But if the Government had been free to choose, we may guess that it would not have been in such a hurry to start the inquiry while many election petitions remain untried, and while it is as yet much too soon to ascertain what is the general effect which these trials of election petitions are likely to produce both on the conduct of future elections and on the habits and feelings of the classes who have hitherto been the authors or victims of corrupt practices.

The inquiry is premature, but the history of the trials that have already taken place shows quite conclusively that it is impossible that the trial of petitions by Judges should do all that is wanted to place the conduct of elections on a proper footing. These trials seem likely to act quite as powerfully in deterring defeated candidates from bringing a petition as in deterring candidates and their agents from corrupt practices, and the whole success of the new machinery for purifying elections depends on men being found willing to bring petitions where any suspicion hangs over the election. If the notion spreads abroad that a petition is a most costly, vexatious, and uncertain thing, a great disinclination to bring petitions will spring up, and then the machinery will fail to produce any of the good results looked for from it. The most recent decisions are not at all encouraging to petitioners. It is not in any way the business of the Judges to make their decisions encouraging to petitioners. They are bound to think quite as much of the sitting member as of the petitioner, and they are called on to accept a return as a solemn legal document which it takes very clear evidence to set aside. They have only to investigate the facts that can be got together and produced before them, and to lay down the law. But the law laid down, although a perfectly good law, and based on sound reasoning, may show that the shades by which cases in which a petition will succeed are to be distinguished from cases where it will not succeed are so faint and slight that no one can tell beforehand how far it will be worth while to spend his money on a petition. Two decisions given this week on the law of agency will show how much this difficulty must press hereafter on a petitioner. At Staleybridge Mr. Justice BLACKBURN had to lay down the law of agency as applied to the following facts. A voluntary committee, sitting and acting at the request of the sitting member, sent out messengers to bring voters to the poll. Two of these messengers bribed a voter to vote by promising to make up to him his day's wages. That this was bribery in law was beyond doubt, and there was no doubt that these messengers had committed the act. The only question was whether they were agents of the sitting member for the special purpose of bringing up voters to the poll. Mr. Justice BLACKBURN decided that they were not. But he said that he so decided with the utmost doubt, and he stated that he could discover no general principle whatever on which the law of agency could be made to rest, so as to mark off clearly who are and who are not agents. Each case, he said, must be looked at separately. The only test he could think of was to look at the mischiefs which the Act wished to avert by making a candidate responsible for his agents. These mischiefs were that a candidate should profit by wrong acts done by others on his behalf, and that persons should be encouraged to spend money illegally for candidates on the speculation of some day being paid. Looking to the facts of the case, the Judge pronounced at Staleybridge that the connexion between the messengers of the committee and the sitting member was too remote to make them agents, and the messengers hoped to be repaid by the committee, not by the candidate. But there is no sort of principle on which this decision rests, for Mr. Justice BLACKBURN expressly said that he could not state any such principle, and certainly it would be most hazardous to accept the doctrine as good law that bribery committed by the agents of committees acting under the authority of a candidate will not invalidate an election when the agent of the committee looks for repayment to the committee, not to the candidate. If there is any general doctrine on the subject, it would probably be much safer to say that the election would be invalidated in this way. At Tamworth a person clearly shown to be an agent of Sir HENRY BULWER, and possibly of Sir ROBERT PEEL, chose to spend a very large sum in hiring at an extravagant rate a number of persons, some of whom were voters, to act as watchers. But Mr. Justice WILLES considered that he did this, not to make the voters vote as he wished, but in order to make himself a popular person, and enhance his own importance. Here an agent gives voters a handsome sum for a totally unnecessary service, but we are invited to look into the agent's mind, and to observe that he gives for the pleasure of giving, not to get votes. This was no doubt quite a right decision, but the result is that the petitioner is cast in his petition because it is ultimately discovered that the sums he had succeeded in proving to have been given by an indisputable agent of one sitting member, and allowed in the accounts of another, were given indeed to voters for doing nothing, but were so given out of mere vanity, and in the pure delight of throwing away the gentleman's money.

Then, again, there are whole regions of misconduct in the management of elections which the Judges are not instructed or authorized to touch. "If I go in, I must do it properly to "win," the sitting member for Greenwich wrote to a friend "and I suppose that CHRISTIE is not prepared to bleed." The sitting member bled, but he bled properly and discreetly, and his election was confirmed without hesitation. But the legitimate bleeding by which one candidate takes for granted he can beat another candidate who is not prepared to bleed, is an immense evil, and if the inquiry now to be instituted should show any way of reducing the enormous advantage which a long purse gives a candidate, it would do great good. Then, again, these election trials show that no effectual case against a candidate can be made out as treating, unless the treating is quite outrageous, as it was at Bradford. If a candidate merely spends a great deal too much at public-houses, and the election is merely made the occasion of a state of permanent beeriness for a fortnight beforehand, there is nothing in this to support a petition. The petitioner must show either that there has been wholesale treating, so that the election was void because the borough was so corrupted with beer and good food as not to have the little wits left necessary to decide whether one man or another shall be returned, or else it must be distinctly proved that some particular voter was treated by an agent of the candidate with the object of getting his vote. The agency must be proved, the treating must be proved, and the frame of mind and general intentions of the agent at that particular moment of time must be proved; and all this is very difficult to prove. The Judges very soon cut away the allegations of treating. They first ask the petitioner if he means that the voters generally were drunk, and when he replies in the negative, then the Judge asks what particular voter was treated by a recognised agent having at that instant guilty intentions. The petitioner, in answer to this pertinent question, says that perhaps he had better pass on to another part of his case. And what may be said of treating may be said of intimidation. It is so difficult to prove either wholesale intimidation, as was proved at Drogheda, or the intimidation of particular voters by a recognised agent, as was proved at Westbury, that, generally speaking, the petitioner can make nothing of the evidence of intimidation which he has procured, and in nine cases out of ten a petition had much better not be brought unless an allegation of bribery can be proved. But in real life treating and intimidation are greater, more constant, and more dangerous causes of evil in the conduct of elections than bribery, and Parliament has a sphere of most useful inquiry if it undertakes to examine how the waste of money, the demoralization and the bullying that goes on at election time, can be diminished.

RUSSIA AND INDIA.

THE discussions which arise from the progress of Russian conquest in Central Asia forcibly illustrate the inconvenience of all domestic controversy on international questions. When diplomacy was conducted secretly by official persons only, there was, as at present, a risk of error; but Governments and their agents had the great advantage of expressing an undivided will. Newspapers and pamphlets, while they may often throw light on the subject of debate, supply information with indiscriminate liberality to both parties alike. The veiled menaces of a Foreign Secretary or of an Ambassador produce but little effect when the supposed organs of public opinion have admitted the impossibility or inutility of resistance. In the conflict of judgment foreign statesmen naturally accept the statements and arguments which suit their own policy best. The Emperor NICHOLAS at the beginning of 1853 might have found many wholesome warnings in the English press; but choosing to believe, on the authority of one or two journals, that the influence of Mr. COBDEN and Mr. BRIGHT was supreme in England, he plunged his country into a disastrous war. The advisers of his successor will probably place a similar interpretation on eager and exaggerated professions of indifference to the Russian victories in Turkestan. Ostentatious deference to the United States has led, first, to the unlucky Alabama Treaty, and then, by a fortunate consequence, to the refusal of the American Senate to ratify the result of Mr. REVERDY JOHNSON's successful negotiations. An obviously insincere affectation of confidence in Russia will tend in the same manner to encourage presumption, and possibly to facilitate aggression. It is highly probable that Sir JOHN LAWRENCE may have judged rightly in maintaining his system of non-intervention against the prevalent opinion of Anglo-Indian politicians; but while silent inaction may sometimes be imposing, loud professions of neutrality and of peaceful intentions are generally undignified and often imprudent. Declarations that the vicinity of Russia to the Indian frontier is not alarming are so obviously untrue that they suggest an opposite interpretation. The fabulous ostrich never thrust its head into the sand until it was in imminent danger from its pursuers. It is absurd to suppose that Russian statesmen or generals will be deterred from prosecuting their designs by fulsome assurances of perfect reliance on their friendly moderation. If the time has not yet come for counteracting their possible projects, it would be expedient to say as little as possible when nothing is to be done. If it is true that Sir JOHN LAWRENCE at last resolved on subsidizing the Affghan Government, he confided the reasons of his change or modification of policy only to his official advisers and superiors. Loud disclaimers of anxiety convert subsequent precautions into admissions of the existence of danger.

It is perfectly true that the approach of Russian forces to the Indus and the Himalayah has hitherto furnished no legitimate cause of offence. It would have been incalculably more convenient to the English Government that a barrier should be interposed between two rival Empires; but it can scarcely be pretended that England or India has a vested interest in the barbarism of Central Asia. The civilization which is diffused by Russian soldiers may not be of a high order, but the most flagrant abuses of Russian administration might be beneficially substituted for the social and political system of Turkestan. If Mr. VAMBERY, who is assuredly not a partisan of Russia, may be trusted, the inhabitants of Bokhara are morally the worst people to be found on the earth. The semi-brutal African savages of SPEKE and BAKER may be equally vicious in their propensities, but they are far inferior in capacity to the race which formerly produced the conquerors of India, of China, and of Eastern Europe. The comparatively pure religion of MAHOMET has conformed itself, like other creeds, to the disposition of its professors; and its precepts of charity and piety offer no impediment, in Bokhara and the neighbouring regions, to ferocious cruelty and abandoned profligacy. In such a country even an orthodox Cossack, accustomed to be the instrument of a regular Government, may perhaps be a beneficent missionary; nor would the Indian Government, which has prudently abstained from attempting the reformation of Central Asia, be justified in protesting against the accomplishment of the task by a formidable rival. When it has suited the policy of Russia to be on good terms with England, assurances have been repeatedly given that the frontier of the Empire would not be further advanced in a south-easterly direction; but excuses or pretexts for extension of territory are never wanting in the neighbourhood of warlike and unsettled tribes. A commander on the border sends a flying column to exact satisfaction for the plunder of a travelling merchant; and soon afterwards he finds it necessary to erect a fort, that he may secure supplies and reinforcements for his detachments. After a time the fort is besieged or threatened, and it must be protected by the acquisition of the adjacent district; and finally a general war ends in the annexation of two or three provinces to the territory of the conqueror. One of the many processes by which the Indian Empire attained its present dimensions was exactly similar. In each special quarrel the Ameer or the Khan is as likely to be in the wrong as the Russian commander. In the conquered districts, roads made for military purposes serve commercial wants, and Russian and native traders acquire a certain amount of security for life and property. Although the patriotic and religious sentiments which sometimes survive all other virtues are shocked by the triumph of the foreign infidel, the greatest happiness of the greatest number of inhabitants may possibly be promoted by transference from indigenous misrule to Russian uniformity and order. Circumstances might render it expedient to co-operate even with a Turkestan chieftain, but no sympathy can be felt for the murderers of STODDART and CONOLLY.

The possible collision between England and Russia in Central Asia will be analogous to a civil litigation rather than to a criminal prosecution, as it will result, not from the infliction or sufferance of wrong, but from a conflict of interests. A native Government of a united India, disposing even of half the resources which are at the command of the VICEROY, might regard with indifference any force which could threaten its northern frontier. The vicinity of a European Power is only dangerous because it might encourage disaffection to an alien Government. The Russian Generals have taken a part in the late civil disturbances of Affghanistan, where Russian agents had been busy more than a quarter of a century ago. In former times it was only by the intervention of Persia that the Russian Government could hope to acquire a footing in Affghanistan; and it was to obviate this comparatively remote danger that Lord AUCKLAND'S unfortunate war was undertaken, and that Herat has been protected by diplomacy and by arms against Persian ambition. Recent victories have placed Herat almost between Russian and Persian territories, and a comparatively short distance separates the Russian outposts from the Valley of the Indus. The more-easterly conquests may be regarded with less jealousy, inasmuch as they are separated from India by a great mountain range, penetrated only by passes which are difficult and defensible, although they have in former times been traversed by more than one Asiatic conqueror. It is from the North-West that a hand might be held out to Indian insurgents, and that an auxiliary invasion might be directed against the Punjab. Some military critics, indeed, hold that the danger has been but slightly increased by the conquest of Bokhara, because the natural course of Russian aggression would, according to their opinion, lie through Persian territory from the southern shore of the Caspian; but the better authority seems to be on the side of the more recent alarmists; and it is certain that the new acquisition will facilitate interference in Affghan affairs. For the moment it appears that SHERE ALI has reunited the possessions of DOST MAHOMMED; but in that distracted country a pretender may at any time make himself master of Herat or of Candahar, and it is not impossible that he might throw himself on Russian protection. The most pacific of Indian politicians agree that the occupation of Herat by Russia would be as legitimate a cause of war as the seizure of Peshawur or Mooltan. With such a contingency in prospect, it is idle to assert that the interests of Russia and England in Asia are identical.

It is impossible to know whether Russia contemplates the future acquisition of the whole or part of India, and it is enough to be aware that hostile proceedings on the Indian frontier might not improbably be caused by European complications. Within a few weeks English diplomacy has once more ended in baffling the designs of Russia against Turkey, which will be resumed on the first favourable opportunity. The experience of the Crimean war showed that Russia was assailable by a Power possessing maritime superiority, while it possessed no means of retaliation on a distant enemy. In the event of a future quarrel, a blockade of Cronstadt or of Odessa might be answered by a march upon the frontier towns of Affghanistan. Any Russian force, indeed, which could be employed on the Indus would be easily outnumbered and defeated, if the Indian Government were at leisure to occupy itself exclusively with repelling invasion. There is every reason to believe that internal disturbances might be simultaneously repressed; but it is useless to deny the probability of novel risks and embarrassments. In India, if not in Europe, the era of perfect non-intervention and of indifference to foreign policy is still remote; nor, indeed, is it likely that the modern doctrine will be heartily adopted by any Government which has an army to dispose of. It is desirable, if it is practicable, to avert a collision as long as possible, by some amicable understanding with Russia; but a compact on a single point of difference with a litigant who has other disputed claims in reserve is scarcely likely to produce a lasting settlement. The most unprofitable of all devices is to assert clamorously that there is peace, when there is no reason for dwelling on the subject except a well-founded belief that peace is likely to be disturbed.

COUNT BISMARK'S EXPLANATION.

COUNT BISMARK could scarcely have allowed the Hanover and Hesse Confiscation Bills to pass through the Prussian House of Lords without qualifying to some extent his remarks on the same subject in the Chamber of Deputies. It is not often that a nominally responsible Minister delivers himself of so direct a provocation to war as was contained in his speech of the 29th of January. In the interval between the two debates Count BISMARK had had time enough to recover himself—supposing him to have been carried away by the heat of discussion, or to have used language susceptible of another meaning than that which he intended to convey. If, therefore, he had remained silent, the fact that, having an opportunity of modifying his original statements, he had omitted to use it, would have invested his language with additional seriousness. This consideration, however, deprives of nearly all its value the very slight retractation implied rather than contained in his speech of Saturday last. It is merely a form to which any Minister who does not carry a declaration of war in his pocket must consent to submit. The French Government especially has so often done the same thing itself that it must be perfectly aware how little it really means. To make a definite statement to-day, and then to tone it down somewhat a fortnight later, is the natural expedient of a man who wishes his words to take root and bear fruit by and by. If he said nothing on the first occasion, he would not achieve his end; if he said nothing on the second occasion, he might achieve it rather too quickly. In dealing with the Prussian people Count BISMARK takes a lesson from the cook, and throws in a little cold water at the last moment just to prevent the pot from boiling over. His quickness of temper serves as a convenient scapegoat on which to lay the blame of his indiscretion. The machinations of the dethroned sovereigns of Hanover and Hesse have been too much for his equanimity. He has "many times been reproached by the "press for not preserving a proper diplomatic calm in the face "of such endeavours." He does not deny that there may be some ground for the charge, but he is far from being ashamed of his weakness. "Those who can restrain their anger at such base-"ness have national feelings differently organized" from his. Count BISMARK does scant justice to his own capacity of self-control. The organization of his "national feelings" would doubtless have proved quite equal to any task he might have thought proper to impose upon it, and had it suited his purpose to keep his wrath to himself, his determination would certainly not have been affected by anything that the ex-King of HANOVER or the ex-Elector of HESSE could have done to shake it. Count BISMARK'S purpose in threatening the Chamber of Deputies with another French invasion has probably been fully answered by a fortnight's uncontradicted circulation. He need not have much fear that the effect of his warning will be seriously weakened by the fact that in addressing the House of Lords he adopted a somewhat milder tone.

When the particular qualification introduced comes to be examined, it is of a curiously transparent sort. Count BISMARK professes to exonerate the French Government and the French people at the expense of the French press. It is the latter which, by "a criminal undertaking," has endeavoured to incite to war two nations most earnestly desirous of remaining at peace. The Prussian Minister is "fully convinced that "all European Governments"—France among the number, therefore—"are animated by peaceful intentions." In the false news "which has been circulated with shameless inven-"tiveness" he recognises the real enemy of the peace of Europe, and he feels that the time has come when "even in 'the interest of national dignity it is necessary to stop the 'sources whence newspapers are subsidized openly to incite a 'brave and warlike nation to make war upon Germany." The "dissemination of falsehood by means of the distribution "of money"—there is the explanation of all the rumours and apprehensions of the last two years. Europe would have been at rest if it had not been for the wickedness of certain French journalists, and the French journalists would have turned their criminal ingenuity in a different direction if it had not been for the traitorous liberality of the ex-Elector of HESSE.

The first feeling suggested by this exposition of the situation is one of wonder whether Count BISMARK really expects any one to believe him; but as the Prussian statesman has never shown any symptom of more than human credulity, the idea of his entertaining such an anticipation may be safely dismissed. It might perhaps be argued that some allowance should be made for the extensive transactions in press purchases to which Count BISMARK himself is suspected of having been occasionally privy; but a moment's consideration will show that this circumstance really tells the other way. A portion of the French press may be no more above pecuniary influences than a corresponding portion of the German, but it is the very fact that the Government is a large buyer that practically closes the market against private dealers. The independent Paris journals are not to be had for money; the journals that are to be had have long ago been bought up. It is notorious that the most violent attacks upon Prussia which have from time to time appeared in French newspapers have been found in the semi-official organs of the Government. There is scarcely a rumour of coming war, or a demonstration that peace can only be attained by the sword, that might not have been killed in the cradle by the slightest Imperial hint. That these things have been suffered to do their work unregarded has been the deliberate choice of the authorities. To silence a journalist whose highest inspiration is the prospect of Imperial favour it is not even necessary to put the French press law into operation. And Count BISMARK of course knows this at least as well as any one else. When he talks about a hired press doing its best to set Governments and nations by the ears, he is perfectly aware all the time that the press against which he brings this accusation utters nothing but what, at the moment of writing, the French Government wishes its subjects, or some section of its subjects, to believe. His speech is therefore nothing more than an intimation to the Emperor of the FRENCH that he sees all that is going on at Paris, but that for reasons of his own he does not wish at present to bring it home to its real author.

The question why Count BISMARK should have chosen this particular time for assuming so threatening a tone is less easy to answer. It may be of course that he is really suspicious of his neighbour's intentions, and that he wishes both to show that Prussia is prepared, and to give a reason to his own countrymen why she must remain prepared. It may be that he is as doubtful as the rest of the world what NAPOLEON III. really means to do, and that he is getting tired of an uncertainty which involves Prussia in so large a military expenditure. The proverb which sets forth the wisdom of letting sleeping dogs lie may cease to be applicable if it is extremely important to ascertain whether a particular dog is sleeping or not. In that case it may be the most prudent course to administer a gentle kick at the moment when you are best prepared to defend yourself if the slumber should prove to be only feigned. It is possible, again, that the demonstration may be entirely dictated by reasons of domestic policy. The unity of Germany, as understood by Prussia, is a unity based on conquest. Even in this very speech Count BISMARK avows that his object in annexing Hanover was, not to include 2,000,000 Hanoverians in the common German Fatherland, but to ensure Prussia against ever again having an Hanoverian army in her rear. The motive was strategical, not sentimental. From this point of view, it may be of great importance not to let the idea of a French invasion die away. It may be of importance in the annexed countries, because, as long as the cause of the dethroned sovereigns can be identified with France, the idea of independence is not likely to make much way among a German population. It may be of importance in the purely Prussian provinces, because it supplies an excuse for keeping up a military establishment which, though really required for the consolidation of recent conquests, can only be ostensibly justified on the plea of danger from without. These alternative suggestions may all have some shadow of truth in them, though on the whole it is to the last that we incline as intrinsically the most probable.

CANADIAN PROSPECTS.

THE newly constituted Dominion of Canada has passed through some stormy weather in the first year of its existence, but it has had its fair share of sunshine, and the clouds are now visibly breaking even in the most threatening quarters. Three out of the four Provincial Legislatures have thoroughly understood their position, and have given themselves up to useful local work, instead of attempting to encroach on the ultimate Sovereignty which was wisely vested in the Federal House of Commons at Ottawa. One of them, the Parliament of the Province of Quebec, is actively engaged in the development of a new scheme of colonization, in connexion with cheap wooden railroads, with which it is proposed to pierce the forest in every direction. The great recommendation of the scheme is, that the road is to be made of materials to be had for the cutting on the right and left of the track, and at a cost very little more than that of a common metalled road. Every line that may be so constructed will open up millions of acres of available land, and with improved organization for placing the immigrants, who are now beginning to discover the superior advantages of Canada over the States, the progress of the country promises to surpass all past experience, even of that wonderful Western continent. Only a year or so ago the comparatively sluggish French Canadians were moved by a wave of feeling which prompted many of them to seek to better their fortunes in the States. These very men are now petitioning by thousands to be received back again on terms as favourable as those accorded to emigrants from Europe; and opinion on the west of the Atlantic is gradually settling down to the conviction that, having regard to the fiscal burdens of the United States, and the magnificent means of transit in the Dominion, life in the Colonies is easier and more flourishing than in the great Republic, as it stands after its terrible war. While material interests are thus prospering, political harmony between the central and local Governments has not been disturbed, except in the case of the Nova Scotia Repealers, and even their extravagant, though not unintelligible, excitement is rapidly becoming a thing of the past. It is now some time since the news arrived that the Repeal cause had been abjured by its leader, Mr. HOWE, and it was not everyone perhaps in England who appreciated the full meaning of this defection. Mr. HOWE was something more than the first man among the Nova Scotian Repealers, just as O'CONNELL was more than the first man among Irish Repealers. As O'CONNELL created the Repeal party in Ireland, so did Mr. HOWE in the smaller field of Nova Scotia. With great ability, and with a lofty scorn of consistency, he lashed into fury the indignation of the less instructed classes of his tiny country. As long as it was possible for a Repeal agitation to show front with the slightest semblance of a hope of success, Mr. HOWE wrote and spoke and worked with wonderful energy for the impossible object which he had led his countrymen to aim at. But Mr. HOWE, though not perhaps free from the vanity and selfishness that generally mark the popular tribune, was by no means devoid of sense, and when he saw that both parties in the House of Commons recognised the impossibility of repealing an Act in which four previously distinct communities had a common interest, and that the choice lay between submission and impotent rebellion, he, like a prudent man, accepted the situation. For a time it was doubtful how far the example would be followed. The Executive Council of Nova Scotia presented to their LIEUTENANT-GOVERNOR an Address compounded of the same admixture of Constitutionalism and petty treason which used to flavour O'CONNELL'S manifestoes. The last act of the Duke of BUCKINGHAM was to send an answer, quietly but firmly rebuking the pretensions of this rather arrogant body, and appealing from them to the common sense of their countrymen at large. A little later a not less objectionable Address has been forwarded from the Assembly of Nova Scotia, which was elected in the midst of Mr. HOWE'S agitation. This has been met by a despatch from the present Colonial Minister, even more decided and more absolutely fatal to the hopes of the Repealers than that of the Duke of BUCKINGHAM. Even before this decisive evidence of the conclusive nature of the new Dominion Constitution, the Nova Scotians had begun to doubt the wisdom of the representatives whom they had chosen in a moment of angry excitement. The Legislature desired to thwart the Militia Act of the Federal Parliament, but in spite of the opposition of the most extreme Separatists, the people mustered in the ranks to the number of 5,000 and more, which is a large quota from so very small a country as Nova Scotia. Of these the majority were men who had followed Mr. HOWE in accepting the situation.

No sooner was the final answer of the Liberal Cabinet given against Repeal, than further symptoms were apparent of the break-up of the party. Mr. HOWE and a colleague of his met one of the Dominion Ministers to negotiate terms of compromise, and, subject of course to the ratification of the Ottawa Legislature, these have been finally arranged. In a sense they may be supposed by some to justify Mr. HOWE'S agitation, for there is a considerable doubt whether they are not more favourable to Nova Scotia than any that could have been obtained by less vigorous means. Railways and public buildings belonging to the Province are, it seems, to be paid for out of the Federal money, and Mr. HOWE himself is to preside over the Privy Council at Ottawa. This is certainly accepting the situation with adequate fervour, and it may be doubted whether the ex-agitator would not have served his country better by remaining out of office until his elevation would afford no excuse for unpleasant suggestions. His powers are not disputed by any party, but he has done much mischief by his hot-headed advocacy of Repeal, and he may have done more by giving to his desertion the appearance of a personally selfish arrangement.

Mr. Howe's personal character is, however, a comparatively small matter, except so far as any slur upon his integrity may swell the numbers of the ultra party who still refuse to "accept the situation." There are, however, satisfactory indications that the bulk even of the Anti-Confederation party are beginning to see the wisdom of making the best of things. Even the organs of the extreme Repealers profess that they mean to accept every concession that can be wrung from the sister provinces—just as O'Connell used to take the successive measures which were won from the British Parliament—as instalments only of the demand for Repeal. These tactics, though not dignified, are generally successful, and seem to thrive as well in Nova Scotia as in Ireland. The most remarkable evidence of Mr. Howe's influence is at the same time afforded by the tone of the Repeal press. Nothing can exceed the virulence of the language used in speaking of those who were leaders of the Confederation movement from the first. They are told, in the pure Transatlantic dialect of one of the Repeal organs, that if they remain quiet "they "may take the benefit of the forgetfulness that comes "of utter scorn and contempt," but if they aspire again to public life, they shall be "pilloried for the universal "execration of the country." We do not cite this vigorous declamation for its own sake so much as to show the contrast between it and the language used of Mr. Howe. It might have been supposed that the traitor who accepted the situation after the example of the militiamen, and ended by taking a seat in the hostile Cabinet, would be denounced with all the exuberant eloquence at the command of his deserted followers. Strangely enough, we find that Mr. Howe is still spoken of by the most extreme members of the party which he made and destroyed with a respect which is quite unaccountable, except on the supposition that he carries with him the sympathies of a very large section of the Repeal party. Whether this be so or not, it is certain that the agitation is practically killed, and before many years we may hear the Nova Scotians boasting how their Province and their leader, Mr. Howe, got more than their fair share of the good things of the Dominion by the well-used device of quarrelling with the Union itself.

While the differences with Nova Scotia are thus rapidly settling themselves, Newfoundland and Columbia are both beginning to gravitate to the common centre, and to seek the Union which one of them—Newfoundland—had at first rejected. The pending question with the Hudson's Bay Company grievously delays the settlement of a large and valuable portion of the Dominion territory, but if both sides are rational, the Company will have no difficulty in getting reasonable terms for any sovereign or other rights or privileges which it really has the power to sell. Whenever this arrangement is concluded, Canada will be able completely to consolidate herself, and promises to start on a new career, which will make her not less attractive to European emigrants than the United States themselves.

MR. EDWARDS' APOLOGY.

Mr. EDWARDS complains that his examination before the Lord Mayor "took the very unusual form of hos"tility from both sides." This is quite true; but not only must Mr. Edwards be aware that he is a very unusual person, and therefore is not unlikely to receive very unusual treatment, but when he says that the object of getting his evidence was "not for the purpose of eliciting any facts material to the "inquiry before the Court," he must submit to be reminded what the inquiry was, and what was the point at issue between Dr. Thom and the house of Overend and Gurney. Dr. Thom's case was that, at the time of the concoction of the new Company, the old partners knew that the concern was rotten at the core; that they fraudulently concealed the true state of their affairs; and that the prospectus issued by the Directors embodied this fraud. On the other hand, the Gurneys replied that, though they had been unfortunate, they concealed nothing; that their affairs had been conducted, not with success certainly, but with good faith throughout. And to prove their respective allegations it was necessary both for the Gurneys and their accuser to go into the details of the management of their business. One person, and one alone, was possessed of the secret history of the house. That person was Mr. Edwards. On Dr. Thom's part it was urged that Mr. Edwards was perfectly aware of, and was a party to, the hopeless insolvency of the house; and therefore his examination, as conducted in the interests of Dr. Thom, was to show up that mode of doing business which Mr. Edwards was employed on behalf of the Gurneys to carry out, and which he and they alike knew, or ought to have known, must end in ruin. On the Gurneys' part it was urged that Mr. Edwards was not only perfectly cognizant of, but was mainly responsible for, the losses incurred; and therefore his examination, as conducted in the interests of the Gurneys, was to show up his mode of doing business, and to throw the burden of failure on him instead of on themselves. Hostility from both sides was therefore very unpleasant, perhaps, but not quite so unnatural. The Gurneys, smarting under their ruin, could not but look with hostility on the man whom they charged with being the author of their ruin; Dr. Thom and the shareholders, also smarting under ruin, must have entertained exactly the same feelings towards the man who was, so they said, the main instrument of that policy which had brought the house into such a state that all the new capital imported into it could not keep it from falling. Every man's hand is perhaps against Mr. Edwards, but then it was alleged at the Mansion House that Mr. Edwards' hand was against every man.

And this seems to be the upshot of Mr. Edwards' very clever apology. For example, one main charge suggested against Mr. Edwards is that he took commission from both sides, the buyer and seller—or, more strictly, the borrower and lender—in the same transaction. What is his answer? Not that this was not so, but that both parties were aware of it. Volenti non fit injuria. This is the plea sometimes, we believe, advanced in the Divorce Court, that the respondent has had, practically, leave and license from the husband to seduce the wife. It is not a very moral plea, but anyhow, whenever urged, it admits the fact of seduction. This is what Mr. Edwards admits, and the only charge against him is that the very thing which he admits constitutes his culpability. "It is true," Mr. Edwards admits, "that Mr. Xenos paid "me at the rate of 500*l.* a year; it is true that Mr. Scott "Russell paid me commission on the loan advanced to him "by the Gurneys; but then the Gurneys had full knowledge "of these payments, and even named and arranged their "amount. How then could the Gurneys be injured by these "payments?" The question is not whether the Gurneys were privy to the transaction, but whether the transaction was itself defensible; whether, on the face of it, it was not a wanton squandering of the assets of the house—that is, of their creditors' property; and whether Mr. Edwards, being privy to the transaction, and being the only person benefited by it, was culpable in being a party to it? In the case of an ordinary loan of 100*l.*, if the lender A. gives B., a middleman, 5*l.*, and if the borrower C. gives the same B. 5*l.*, it stands to reason that the 100*l.* is sweated down to 90*l.*, and the capital so far lessened for the private gain of B., and that this 10*l.* might have been saved and spared. These admissions on Mr. Edwards' part run through the whole of his apology. He complains of the suggestion that the 20,000*l.* was paid him by the Gurneys either for ruining their business or for nothing at all; and he says that either alternative is absurd. And then he goes into an elaborate proof of this very paradox that actually both alternatives are true, and, wonderful as the assertion is, he urges that there could be no harm in all this, because the Gurneys were perfectly aware that their house was being ruined, that they had commenced the system of ruining it, and only hired Mr. Edwards to carry on and complete their ruin. And further, that when things had run their natural course, and when the ruin that they had compassed—or, as it is called, "the policy" of making advances to rotten concerns had borne its natural fruits—they really did pay him his 20,000*l.* for nothing at all, or, if for anything, for hush-money, because, "Friend Edwards, we do "not see how we are to get on without thee;" because friend Edwards "had become possessed of sufficient knowledge to "have forced us to put up our shutters within twenty-four "hours of his revelations, if he had chosen to make them"; and because friend Edwards had shown, by something very like a threatening letter of December, 1864, that he was perfectly capable of making these revelations.

These two points—the allegation of Mr. Edwards' complicity in the losses sustained by the Gurneys, and the allegation that he got 20,000*l.* only because he was master of the situation and to purchase his silence—are worth clearing up. "How," plaintively asks Mr. Edwards, "can it be charged against me "that I caused those losses? Certainly Overend and Gurney "cannot and will not say so." Mr. Chapman does say so; but let that pass. The question is not what the Gurneys say, but what Dr. Thom and the shareholders say. This question, the only one worth a moment's consideration, Mr. Edwards traverses, and goes into proofs of the perfectly irrelevant, however astounding, fact that the Gurneys were conscious and active parties to their own ruin, carefully provided for it, and secured

Mr. EDWARDS' invaluable aid to make this certainty of ruin doubly certain. For, to do Mr. EDWARDS justice, he faithfully fulfilled this very extraordinary commission. The Atlantic Royal Mail Company had received advances from the GURNEYS to the amount of 200,000*l.* before Mr. EDWARDS was hired. The mot d'ordre of the GURNEYS, and "the policy" originated by them, and entrusted to Mr. EDWARDS, was to keep all cases with which he had anything to do out of bankruptcy. These were his instructions, and in following them out he "supported this policy" by increasing this little debt of 200,000*l.* to 600,000*l.* This "policy" in familiar language, is called throwing good money after bad; and though it may suit Mr. EDWARDS to say that people may well differ as to whether it is a wise policy or not, we beg leave to say that there can be no question about its folly, and little question about its honesty; and that it is a very poor vindication of either its wisdom or its honesty to plead that the GURNEYS, as well as Mr. EDWARDS, were all along privy to it. Two blacks do not make a white. When "the policy" of making these advances under the circumstances was announced to Mr. EDWARDS, he must either have approved or disapproved of it. If he disapproved, he cannot be relieved from the imputation of being a consenting party to what he must have known was wrong in itself, and must end in ruin. If he approved, he cannot be relieved from the charge made by impetuous and plain-spoken Mr. BIRKBECK, that the great losses of the house were to be attributed to his advice, albeit his advice and assistance were only in accordance with "the "policy" of the house. If the policy was flagitious, and Mr. EDWARDS knew it to be such, he was guilty, for the sake of lucre, of carrying out what he knew to be wrong; if he thought it right, as it turned out to be very wrong, he is guilty of being something more than a passive spectator of the ruin of the great house. He was an active participator in, if not the original inventor of, a policy which was either criminal or foolish to the last degree. The recent history of OVEREND and GURNEY raises only the old and ugly dilemma between knave and fool. Dr. THOM and his supporters urge knave; the GURNEYS, according to Mr. EDWARDS, plead fool; only it is a folly not only so astounding, but so peculiar, that the fool which it suggests is somewhat of SOLOMON's type, whose sport it is to do mischief, who rageth and is confident, and whose abomination it is to depart from evil—that is, who determines, when he has begun "a policy," to stick to it.

The other point is equally curious, and Mr. EDWARDS' apology does much to clear up the mystery of the why and wherefore his stipend of 5,000*l.* a year was actually paid as a subsidy by the GURNEYS. The facts seem to be these:—In November, 1862, Mr. EDWARDS was engaged for five years certain, at a salary of 5,000*l.*, the hiring to commence January 1, 1863, and to terminate January 1, 1868. As early as the latter part of 1863 Mr. BIRKBECK rebelled; "from that time "the confidential relations between myself and the house "practically closed." Throughout 1864 the house placed no matter in his hands. Throughout 1864 Mr. EDWARDS complained, remonstrated, and towards the end of the year threatened, and the result of his complaints was that he got the 20,000*l.*; that is to say, for one year's service, that of 1863, he got the whole sum which it had been engaged to pay him—either 20,000*l.* or 25,000*l.*, it is not quite clear which; most likely the former, as Mr. EDWARDS says, "in taking the "sum of 20,000*l.* it appears to me that I was foregoing part "of my just claim; and I think so still." Just claim for what? It could not be for four years' services, for he only acted during one year—namely, 1863. The GURNEYS, it appears, had fixed upon five years as the term during which "their "policy" must come to an end. Mr. EDWARDS, by his skilful management, had contrived to compress into one year five years' work; and no doubt on this view of the matter he was entitled to the full sum, just as a contractor who bargains to lay a cable in six months is entitled to his full payment if he does the work in two months. So if the GURNEYS had, as it seems they had, entered into an undertaking with themselves to ruin their house in five years, and had secured Mr. EDWARDS' services to spread out this remarkable achievement over the whole of that time, they could not complain of Mr. EDWARDS' diligence in helping them to their ruin so handsomely and completely in a single year. This is, in its way, a legitimate excuse for Mr. EDWARDS taking the whole pound of flesh, even though it weighed 20,000*l.* But this excuse, good as it is, admits that for four years—namely, for 1864-5-6-7—Mr. EDWARDS did nothing at all—but hold his tongue. This silence was not so much golden as gold-worthy; and the golden ox, as the Greek proverb says, on Mr. EDWARDS' tongue was not altogether thrown away. The shutters which Mr. EDWARDS might have put up in 1863 were not put up till 1868, and after all were not put up by the GURNEYS at all, but by the Limited Liability Company, and the Six Directors. This postponement of the crash was perhaps cheaply purchased at 20,000*l.* At any rate these were the terms dictated by Mr. EDWARDS, and the GURNEYS submitted to them. After one year's service, and at the end of the second year during which no services had been rendered, Mr. EDWARDS plainly intimated that if the GURNEYS did not come to terms, and his terms too, he might be under the necessity of making public his connexion with the house, and disclosing "the "policy," to the admiration, we suppose, and imitation, of the commercial world of London. The GURNEYS were absolutely at Mr. EDWARDS' mercy, and Mr. EDWARDS took the merciful view and 20,000*l.*, which, we quite agree with him, was foregoing part of his claim; for if he had demanded 40,000*l.* no doubt he would have got it, so completely was he master of the situation. Only we must remind Mr. EDWARDS that his claim was either for helping and being privy to the ruin of the house in one year instead of five years, or was the price for submitting to be paid—bribed, it is sometimes called—for not revealing the secrets of the house, and, as Mr. CHAPMAN says, for being "soothed down" by those who were helpless under his tender mercies.

HISTORICAL CYCLES.

WE have more than once spoken of historical parallels, the fallacy which is implied in their thoughtless use, and the opposite fallacy which is implied in despising them altogether. No historical parallel can be absolutely perfect, because no event in history ever exactly repeats itself. The fact that a parallel is a parallel, the fact that two events of different ages or different countries are compared together, will hinder the two events from being exactly alike. The fact that one event belongs to one age and country and the other event to another age and country will impress upon each some points of difference from the other. But it does not at all follow from this that real instruction, practical instruction and not a mere gratification of curiosity, may not be drawn from the comparison of distant events with one another. For in truth it is often the points of difference which make the comparison most instructive. And it is often the points of difference in detail which best enable us to see the essential analogy between two periods or states of things. A merely outward likeness, a likeness which is a mere likeness of detail, may very well be simply accidental. But a likeness which pierces through the differences necessarily caused by the diversities of countries, times, and men's manners is pretty sure to be a real and essential likeness. That is to say, however remote in time and place the two events may be, analogous causes are at work in the two cases, and they are bringing about analogous effects.

Now, if these remarks are true of historical parallels in general, they are specially true of one class of historical parallels, which we will distinguish as historical cycles. We will give this name to those cases when events seem to reproduce themselves in the history of the same nation, when events happen in one age which, amidst all diversities, present an essential likeness to events which, perhaps in some very distant age, happened in the history of the same country or people. Events, strictly so called, may repeat themselves, or again, institutions may repeat themselves. Institutions especially may practically repeat themselves, amidst the greatest varieties of external circumstances. The institutions of a very advanced age may be a real return to the institutions of a very early age. The later days of a people, amidst countless differences of detail, may have more real likeness, more identity of principle, with its very early days, than with intermediate times from which, in all outward circumstances, they are separated by much slighter differences. This sort of reproduction in the history of the same people or country may be fairly called a cycle. A former state of things seems, with the necessary allowances, to be repeated. The nation seems, with the same necessary allowances, to come back to a point at which it stood ages before. This is strictly the cycle, as distinguished from the ordinary parallel. The analogy between ancient Greece and mediæval Italy is one of the best parallels of the ordinary kind, one of those which we can best follow out both in points of likeness and in points of unlikeness. But the parallel between mediæval Italy and primæval Italy before the power of Rome arose is a parallel of another kind. Our knowledge of the earlier period is not enough to enable us to carry out the comparison in the same detail in which we can carry out the comparison in the other case. But our knowledge is enough to enable us to say that the parallel between mediæval and primæval Italy is a real parallel. And, being a real parallel, it is a parallel of the particular sort of which we are now speaking. It is a return on the part of a country to a state of things essentially the same as a state of things many ages older. That is, it is a true case of an historical cycle.

On the other hand, a parallel which is simply a parallel and no more may be sometimes mistaken for a case of cycle, or it may be sometimes, for interested purposes, represented as being one. We have, for instance, heard till we are weary about the Buonapartes, elder and younger, somehow reproducing the career and position of Charles the Great. Now there doubtless is a certain parallelism, faint and distant, it is true, but real as far as it goes, between the Empire of Charles the Great and the Empire of the elder Buonaparte. No doubt the virtue of the parallel is a good deal lost through conscious aping on the part of Buonaparte; still there is a certain real analogy between two Empires both springing up in a comparatively sudden way, and both taking in, speaking roughly, nearly the same countries. But that is all. The parallel is not a cycle, but the opposite to a cycle. The Empire of Charles was the domination of Germany over Gaul: the Empire of Buonaparte was the domination of Gaul over Germany. A far nearer approach to a repetition of the career of Charles is to be found in the late aggrandizement of Prussia. There is no such striking parallel at first sight as there is in the other case; but there is a real and very close likeness. Superficial observers are apt to talk of Charles the Great as a sort of meteor which flashed for a moment and left no lasting results behind. His great Empire doubtless broke up, and therefore to careless eyes it looks as if he did no lasting work at all. But Charles did two very great and very lasting works, one for good and one for evil. And one of them has just been pretty well done over again before our own eyes. The first work of Charles was to found what, as compared with the state of things before him, may be called a united Germany. His second work was to unite Germany and Italy under a single sovereign. On these two works of one man all later European history hangs. Now what have we ourselves seen within three years? The last traces of Charles' work for evil have been wiped out; his work for good has been done over again. It is hard to make people understand how many things go in cycles, how often history repeats itself, how much that seems to be innovation is really restoration. This is emphatically the case with regard to the German and Italian Kingdoms. It is hard to make people believe that German and Italian unity are not utterly new things, dreams of speculative politicians, but actual facts which existed long ago and to which we are now only going back. But any one who understands the history of the world for the last thousand years knows very well that every step that has been taken towards the unity of Germany or of Italy is not a step towards something new, but really a step back again towards something old.

In our own history, above all, every step in advance has been at the same time a step backwards. We have often shown how our latest constitution is, amidst all external differences, essentially the same as our earliest, how every struggle for right and freedom from the thirteenth century onwards has simply been a struggle for recovering something old, often in quite another shape, but still essentially the same amidst all the differences of an early and a late state of society. Let us take one example out of many, and let us illustrate it by a story from the late general election. A Liberal candidate professes to be a lover of everything old, a hater of everything new. He denounces the novelties of Toryism, the mere mushroom growth of the last two or three hundred years. Presently he is called on at a dinner to give the toast of the Bishop and Clergy. He makes the suspicious addition of "Ministers of all Denominations." A clergyman opposite triumphantly asks whether ministers of all denominations were among the old things which he loved. The candidate takes his opportunity, and shows how toleration was the old thing and intolerance the new; how, in the first days of the Gospel in England, a heathen King could give full freedom to the preachers of Christianity, and a Christian King could do no kind of harm to those of his people who clave to their old heathendom. In short, if anybody, in Spain or elsewhere, wants a model for a Toleration Act, he cannot do better than turn to Bæda, and study the sayings and doings of the first Christian Bretwalda.

In France we do not see the same going back to old institutions under other forms which we see in England; but we do see the principle of cycles busily at work in other ways. It is obvious that there are large portions of French history which read exactly like repetitions of other portions. There are scenes in the French history of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries which only need the names to be changed to pass as scenes in the history of the great Revolution. In all cases we find the same deeds of violence and bloodshed done in honour of the most exalted principles of freedom and love of mankind. But there is a much subtler cycle in French history than this. Gaul has not, like England, fallen back on its old institutions, but it has certainly fallen back upon its old nationality. The Frankish element has died out or has been assimilated, just as the Norman element has been assimilated in England, and Gaul is again Gaulish, just as England is again English. And if it has not fallen back on its old institutions, it is for the obvious reason that there were not, strictly speaking, any old institutions to fall back upon. The old Teutonic constitution was capable of being developed, on its own principles, by the needful changes in form and detail, into the constitution which we have now. But Gaul, where Franks and Goths conquered and settled, but never formed the mass of the population, had no such inheritance to develop. Teutonic institutions were in Gaul simply the institutions of conquerors, as Roman institutions were before them. Hence it is that there is in France no such continued political existence as there is in England. The cities of France were ancient when most of the cities of England were founded, but, when we come to look at the laws and usages by which they are ruled, we find the balance of antiquity wholly the other way.

But perhaps there is no European country where events have repeated themselves in so remarkable a way as they have done in Sicily. The repetition is so exact that it almost passes the stage of parallelism and reaches that of identity. But the repetition is not the result of any deep or mysterious cause; it is simply the natural, almost the necessary, consequence of the geographical position of the island. Placed between Europe and Africa, it is the natural battle-ground of European and African Powers. It has thus come to pass that the great struggle between East and West, between the Semitic and the Aryan races, which in later times grew into a struggle between the Koran and the Gospel, has twice been fought out on Sicilian ground. The possession of Sicily was in one age of the world disputed between Greeks and Phœnicians, between colonists from Corinth and colonists from Carthage. The prize is wrested from both by the conquerors of Southern Italy, by the advancing might of Rome. Sicily becomes a Roman province; presently each metropolis shares the fate of its colony, and Corinth and Carthage perish in a single year. Ages afterwards the same part is played over again. Sicily is again disputed between men of Hellenic and men of Semitic speech, between subjects of the Byzantine Cæsar and subjects of the Saracen Caliph. Again the prize is wrested from both by new conquerors of Southern Italy, but conquerors again so far Roman that they spoke a variety of the speech of Rome. Sicily now, instead of a Roman province, becomes a Norman Kingdom, and the Norman conqueror, like the Roman, again makes Sicily a basis of operations for warfare both in Greece and in Africa. The events here repeat themselves almost literally. In fact, they can hardly help repeating themselves. That they have not happened over again a third time is simply because for ages past there has been no African Power capable of playing the part of the old Carthaginians and Saracens. Sicily has therefore been often tossed to and fro between different European Powers, but it has not for many ages run any danger of becoming other than European and Christian.

Take again quite another part of the world, Persia. One cannot help thinking that the singular vitality of Persian nationality, which makes the history of Persia such a contrast to the ordinary sameness of Eastern dynastic history, is in some way due to the Aryan blood of the genuine Persian people. It is a great thing for a nation to be able to say that it has been, twice in its history, roused up, after long ages of bondage, to a new national life by the preaching of a national religion. Ismael in the fifteenth century called the Persian nation again into being by the preaching of the Shiah form of Islam, just as, twelve hundred years before, Artaxerxes had called it again into being by the preaching of the old creed of the land held down so long under Macedonian and Parthian conquerors. This Persian cycle is really a more remarkable one than the Sicilian one, because it is not due to equally obvious causes. It comes nearer to the way in which English and Gaulish nationality have cropped up again, though it differs from them in that the two restorations of Persian nationality were brought about by open revolution, and were also connected with a national religious movement. But the last circumstance is owing to that invariable law of the East which makes nationality and religion identical.

On the whole, then, history does repeat itself a good deal in the various ups and downs of the same nation. But cycles of this sort must be studied with the same allowances and with the same warnings as ordinary historical parallels. The points of difference must be carefully noted, but, after all, the fact that we note the points of difference is the surest proof of essential likeness.

COURT DRESS.

THE great author of the Clothes-philosophy left his work half done. He sketched out a subject of vast importance, and gave many pregnant hints to the world through his brilliant disciple. But he either failed to form his philosophy into a consistent and coherent system, or rather—for we can scarcely suppose a true German to have stopped short in the road to a complete system—his interpreter doubted the digestive capacities of the British public, and only threw before them some specially racy morsels by way of whetting their appetites. Thus Herr Teufelsdröckh's remains present many keen flashes of insight, but lay down no body of rules which might enable persons devoid of his powers of intellectual vision to judge of the phenomena of dress. We have to grope our way in the dark, and decide more or less at random, in the absence of a settled philosophy. A stimulus should be given to our researches by the curious coincidence of a new code upon Court dress appearing simultaneously with a new edition of Sartor Resartus. We should of course fail in the attempt to moralize on the circumstance in the fashion of the clothes-philosopher; as, in truth, there is no more detestable dialect in all literature than imitation Carlylese. Yet, standing on a humbler platform, and speaking the language of common life, we may possibly deduce one or two useful lessons.

The fundamental theorem of the clothes-philosophy asserts the existence of a necessary harmony between the human being and his artificial covering. Tell us how a man dresses, and we can infer with certainty his character and intellect. What is true of the individual is equally true of the race. Physiologists explain the presence of certain apparently useless organs by the supposition that they are inherited from remote progenitors living under different circumstances. In a precisely similar way, it has been suggested that the mysterious pair of buttons which ornament the small of a gentleman's back once discharged the useful function of supporting a sword-belt. They are rudimentary organs, which have persisted long after their use has been forgotten. They would thus testify to the former existence of a military instinct which is now so far extinct that swords are no longer part of our habitual costume; just as distinctly as a rudimentary claw would prove that an ancestor of the animal examined had been in the habit of scratching. If we take a more general view, there is nothing which marks the progress of society more distinctly than the change of fashion in dress. What, for example, can be more characteristic of the good and evil influences of our time than the dying out of provincial and class costumes? Feudalism will not be quite supplanted by modern ideas so long as the British peasant continues to wear a smockfrock. As soon as he becomes conscious of a sphere of life outside of his own village, or as soon as a passive submission to his position is changed for a desire to rise in the world, his altered temper will be marked by the final abandonment of his ancient dress. He will indulge in a humble imitation of the garments of the class above him, and one more characteristic figure will be missed from amongst us. We complain often enough of the disappearance of this and other more picturesque dresses; we are sorry to see the national dresses of Switzerland or the Tyrol superseded by a bad imitation of the one European model; and we look forwards with horror to the time when every male biped on the planet will be arrayed in chimney-pot hats and such garments as are supplied wholesale by advertising firms of tailors. Conceive of many millions of human beings any one of whom might have come straight out of Messrs. Moses and Son's vast commercial emporium! Will they not be wearing the livery of a bondage in some respects more degrading than that of old-fashioned tyrants, and give a palpable proof that vulgar commonplace has conquered the earth, and entered into the souls, as well as disfigured the outward appearance, of all its inhabitants? Students of political philosophy will recognise another manifestation of that tyranny of the majority which supplies so many prophets with doleful forewarnings. The future presents itself to their minds in the image of a Dissenting preacher clad in rusty black, and ordering all men to apparel themselves in his likeness. Already it requires more courage to walk across the Parks in eccentric garments than to march up to a battery in the midst of a crowd dressed after a single fashion; and every day helps to extend the reign of monotony, and reduce the distinction between different classes. It is long since each generation has had to repeat the complaint that it is more difficult to distinguish a gentleman from a pickpocket, and every one has insulted some spotless guest at an evening party by confounding him with the waiter behind his chair. Is not the concession to human weakness granted by the new regulations for Court dress one step more in the downward career? Thackeray somewhere remarks on the inexpressible dignity conferred upon our Sovereign by the fact that men could not enter the Royal presence without a tail. That distinction has fallen before the desolating advance of democracy, and now it seems that we are to be permitted to meet our gracious ruler without exchanging the trousers of domestic life for knee-breeches. We may attend a levée or a drawing-room in "black silk velvet trousers," or even in "dark-coloured cloth trousers of the same colour as the coat." A few more innovations, and even coachmen will abandon wigs; and the Judges, the Bishops, and even that most venerable of mortals, the Speaker of the House of Commons, will begin to tremble for the security of their gorgeous apparel. Nay, it is even possible that the beautiful flunkeys who delight the public by the sight of their brilliant plush and their manly calves may begin to grumble at the ornamental costume which now enhances their charms. When we think of this reckless admission of trousers, we have still deeper reasons for regret, for surely the substitution of trousers for breeches illustrates one of the darkest sides of what we are pleased to call progress. It is the triumph, not merely of monotony over variety, but of ugliness over beauty. It is the meagre and stunted part of mankind forcing the better made to surrender their advantages, and to hide shapely limbs under the monotonous black cylinder which may conceal either beauty or deformity. If our fathers had good legs, they showed them; we put the spindle-shanked and the muscular on the same level. We, in the words of the poet, "shift and bedeck and bedrape us"; our fathers were "noble and nude," if not precisely "antique." They, we may say, "were fair in the fearless old fashion, their limbs were as melodies yet." We are reduced as nearly as may be to mathematical diagrams, capable of being dressed like the philosophers of Laputa, by help of a theodolite and a table of logarithms. If George IV. was not a model ruler in all respects, he had at least most undeniable calves, and displayed them freely for the loyal admiration of his loving subjects. Where is it all to end? Ladies still preserve a taste for the beautiful, though they too echo the complaint that the distinction between classes tends to become, at best, a mere distinction in costliness, not in fashion. But who can say how long it will be before women too find out that love of dress is frivolous, and hasten to the poll in some uniform as ugly and monotonous as that of their brothers?

We fear that it is impossible to give an entirely satisfactory answer to such lamentations. Yet something may be said for those who persist in hoping for the welfare of their species. Undoubtedly we are losing something that can never be replaced. Provincial dialects and costumes and characters are rapidly decaying as man becomes a more cosmopolitan animal, and the little backwaters and side-eddies of human life are carried away in the main current. The Tyrolese peasant, with his blackcock's feather and his graceful dress, will pass away when the flood of tourists fairly bursts into his valleys, and his grandson will perhaps be indistinguishable from the driver of a London omnibus. The old social castes are being rapidly ground to powder in the democratic mill, and their outward signs must disappear with them. The first result must necessarily be a painful increase of monotony, and a disappearance of many characteristic figures surrounded by pleasant associations. Yet it is possible to look forwards to a more reasonable state of things developing itself by degrees. We still suffer from the animosities of a revolutionary epoch. The working man is discontented with his position, and is anxious to throw off the badges of his disgrace. He dresses exactly like his superiors, in order to prove that one man is as good as another. In the Millennium, when everybody is perfectly satisfied with the social order, no one will be ashamed of wearing a distinctive and appropriate dress. Bad manners are the product of a state of society in which nobody is quite at ease, because class privileges are dying out and consequently ill-defined; and the attempt, so often ridiculed, of every social stratum to ape the dress of that immediately above it, is the natural expression, in terms of coats and trousers, of the discontent which can only cease when we have somehow reached a position of comparative equilibrium. Bad taste in dress, like the disorders of our natural integuments, indicates the presence of some morbid humour which we may hope will be gradually absorbed in a healthy constitution. This, however, is a speculation which can only refer to a distant epoch. We shall probably work out a sound system of dress when we have learnt to paint pictures and build houses and form political constitutions to the general satisfaction of the country. Meanwhile it is tolerably safe to congratulate ourselves on the disappearance of distinctions which have ceased to correspond with any real beliefs of mankind. Court dress must always remain at a certain distance from that of ordinary human beings, so long as we have any genuine loyalty; yet it is well that it should follow the ordinary costume of the period at as little distance as may be. It is doubtless difficult to measure the intensity of reverence indicated by taking off one's trousers and putting on a sword and a pair of breeches. Does the difference, for example, between trousers and breeches fully express the awe produced by the presence of royalty on a devout believer in the divine right of kings? We hesitate to express any opinion on so knotty a question; yet, when we endeavour to realize the extreme reluctance with which we should undergo such a transformation in presence of any mere mortal, we are inclined to think that this would not be a violent hypothesis. Seeing, therefore, that we are still sincerely loyal, and yet by no means believers in that dogma in its extreme sense, we should say that some mean term between breeches and ordinary trousers will be the fittest expression for our feelings. We therefore approve, so far as we can venture to judge, of the happy medium discovered in "black silk velvet trousers," or even in "dark-coloured cloth trousers, with a narrow gold-lace stripe on the sides."

BOYS.

A HIGH authority has counted, among the drops of bitterness in the cup of every prosperous and successful life, the vexation of spirit which a man experiences from the reflection that it is an even chance that his son will turn out to be a fool. The sting of the possibility seemed keen enough to make the condition of the father who, owing to the happy accident of being a fool himself, enjoyed an immunity from its pain, almost an object of envy to the philosopher. Modern experience has done nothing to shake the basis of the ancient Oriental calculation, but has, if anything, somewhat strengthened the probabilities against the intellectual application of the physical law, fortes creantur fortibus et bonis. There is more than an even chance that the wise man's son will be a fool; and the wise man, knowing this, will exhibit his wisdom in taking his luck and making the best of it, rather than in "hating life" because the chances of its dice are against a high intellectual throw twice running in its generations. To a man of the ordinary stamp, who is not wise except in a broad and liberal application of the word, but who is at least equally far from being a fool, the probable future of "the man that shall come after him" presents a problem of constantly increasing interest through the years of middle life. The throw of his own career, directed by the hidden influences of birth and training, education, natural capacity, and casual surroundings, has turned up the working average of seven; it might have been better, but then it might have been worse, and he has nothing to complain of. But he knows that the chances for his son are just as good in favour of a higher cast as against it. He finds in the golden mediocrity of his personal experience a level and pleasant standing-point from which he can contemplate the future at much greater ease than falls to the lot of the philosopher in his more exalted height; and if he uses his opportunities he will not find himself without very fair means of guessing—for knowing is necessarily out of the question—whether his son will be a wise man or a fool in comparison with himself. The balance of judgment will naturally always incline in the more favourable direction, and will have to be corrected accordingly, so that such indications of opinion as a man may gather from his neighbours will be useful in qualifying his own. A man who is either consciously or by common consent himself a fool will occasionally be found to take umbrage at the conventional hope which may be expressed to his son in his hearing, "that he may turn out a better man than his father"; but the invariable intention to compliment the parent in the use of a phrase so very uncomplimentary at first sight is a sufficient evidence of the generally understood bias of the parental desires. There are few, if any, men worth taking into account to whom it is not a source of positive pleasure to be distanced by their sons, and to whom the chance of such a result is not a sincere gratification in prospect. It would be impossible to be thoroughly in sympathy with boys without some such anticipation, and the feeling may often be detected underlying the coldest and most rugged outward manner. It will never be found safe to calculate on its absence, and a slip of this sort may bring its author to condign and uncompassionated grief. In the early days of the great Oxford religious movement, it chanced that a funeral sermon had brought within the range of a leading Nonconformist preacher several lads who were enthusiastic followers of the new school. The good man poured volley after volley mercilessly into them, conceiving himself to have the hearty support of all the seniors in the family. At length, in an evil moment for himself, he was seized by a prophetic afflatus, and assured the row of Tractarian youths before him that neither in worldly prosperity nor in mental powers had any of them a chance of attaining the standard of their venerable progenitor. He had reckoned without his host; he was hardly out of the pulpit when he was brought to a humiliating apology by the offended seniors, who gave him pretty sharply to understand that his prophesyings were considerably more mistaken than their nephews' opinions, however "unsound" these might be.

To any one who does not care to throw himself into the future of his children, and to watch its germs in their present growth, the holidays must be an unmitigated affliction. But we must correct our antiquated expression. We had forgotten, for the moment, that there are no "holidays" now; we mean, of course, the "vacation." "Holidays" have vanished with "the half" into the limbo of forgotten religions; "vacations" have come in with "terms"; and the school year now, like the Gallia of our boyish recollections, est omnis divisa in partes tres, or, as the traditional construe had it, "is quartered into three halves." We do not like the change, but factum valet, and we take it as we find it. The new vacation seems not to be prized as the old holidays were; and the contrasts presented between periods separated by intervals of twenty weeks were far more distinctly marked than they can be when the interval may at times be little more than ten. The distinct stages of growth are less appreciable, and require a closer and more careful examination. On the other hand, the great change in the modern system of school-life, of which the "term" is but a chance accessory, has immensely altered for the better the mutual relations of a schoolboy and his father. In the miserable old régime of the private schools, it is scarcely too much to say that this relation was, at regularly recurring periods, that of natural enemies. The boy had no pride in his school, and could have no love for it. Sometimes he simply detested it. He smudged out "amo" and scrawled "odi" in his Eton Grammar, where "the master" was invoked to illustrate the mystery of the accusative case; and very often he did honestly, and from the depths of his small heart, "hate the master." His father all the while held the position of his alternate deliverer and torturer in respect of this monster. At the holidays he rescued him from his power; when Black Monday returned, he "sent him to school" again, and delivered him over, bound hand and foot, to the dreaded thraldom. In the happier days of modern school-life, the father may find that he has something to do in holding his own against the rival worship of the Head Master. The home is the complement of the school, and not the refuge from its sorrows and the balm for its miseries. The interests of the father and son are recognised as identical, and not antagonistic; and the inevitable pressure of the "school-bill" is no longer augmented by the agreeable consciousness that it is regarded very much in the light of a payment for selling your son into slavery, placed only too inconveniently on the wrong side of the account. The holidays which bring back a boy from a public school have become periods each with a special interest of its own. He is glad to come home, of course; it is very pleasant, and like old times; he thinks you a little behind the age, perhaps, and rather out of the world; but there is a peculiar satisfaction in being able to set you right, and he has something to contribute to the status and the general stock of knowledge of the family. He does it in a quiet sort of way, not seeming to notice or expose your ignorance. You happen to speak of a "chimney-pot," with recollections of charming sketches by John Leech associated with the word; and it is by apparent chance that he brings you to the level of present discovery five minutes afterwards, by the casual mention of a "canister." You find out in fifty different ways that he has improved on the old "Dulce domum" traditions of your own boyhood, and brings out the perfect form of his "domus" in a couple of stereoscopic pictures of which one is his "home" and the other his "house." It is very pleasant to you to find him coming back to you not simply so much bigger, or so much more crammed with Greek and Latin—or modern languages, if you take that line—or with so much improved chances for a place in the House Eleven or the Twenty, but with so much more of what is really in him brought out and developed, and with so much more light thrown on the problem which you are trying to solve about him, as to what he will be fit for, and how he will be likely to turn out. It is quite certain that a good public school will bring out the capacities of a boy, or his want of capacity; and you send him back term after term with the satisfaction of knowing that whatever is in him, whether it is for a higher or a lower level than your own, is certain to come out under a training which is a great deal better than any other system could provide.

But the holidays are useful in their way, in supplying a want which is obviously beyond the reach of the school. Four or five hundred boys must of necessity be all day long and always in some kind of training, and a boy in term-time can never be out of harness day or night. If there are two sets of harness, one put on under the authority of his superiors, and the other under that of his equals, the result comes to much the same thing in the end. A boy, however, is a wild animal; and the freedom of the holidays affords an important opportunity both for the play of his wild nature and the study of his habits. Three or four wild animals, for a few weeks at a time, are sufficiently under control to let their natural habits have ample play; while four or five hundred together would be as impossible to study as to endure. It may be a slight trial of patience to have your house periodically turned upside down, and a holiday task is probably not without its uses in providing an occasional hour of quiet and a little breathing space; but the nearest attainable approach to an entire freedom to do as he likes is the best way to turn the holidays to account, in learning the bent of a boy's inclinations and testing his prospects for the future. It is weary work, and as unprofitable as it is weary, to chain a little fellow to a table for an hour's dismal grinding over Cæsar or Xenophon, when all the while he is longing to get back to a big piece of wood which the carpenter has given him, and on which he is labouring to perpetuate his last summer's recollections of Ryde and Portsmouth, especially when you know that the boat will turn out a success, and the translation very much the reverse. The holidays, when a man may have his sons under his own eye, supply a material link in the chain of probabilities whether a lad will turn out a wise man or a fool, and in what line he may get the best chance for himself; and in the public-school harness of the term lies the best security that the wild animal may be left without risk to follow his own instincts at home.

In one single direction the traditional antagonism between boys and schoolmasters remains in full operation, and the closing up of all other channels would appear to have given additional force to the escaping energy in this. The boy of the period has an intense and unrelenting hatred for his books. He holds intuitively the old philosophic doctrine, of which he never heard, that evil resides in matter; and his books, which are the material causes of his intellectual torment and of the restrictions upon football and cricket under which he groans, are punished and maltreated with the persistency of blind revenge. He scrawls over them, and inks them, and knocks them generally to pieces with a contempt for their feeble powers of resistance which in the days of his father and grandfather was unknown to the schoolboy mind. An Eton Grammar or Delectus in its stout leather cover, and still more a bulky Gradus of the good old Latin sort, "ab uno e societate Jesu," had got plenty of fight in it, and could do as good service on the outside of your neighbour's head as it was supposed to be capable of doing on the inside of your own; while its feeble representative, or descendant, in a flabby cloth binding is good for nothing as a missile, and is knocked out of time and stitching if it has only the misfortune to fall on the floor. The casualties of school-books in consequence are alarmingly on the increase, and the parental taxpayer grumbles seriously as the terminal school-bills come in, and the new levies to replace the killed and wounded have to be found and paid for. Not that grumbling on the subject is likely to be of the slightest service, as it falls on the unsympathizing ears of publishers and teachers who find in every smashed "Primer" an additional "trade" at twenty-five per cent.; and the old leather covers may therefore be sighed after in vain. Upon relics such as a Cicero de Officiis of 1778 now before us, or still more, an old Gradus, with its perilously un-Protestant title-page, and with a venerated name written in schoolboy characters of the last century above that of its later possessor, we can only look with a regretful tenderness which our grandsons are not likely to know. An old school-book is a strangely touching link between the past and the future. It will often, with its characteristic marginal embellishments, reproduce vividly, as nothing else could, the boyhood of a man who has left on the world which he has quitted the abiding mark of his maturity: and it may serve to remind the men of another generation, watching with anxious interest the impending and doubtful hazard for wisdom or folly in the case of their sons, of a period when the like uncertainty hung around the future of their fathers, to be dispelled in time by an issue which remains as their own noblest inheritance.

COUNTRY-HOUSES.

COUNTRY-houses may be divided into two sorts—houses that are not only in the country but of it, and houses that have nothing countrified about them but their situation. There is the real and the phenomenal, the pure and the hybrid, the genuine and the counterfeit country-house. Each is swayed by a characteristic idea. In the one, this is conformity with immediate surroundings; the assimilation of the life that is lived in it to its local setting, the cultivation of appropriate duties and residential tastes. When a man is in the country, it would have him think the thoughts and do the things of the country. The leading idea of the other is to minimize the accident of position, or to drop it altogether; to treat the landscape as a scenic accessory, and to aim merely at creating a receptacle for a series of brilliant immigrations from May Fair. There are common features, of course, in each. In both you dine and sleep well. Both provide their male guests with riding and shooting, their female guests with gossip and dancing. But, as you pass from one to the other, you are conscious of a subtle but perceptible change in the social atmosphere. One is of the province, provincial; the other of the centre, Londony. In one you inhale a comfortable or stately bucolicism; in the other, the largior aer of the fashionable world. The "note" of one is rusticity; of the other, Belgravianism. One regulates its scheme of life by county standards; the other owns no allegiance to any sovereignty but that enthroned in Pall Mall. In one you detect, however exquisitely sublimated, a whiff of quarter sessions; a breeze of imperial or even cosmopolitan interest ripples the other. "Country-houses for our sterling country neighbours" is the motto of the one; "country-houses for agreeable people from town" is the motto of the other. The one offers a certain amount of novelty, in the shape of a fresh stratum of unexplored bumpkinism. The other is a mere annexe of Fop's Alley and the Clubs; the revival, with a changed venue, of the last fashionable or political reunion of the season. As an instrument of social enjoyment, each of these types has its advantages. But which of the two is the preferable model for country hospitalities must depend on the tastes and idiosyncrasy of the visitor.

There are times when the most inveterate haunter of town yearns for a plunge into the deep, deep country. In some such mood, weary of advanced civilization, you accept the invitation of your old family friend, Sir Pompous Broadacres. It is wonderful what a social transformation a few hours in the train effects. You are dropped into Arcadia, or all that remains to the nineteenth century of that delectable figment of classic fancy. Your host is a kind of gentlemanly old Satyr. Your hostess is a plump and matronly development of the sylvan Diana. The young ladies are placid and decorously attired Hamadryads; the son of the house a Faun in knickerbockers. The whole scheme of life is regulated on bucolic principles. There is something idyllic even about the butler. The landscape is a reality, influencing the character, habits, and tastes of the inmates of the Hall. Here is a group of persons whose daily life is determined by their rural surroundings, to whom the Park and the Opera and the "best set" are as nothing, and to whom field sports and quarter sessions and county balls are everything. They are living the natural life and enjoying the natural pleasures of the country, content to leave their intellectual being to be fed by a rivulet from Mudie. They are eminently the square people in the square hole. There is an artistic propriety about the incidents of their daily round, a pictorial fitness in their background of horses and dogs. The scene is full of territorial colour. Everything from the dinner to the conversation savours of the realty. You sit among squires and squireens, and listen to the fine old English gentleman expatiating on the burdens of land, or the fine old English gentlewoman expounding its traditional etiquettes. What reviewers call the human interest is strictly limited to the area of the county. It is a remarkable proof of the vitality of Anglo-Saxon institutions that a boundary line traced by King Alfred should determine the range of sympathy in a great many modern households. A visiting list framed with exclusive reference to political geography is a curiosity in its way. This is the most salient feature of the country-house pure and simple. In the mouth of your hostess and her daughters "the county" means the one great oracle worth consulting, the only social authority whose fiats are binding, the alpha and omega of gossip and tittle-tattle. Nothing is commonplace, the most trivial things become momentous if they fulfil the condition of falling within the sacred limits. A mésalliance in any of the other thirty-nine divisions of England is a matter of supreme indifference; but if a Turnipshire squire marries his cook, every Turnipshire dinner-table rings with it. The transfer of an estate creates more hubbub than a revolution in a foreign land. The squabble about a right of way is more exciting than a conflict between two of the Great Powers. The perpetual contemplation of a glory in which, as a constituent atom, it shares, breeds in the county family a rather exaggerated notion of its own dignity and importance. A county pedigree is regarded as the sole passport to notice. Beauty is not beauty unless it has an hereditary right to sparkle at the assembly-rooms, and wisdom is not wisdom unless it flows from lips inspired by the Commission for the Peace. County exclusiveness has its good side, but to be respectable it ought to be completely person-proof. If Japan is to be taken as the social model, the treatment of all outsiders and interlopers should be equally Japanese. As a matter of fact, Turnipshire is not indiscriminately Japanese in its amenities. Its boasted reserve melts like a snow-wreath when a scion of Royalty, or some great personage, takes up his abode within its borders. Then squire vies with squire for a crumb of notice in the hunting-field, while their high mightinesses the county ladies, and the smaller fry who copy them, scramble for a passing smile from their great neighbour. Evidently, with all its exclusive airs, Turnipshire has more in common with Peckham than it would care to own.

The make-believe or phenomenal country-house is a mere development or corollary of the London season. The rural element is conspicuous by its absence. The trees among which it stands are little more than the pasteboard foliage of a Burford panorama. Neither the vegetable nor the brute creation awakens any enthusiasm. No one takes much interest in the stables or the Home-farm. A languid dalliance in the pheasant preserves, or a dawdle on horseback, is enough, and more than enough, for its rosewater sportsmen. The social features are quite different from those of the country-house proper. Your host exhibits none of the symptoms of land upon the brain, which is a chronic affection of the genuine squire. There is no trace of the county fetish which enslaves the mind of the squiress. Instead of these provincial humours, you have diverting glimpses of the fashionable world during its annual interval of hybernation. One by one the old familiar faces, perhaps rather too old and familiar, reappear. The veteran coquette, with her ringlets and her rouge, whose youth of frolics has mellowed into an old age of cards, is pretty sure to turn up at the whist-table. Here may be seen, refreshed and invigorated by a season of repose, the scheming dowager, like Bruce's spider, spinning for the twentieth time her web to catch an eldest son. Here too, by her side, is her most dangerous rival, the married siren, the wife and no wife of modern society, against whose practised charms her schemes—scheme she never so wisely—have a poor chance. Here the fashionable old maid brings her tatting and her scandal, secure of a welcome wherever a vivacious toady is in request. The male guests are recruited from types equally well known to the town. There is the inevitable attaché, with his foreign liveliness, and the inevitable guardsman, with his sublime phlegm. Nor would the circle be complete without Fribble and Fal-lal; Fribble with his womanish airs and languid drawl—a pinchbeck Horace Walpole, without wit or taste—and Fal-lal, to whom the Eternal Veracities centre in a charade or a cotillon. Or, instead of being merely frivolous, the tone of the house is literary and political. Then you meet more solid notorieties—the flower of the learned club or scientific society, a stray bishop or judge, a poet or an artist, the latest traveller, the newest novelist, the Minister whom great ladies delight to pet, or, greater far, the official underling, doing Mumbo Jumbo to perfection, and patronizing young ladies with the air of one who has the items of the next Budget in his pocket. All this is magnificent, but it is not country. It is the very negation of country. The whole establishment is genuine London ware. To call such a rendezvous of men and women about town a country-house is a misnomer. It is merely a Belgravian mansion, endowed with the power of locomotion which the flying palaces of the Arabian Nights were fabled to possess, and dropped into green fields.

Which of these two ideals is the most delectable? Which affords most pleasure—the country au naturel, or the country smothered in the piquant sauce of town? Merely with a view to enjoyment, all graver considerations apart, is it better to preserve the balance between town life and country life, or to run the two into one? There is much to be said in favour of maintaining the dualism. In the first place, it ensures a wholesome variety. The human mind abhors monotony; however frivolous, it requires at times an alterative. Change of scene is one of its needs. What is still more wanted, and twice as beneficial, is a periodical change of persons. A change of scene without a change of company is a mere mockery. And this is really all that the Belgravian country-house offers to its urban visitor. "Going out" in London, as the phrase runs, means meeting the same persons, saying the same things, listening to the same gabble night after night, often twice or thrice in the same night, during a period of four or five months of the year. This is part of the pleasure, doubtless, but it palls after a time nevertheless. Then no sooner is the season over than, spent and jaded, you are invited to repeat the self-same operation in greater detail, under colour of a round of autumnal visits. Not to put too fine a point upon it, a man must be exceptionally organized to desire to revolve in the same narrow orbit all the year round. Either he is bored to death, or he becomes incurably cliqueish. Merely by way of change, an escape to a simpler and healthier way of living, above all to fresh faces and different voices, the casual intercourse with those twin dignitaries of the parish, the parson and the squire, the incidental amusement which the foibles of their womankind afford, even a disquisition on turnpike trusts or gossip about a county ball, is grateful and refreshing. Then too, by investing town and country with a sort of mutual inviolability, the pleasure of London society acquires in its turn a dash of annual novelty. After a period of genuine rustication one returns with zest to a circle of brilliant talkers and exquisitely-dressed women. In the Belgravian country-house this element of pleasure is discounted. A man can hardly throw himself with relish into the full tide of June dissipation, if he has been anticipating it by driblets all through the previous recess. On the other hand, there are persons whose interest it is to obliterate the country pure and simple, and it is from them that the movement for Belgravianizing it proceeds. The practised conversationalist, for instance, disdains to cast his pearls of anecdote before a country audience. Winter or summer, he must have appreciative listeners of his own circle. The dowager, burning to marry her daughter, frets at the inaction of months of country retirement, and naturally prefers that model of a country-house which affords the most facilities for flirtation, and the best access, to young men of rank and fortune. The pushing woman, who uses her country-house merely as a lever by which to rise, shudders at rusticity in any shape, and opens her doors only to names that figure in the Court Journal, and the fashionable wirepullers of the day. But, one and all, these are persons who avowedly make a business, not a pleasure, of society. Consequently, their predilections hardly count for much in a speculation as to the amount of mere pleasure which a country-house may be made to yield, and the most scientific means for developing it.

CHANGES IN CRIMINAL PROCEDURE.

AMONG the reforms with the proposal of which the new Ministry has been rightly or wrongly credited is the institution of a Public Prosecutor. To this must be added a change in the treatment of professional criminals, which was promised by the Home Secretary in the House of Commons this week. If these two are efficiently carried out, they will together constitute a momentous improvement in the criminal procedure of the country. Perhaps it would be premature to fix the present Session as the time for introducing and completing each of these measures. But it is only echoing the wishes of the whole metropolis, if not of the whole nation, to pray that they may both be completed within the next two years. It is not the language of hyberbole to say that the defects of the existing system are in the highest degree both dangerous and demoralizing. The impunity which it allows to the worst criminals is as fruitful of crime as it is pernicious to society. The only question is, how far can either or both of the proposed remedies prevent the further extension of admitted evils? We suppose no one will deny that the first element in the repression of crime is certainty of punishment. It is only when this is doubtful that crime is embraced as a profession. Make it certain that every one who forges, or robs with violence, or commits a brutal assault, shall be sooner or later apprehended, and you establish at once a powerful deterrent from assaults, robbery, and forgery. Make it certain that the culprit is as sure of being punished as he is of being arrested, and the deterrent is still stronger. Under the present regimen, there is certainty neither of detection nor of apprehension; neither of apprehension nor of punishment. A man walks home at night by a lonely road; he is knocked down and robbed; he rises and gives chase to his assailants, who have several yards' start of him. He loses sight of them round a corner, and stumbles on a policeman, to whom he relates his misfortune. While he is thus engaged, the men effect their escape. The policeman returns, makes a few inquiries, and then proceeds on his beat, leaving the men in possession of their booty. If the victim is a man of energy and persistency, and if he also is a man of observation, he does not let the matter drop. He goes to the station-house day after day, describes his assailants as nearly as he can, puts the superintendents on their track, appears before a magistrate to identify them, and finally is bound over to attend as a witness at the assizes. But not one man in twenty can afford the time to dance attendance at a station-house day after day, or dodge ruffians to their dens, or dangle about an Assize Court or the Old Bailey for a couple of days. And not one man in fifty has perception quick enough to note the form, features, and stature of men who pounce upon him under the sombre rays of a London gaslight. All this constitutes one guarantee of impunity to thieves and garotters. They have their own science of averages, if not as correct, quite as practical as that which is in vogue with the Statistical Society. Then, too, they can count on the operation of other allies beside want of perception and want of energy. A man becomes embroiled with a gang of thieves or coiners. He probably lives near them, and knows them all. He is assaulted and threatens prosecution. No policeman has witnessed the assault, therefore no policeman will help him. He has witnesses, but they are afraid of the gang, and refuse to give their testimony. He is compelled to remain inactive, and a flagrant violation of the public peace remains unquestioned and unpunished. Or it may be he has one witness. On the evidence of this one witness the offenders are punished. But from that day the life of the witness is made a burden to him. He is watched, dodged, persecuted, and harassed out of his mind. He is regarded as the agent of public justice, and is made the victim of private spite. He becomes to his friends and neighbours a frightful example of the danger of assisting the cause of law and order. All these chances and the periods of their recurrence are known to the world of rogues. They lose sight of no conjuncture likely to operate in their favour—the fears of the timid, the engagements of the busy, or the procrastination of the dilatory. All these things, as they know, make judgment most uncertain, and their calling comparatively profitable. Whatever would destroy this uncertainty would, pro tanto, impair their profits.

Two changes would do this. One is the greater alacrity and more intelligent supervision of the police. Of this we have spoken before, and will not say more now than that such a change seems to be contemplated by the Government, and will probably be realised in the appointment of four Chief Constables. The other is the appointment of a Public Prosecutor. At present, the victim of offences committed against the law of the land has, in addition, to bear the onus of vindicating it. We see the results. Either he incurs odium by his prominence as an extra-official functionary, or he is injured in his business by the strange duty cast upon him, or a sergeant of police has to take upon himself the duties of an Old Bailey attorney. Much has been said in disparagement of the conduct of criminal prosecutions by the police. With this depreciatory language, for which Old Bailey advocates are responsible, we do not agree. Considering what is the number of criminal prosecutions annually instituted, and mainly prepared by the police, at Quarter Sessions and Assizes throughout all England, we think that, on the whole, their conduct of them is admirable. Still, it is not the policeman's business to be an assistant public prosecutor. He is too much interested in the chase; he follows his game at times too keenly, and sometimes it is the wrong game. Then, if he is young, ambitious and excitable, he is under the temptation to remember things as the counsel for the prosecution wishes him to remember them; and this entails either an ignominious defeat or a dishonourable success. Again, the latitude he enjoys in preparing his cases exposes him to the temptation—or, what is equally bad, the suspicion—of abstaining from the search after the best evidence against opulent or well-to-do delinquents. We do not say that cases frequently occur of corruption, or anything like it, on the part of the police. Far from it. Their probity is, on the whole, highly laudable. Still, when large powers are left in the hands of a class of men not highly paid, their action towards wealthy offenders must be jealously watched and suspiciously interpreted. With a public prosecutor the case would be different. His parquet would be the receptacle of all evidence, and the source of all instructions. He himself would be above the possibility or the suspicion of corruption. He would scrutinize the evidence and advise on the prosecutions. His inferior agents would have the training and experience of policemen, and would be aided by the regular police. Neither the constable nor the injured person would be placed in the obnoxious position of a prosecutor. Each would be part of a comprehensive legal machinery; and it would be as impossible for the sufferer to waive giving evidence according to his own whim or caprice as it would be for the constable to concoct a case out of his inner consciousness.

Thus the means would be at once multiplied and simplified of bringing a criminal to justice. We have purposely limited our view of the Public Prosecutor's duties to the lower order of criminal cases. How useful he would be in bringing to justice the highest class of financial delinquents, we need not indicate. We speak now of his lower functions only. But though thus much were done, still, if nothing more were accomplished, much would be left undone. The great question of dealing with criminals would indeed be imperfectly solved if only their judicial trial were made more certain. What is to be the nature of their punishment? What its duration? It is tolerably well ascertained by this time that the tyro in crime is not reformed by confinement in a gaol. If young, he comes out worse than he went in, and is sure to be committed again. A second committal is notoriously the entrance to a career of crime. From the moment of his second discharge, the convict is sure to pass the remainder of his days between crime and imprisonment. His whole life is divided between getting into gaol and getting out of it. And each time he goes in, he finds willing pupils to profit by his lessons; each time he comes out, eager associates to help him in his enterprises. As years pass on he becomes, not, perhaps, a greater proficient in his profession, but more incapable of any other calling. He knows nothing else, and cares for nothing else. His mission is to prey upon society; while, in its turn, society considers its mission to be sending him back to confinement and hard labour. So the two alternate between the repetition of continued wrongs and useless penalties. Why is this? Simply because it is the principle of English jurisprudence to blind itself to the faults of the most notorious offenders. It is like a prim but good-natured spinster who will not believe in any naughty deed which she has not seen done herself. It measures the guilt of a culprit exactly by the term of his imprisonment. If he is sentenced to five years' imprisonment, it looks on him as guilty during that period, but not one moment beyond it. He comes out as guileless and lamblike in the eyes of British law as he was before he was ever arraigned. He issues out of gaol like the rising sun, to run his bright career again. A neighbour who taunts him and a policeman who watches him are liable to an action and a censure respectively. Of conditions so favourable as these the hero of a score of burglaries is not slow to take advantage. The touching confidence of the law is repaid by conduct which is more largely flavoured with a coarse self-interest than with a refined gratitude, but which the public is beginning to recognise as both impudent and vexatious. Putting aside the not inconsiderable number of persons whose precarious subsistence depends on their dexterity in conveying the property of others, the world is awakening to the conviction that the blindness of English law is both stupid and inconvenient. It asks why people who are notoriously criminal should habitually be presumed to be innocent, and why the dens of land-pirates should be deemed sacred against the visitations of the police? The difficulty now is not how to scheme a fitting remedy, but how to regulate the application of the remedy. The Irish system of licenses is quoted as a success, the English ticket-of-leave system is notoriously a failure. We confess that we suspect the Irish system is not quite so successful as it is represented to be. Probably many of the Irish ex-convicts leave Ireland on the expiration of their penal terms, and recommence their careers in England. Else why should two systems so nearly alike bear such different fruits? The subject of penal servitude in England goes through the process of separation, of assigned labour, of marks for good conduct, and of abbreviated imprisonment, the same as in Ireland; but the directors of Irish prisons can only speak of their system and its results in terms of praise, while the ex-convict in England is the bugbear both of the reformers and the administrators of the criminal law. What is wanted for the man who has been twice or thrice convicted of felony is to place such a guard over him as should be placed over any man who has irrepressible tendencies to drunkenness or any other vice.

There are many men with such a weak moral fibre that only the consciousness of being watched and looked after will keep them out of vice or crime. They would, in truth, be best off if they could be shut up for the rest of their days. But then the public is hardly prepared for this sort of treatment. It offends equally against the popular notions of justice and of economy. A city of prisons and an army of warders would be required for the proper execution of such a plan. The next remedy is a system of long sentences, capable of curtailment according to the good conduct of the prisoners. But this opens out a vista of prison dodges, clever hypocrisies and chaplains' delusions, with which we are all too familiar already. At present we see no better check on the hardened offender than vigilant surveillance by the police. His haunts and the house in which he lives should be subject to domiciliary visits by the police; and any man known to be the landlord of houses occupied by criminals, or habitually trafficking with thieves, should be liable to be perpetually visited and examined. This is a novel and unconstitutional, but not an unreasonable, prescription. The evil which it is intended to check is gross, growing, and formidable. The principle which it offends is a principle which cannot be admitted on behalf of men whose every known action favours the presumption of their criminality. In the hands of raw and ignorant constables such power might be abused; but by men of courage, intelligence, and probity—men of the type of Serjeant Mason, for example—it could be used only for the public good. Neither do we see why the most deterrent of punishments, flogging, should be forborne in the case of those who live on the fears and property of others. If some stringent measures are not adopted soon, the rogues and ruffians of London will have the metropolis at their mercy.

We cannot, at the same time, abstain from pointing out that society is itself in part responsible for the multiplication of rogues and robbers. It has, by its ill-judged almsgiving, pampered mendicancy until it has sapped the self-respect of the poor. When that is gone, the road to crime becomes easy and smooth. There are two millions sterling annually expended, more or less wastefully, by charitable institutions in London, besides thousands more flung prodigally at every impostor who lugs a wretched half-naked child after him, and then people wonder that so many of the poor turn with disgust from a life of honest industry. Every professional beggar is a possible thief. So long as indiscriminate almsgiving continues, so long will there be a rich crop of beggars, patterers, thieves, burglars, and garotters.

A UNIVERSAL COINAGE.

MR. BAGEHOT has reprinted as a pamphlet the criticisms which appeared in the Economist on the Report of the last International Coinage Commission. There is little to be said against these papers, except that Mr. Bagehot has himself an apparent craze for one form of internationalization of coins, and is wholly unable to see that the arguments by which he annihilates his rivals are almost equally applicable to himself.

If ever a subject was thoroughly discussed, that of the coinage may be said to have been fairly sifted to the bottom. We have had Commissions and Committees without number, to inquire sometimes into the propriety of decimalizing our weights and measures alone, at others into the advisableness of introducing decimal coins. Other inquiries have included both these objects, and, whatever else may be supposed to have remained open, the following conclusions are established beyond all reasonable doubt:—1. That any change in the pound as our unit of account and coinage is inadmissible. 2. That to decimalize coins alone, or weights and measures alone, would be infinitely inconvenient in the doing, and when done would leave us worse off than before. 3. That no satisfactory plan has yet been suggested for decimalizing coins, weights, and measures together, and that the adoption of the French system en bloc is not to be recommended. This last is the clear result of the evidence taken before Mr. Ewart's Committee, although the witnesses invited to attend were carefully selected from the known friends of decimalization, to the exclusion of its principal opponents.

It may be wondered that after this a fresh Commission should have been issued on the subject of the coinage. And yet there really was a reason for it. Some Englishmen had been sent to watch, rather than to take part in, the proceedings of an International Conference held with a view to monetary unification throughout the world. That Conference had suggested that the end might be somewhat promoted by a small change in the value of our sovereign, so as to make it equal to 25 francs, instead of 25·20, which is the actual par of exchange. Civility required an answer from our Government, and, before an answer could be sent, the judgment of a Commission was very properly sought for. The Commission, though overloaded with avowed decimalists, contained strong names both in the world of science and the world of commerce; and, except that one member adds rather a singular qualification to his assent, all agree in saying that the proposed change in the sovereign is not to be thought of, and that, if any approximation is to take place between our coinage and that of France and some other countries, it must be by a change in the value, not of our pound, but of their franc. This disposes of the immediate question, but the Report of the Commission deals (somewhat cautiously indeed) with many other points connected with the coinage, the great majority of which had been long since disposed of, substantially in the same sense, by one of the most exhaustive inquiries ever conducted—that of Lord Overstone's Coinage Commission.

A multitude of questions arose. What is the good of an international coinage when you have got it? How far must assimilation be carried before the benefit is reaped? Can this be done on our part, or must the change be made abroad, or partly here and partly in other countries? These and other cognate inquiries are more or less adequately answered by the Report of the Commission and the evidence which accompanies it. There is little to be found which has not been said and printed and circulated at the public expense many times before, and on several points the Report abstains from pronouncing final judgment, and merely sums up the arguments on one side or the other. Except, therefore, on the primary question submitted to it—of changing the pound—to which an unequivocal answer is given in the negative, the Report, though interesting, is no very important addition to the already cumbrous literature of the subject; though on the questions we have specially referred to it serves, in conjunction with the evidence and index, as a convenient guide to the various sound theories and wild fallacies which have so long been afloat.

And first let us try to find out what is the use of an international coinage when you have got it. If France and England had precisely the same coins passing in both countries, an English traveller, on his first arrival in France, would be saved the trouble of going to the bureau attached to his hotel, or elsewhere, to get his sovereigns exchanged for napoleons and francs, and he would escape the uneasy and unfounded suspicion, often entertained, that he was not getting his full tale of centimes according to the exchange of the day. This would be a convenience to the traveller, though a rather slight one, and the same minute benefit would accrue to the Frenchman arriving in England. A further advantage would be felt by a small proportion of Englishmen during the whole period of their residence in France. Those who were intelligent enough to learn to make purchases and calculate in francs and centimes—a habit which (as has often been stated in evidence) our navvies in France generally acquire in a week or two—would, of course, be just as comfortable as if they had carried their own national system of coinage with them, together with their usual store of national prejudices. But it is no doubt just conceivable that some Englishmen might be dull enough not to be able to understand francs and centimes; and an international coinage would, therefore, be a great relief to these exceptionally stupid travellers, not only on their first entrance into a foreign country, but during their whole stay. Perhaps most people will agree that this extreme of dulness is seldom reached, and need not be taken into account; and if so, the remaining benefit would be that which we first mentioned—the saving of the little transaction of exchange at the outset of a foreign journey.

Neither in the Report nor in the evidence can we find a trace of any other advantage which would result from an assimilation of the coinage of two neighbouring countries. We speak, of course, of the benefit to result from identity of coinage per se, irrespectively of the question (which we are not considering now) whether this or that system may or may not be worth adopting for its intrinsic merits. We are speaking also, as the Commission was, of the good of international coinage merely, and not of that very different matter, the facilities to be obtained if international coinage were accompanied by identical systems of account, and identical weights and measures; and, thus limiting the subject, we repeat that an international coinage, if established down to the smallest coin, would confer only the insignificant advantage which we have referred to. And in saying this we are saying precisely what the Commission say, although they put it rather more tenderly to those who advocate the craze. After enumerating a variety of advantages anticipated by some of the witnesses from an international coinage, the Report goes on thus:—

> It must be observed however that the evidence of the witnesses as regards the manufactures and trades of the country points to an uniform system of international currency, not only of coins, but of monies of account, and, indeed, to an uniformity of weights and measures. Unless this uniformity is effected, the object mainly sought for by the witnesses connected with the manufacturing interests—i.e. that of enabling them readily to calculate and compare prices, and to make out invoices and commercial statements—would not be attained; nor would that of conveying readily the minute details of statistical information.

The conclusion thus stated, indeed, is obvious enough, except to a few fanatical worshippers of everything that calls itself international. Some of these gentlemen seem to have thought that, if the coins of France and England were the same, an English price-current, quoting at so much per gallon or cwt., would be forthwith intelligible to a Frenchman who never heard of those insular measures and weights. This of course is absurd, even on the supposition that we changed not only our coins, but our system of account, and took to quoting in francs and centimes instead of pounds, shillings, and pence; and we need scarcely say that this has not yet been suggested, even by those who propose a partial assimilation of coins. If it were desired to establish a common international language, no one would think he had done much by making the verbs in two languages identical if the nouns and adjectives remained distinct. The language of commerce deals with money, weights, and measures, and an agreement in one only of these elements would tend quite as little to mutual comprehension.

Another craze of some commercial witnesses who ought to have known better was that, if the coins of two countries were the same, all fluctuations of exchange would be got rid of. Nothing of the sort would happen. At present the par of exchange between France and England is this—that the pound sterling is worth 25·20 francs; but if a Frenchman owes 100*l.* payable in London, there is scarcely one day in the year when he could pay it with 2,520 francs, neither more nor less, laid out in Paris. Sometimes gold is more in request in London than in Paris, at other times less so; and the money-dealers, whenever the difference is sufficient to pay the cost of transmission and leave a profit, make it their business to ship gold from one country to the other. The Frenchman who wants to pay 100*l.* in London goes to one of these money-dealers, and asks at what price the money-dealer will undertake to pay his debt of 100*l.* in London. The money-dealer has got the necessary funds in the hands of an agent in London, and at the moment we will suppose 100*l.* is worth more to him in Paris than in London; and to save himself the cost of bringing it over, he will undertake to pay the 100*l.* in London for a sum in Paris worth a little less than 100*l.* Accordingly he demands, not 2,520 francs, but perhaps 2,510, or some smaller sum. In like manner, if the flow of bullion is the other way, he charges a little more than the par. This is the actual operation, though it is generally effected by means of the purchase of a bill of exchange. These are the fluctuations of exchange, and it is obvious that they would be just the same if the sovereign were reduced in value to 25·00 francs from its present value of 25·20. Exchange transactions would remain, therefore, even though international coinage were established. Some of the advocates of international coinage saw this, and admitted it, but then they added an ingenious suggestion. "True," they said, "the transaction with the money-dealer would be of the same kind, and subject to the quotation of the day just as it now is; but then 25·00 is an easier number to multiply than 25·20, and there would be a little less trouble in doing the necessary sum." That is true for what it is worth, and it is not worth much. Another man of business had the boldness to add this other plea—"I admit that if I make remittances abroad through a money-dealer or broker, by buying a bill in the usual way, international coinage will be of no help to me; but if I do the money-dealer's business myself, and employ a messenger to carry the gold across the Channel, the same sum in English coins will always pay the same sum in France, and so I shall escape the operation of exchange." That, again, is quite true, but then nobody would ever do it, because there are plenty of money-dealers who are competing with one another, and by competition keeping their charges down, and who are transmitting coin on a large scale in the cheapest possible way; and no messenger would carry a specific sum across unless he was paid for doing it, at a rate far beyond the minute percentage of profit which the money-dealers make. The convenience therefore is one that no one would ever enjoy, unless perhaps under some very unusual circumstances that might occur to one man in a million once in ten years. The traveller, therefore, alone would benefit, and the little convenience to be obtained from an international coinage, even by the traveller on his first arrival, would be almost neutralized if the small-change as well as the sovereign were not made identical, and this has not been suggested. The only thing proposed was to reduce the value of the pound by 2*d.*, so as to make it equal at par to 25 francs.

Substantially, therefore, the answer to our three questions must be:—1. International coinage by itself is of no appreciable good even when carried down to the minutest detail of the coinage, and extended to our systems of account. 2. To derive any benefit from it we must have identical weights and measures as well as identical coins. 3. This comprehensive change, and indeed any tampering whatever with the pound sterling, being inadmissible, the international coinage, if it ever comes, must be attained by modifications of foreign systems, and not of ours.

Probably (and reasonably too) other countries will insist that, if there is to be a change, they cannot submit to the inconvenience of making it; and the International Coinage Convention must, we think, come to nothing except as between those countries where the French system was introduced by force of arms, and where it has already established itself in the habits of the people.

Before leaving the subject we may notice a singular delusion, which has led one of the Commissioners, Mr. J. B. Smith, to differ from his colleagues. A gold coin of 25 francs, if struck in France, would of course contain one-fourth more gold than a napoleon, and this would come to 112 grains, omitting small decimals. Our sovereign contains 113 grains, and the project is to make it one grain lighter. The Commissioners have pointed out very carefully the enormous disturbance which this apparently small change of 2*d.* in the pound would make, and have rejected it on that account. To this Mr. Smith replies—"True, the value of the sovereign must be kept up; but instead of coining for nothing, as you do now, and giving a sovereign of 113 grains to every one who brings 113 grains of Australian gold, you may say that you will keep one grain as mintage for the trouble and cost of coining, and give him only a sovereign of 112 grains. If this were done," says Mr. Smith, "the sovereign, though a grain lighter, would still buy in the market 113 grains of gold-dust, and would have the same current value which it has now, and all the disturbance apprehended of accounts between debtors and creditors would be escaped." That is quite true, but then you would not have an international coin. Your sovereign of 112 grains would be worth, in gold-dust or in any other commodity of the market, exactly what it is now, and it would buy, not 25 French francs, but 25·20, which is the existing par. Mr. Smith, notwithstanding a very pointed hint given him by Sir John Lubbock, has failed to see that you can't alter the value of a sovereign and keep it unaltered at the same time. As his French friends would tell him, a door must be either open or shut.

IRISH CHURCH PROPERTY.

THE Irish Church Commissioners stated in their Report that the annual net revenues of that Church amount to about 584,000*l.*, of which about 364,000*l.* arises from tithe rent-charge, about 204,000*l.* from rents received from lands, and the residue from Government stock or other sources. Of these revenues a considerable portion, amounting to 113,000*l.* a year, is administered for Church purposes by the central Board of Ecclesiastical Commissioners. About 19,000*l.* a year belongs to the capitular bodies, and is applied by them for the maintenance of the cathedral fabrics and services. The residue supplies the endowments of the bishops, dignitaries, and beneficed clergy. This statement of the revenues of the Irish Church excludes the value of houses of residence and lands in the occupation of ecclesiastical persons; and if a moderate sum be added on this account, the value of the property enjoyed by the Irish Church would exceed the current estimate of 600,000*l.* a year. The property of the Church has been derived from various sources before and since the Reformation. With respect to property acquired after the Reformation, from Royal or Parliamentary grants, or from the gift of private persons, the Commissioners have inserted in an appendix to their Report such particulars as were conveniently accessible. This appendix has been only lately published, and it supplies information which may be useful in discussion of the details of any measure for the disendowment of the Irish Church.

Of the lands which yield to the Irish Church, as has been stated, an income of 204,000*l.* a year, the greater part, producing about 142,000*l.* a year, belongs to the Bishops, the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, the Corporations aggregate, and the dignitaries of the cathedrals. The remainder, of which the value is about 62,000*l.* a year, belongs to the parochial clergy. The income arising from the lands of the clergy, although they are generally let at moderate rents, may be considered to represent the improved value. But as to all the other lands of the Church, the income received by the ecclesiastical landlord bears a small proportion to the value. As regards all the lands held by the Church, and particularly as regards those held by the parochial clergy, it may become important to ascertain the times and circumstances under which they were acquired. Some were given by private persons; but the greater part were given by the Crown after the Reformation, and they were for the most part given in those districts of Ireland which, as we know from ordinary history, were selected for Protestant colonization. If we compare the two northern provinces of Armagh and Tuam with the two southern provinces of Dublin and Cashel, we shall find, as might be expected, that out of 62,000*l.*, which is the total annual net value of lands held by parochial clergy, or glebe-lands as they are usually called, 53,000*l.* belongs to the north, while only 9,000*l.* belongs to the south. And if we look at particular dioceses, we shall find in Armagh glebe-lands worth 12,000*l.* a year, in Derry glebe-lands worth 10,000*l.* a year, and in Kilmore glebe-lands worth upwards of 9,000*l.* a year; which, again, is just what history would lead us to anticipate. Having got thus far in our investigation, it becomes desirable to know how much of these glebe-lands were given by the Crown, and how much, if any, by private individuals; and this question, so far as we can discover, has not been directly answered by the Commissioners, although they give extracts from records of grants by the Crown, which are applicable to a large part of the glebe-lands. These extracts are prefaced by an explanation of the various words, signifying different divisions of land, which occur in them. In our own extracts we shall avoid such words altogether; but, in order to convey a notion of the learning which we could show if we chose, we will just mention that, in Cavan, there was used a division of land called a poll or pole, sixteen of which constituted a ballybet. "Each poll contained two gallons, each gallon two pottles, descending even to a subdivision called pints." We are not aware that any allusion was intended by these words to the watery character of the soil; and if they sound in our ears ridiculous, we must remember that the ordinary Irishman kept up the dignity of his patrimonial estate, even if it consisted of only a single acre, by calling it his "country."

In the diocese of Armagh we find Royal grants of glebe-lands of the fourth year of King Charles I., pursuant to the instructions of the late King James I., and to certain articles of 1623, entitled "Orders and directions concerning the state of the Church in Ireland and the possessions thereof, free schools and other endowments, lands given to charitable uses, and other things tending to the advancement of true religion and maintenance of the clergy." The instructions of King James I. for the Plantation of Ulster direct the Commissioners therein named to limit and bound out the precincts of parishes, and to assign to the incumbent of each parish a glebe after the rate of threescore acres for every thousand acres within the parishes, in the most convenient places or nearest to the churches. The grants of glebe-lands in the diocese of Armagh are twenty-nine in number. The first in order is "To John Symonds, Rector of Armagh, three-fifths of the ballibue of Drombybegg, &c." If we turn to the schedules of the Report we shall find that the glebe-lands of the rectory of Armagh contain 359 acres, statute measure, and yield a gross annual rental of 363*l.* The gross amount of the tithe rent-charge for the same parish is 971*l.*, and the church population is 3,438. Another grant is to "Roger Blythe, Rector or Vicar of Termonmagourke," in the county of Tyrone, of lands which appear by the Report to contain 2,006 acres, of the gross annual value of 721*l.* The record of these grants proceeds to state that all these lands "were lately assigned by the Commissioners for the plantation of Ulster, for the augmentation of glebes, and the maintenance of persons having cure of souls;" and they are to be held for ever in free, pure, and perpetual alms, with a covenant by the grantees for the building of glebe-houses. It appears, therefore, that in twenty-nine benefices in the diocese of Armagh, glebe-lands of large extent and considerable value were granted by the Crown to the incumbents in the fourth year of King Charles I. It is not expressly stated in the Report, but must necessarily be inferred, that these grants comprised all the glebe-lands now belonging to these twenty-nine benefices. The total number of benefices in the province of Armagh is 105, so that upwards of one-fourth of the incumbents of that province hold glebe-lands under Royal grants made since the Reformation. In the diocese of Meath we find grants of the fourteenth year of King Charles I. of glebe-lands to the incumbents of twelve parishes. The deed of grant sets forth in a preamble the reasons thereof in language which may deserve attention. The deed recites that, amongst other imperial cases in which the royal solicitude is continually engaged to spread and establish religion and a sincere pursuit of the Divine name, through all the confines of the realm, is pre-eminent; and this can be done better in no other way than by providing that the ministers and preachers of God's Word, who are continually labouring in the Lord's vineyard under a limited supply of necessaries, should be supported and sustained, without which it is easy to see the decay of religion itself in future. And the deed further recites that the King's most beloved father, the late King James, of happy memory, seeing the tenuity and poverty of the ecclesiastical benefices within his late plantations in the King and Queen's County and Westmeath in his kingdom of Ireland, of his special grace in favour of Holy Church, and that fit and learned pastors and preachers of God's word should be the more readily invited to undertake the care of the said churches, determined to endow the same with an augmentation of certain glebe-lands in the said county. The grant purports to be made in fulfilment of the intention of King James I., with the advice and consent of the Lord Deputy, Thomas Viscount Wentworth, and for the glory of God, and increase of divine worship. In the diocese of Derry we find grants of the second year of King Charles I. of glebe-lands to the incumbents of eleven parishes. In one of these parishes, Ardstraw, the glebe-land comprises 1,040 acres of the gross annual value of 641*l.* In another, Cappagh, the extent of the glebe-land is 1,572 acres, and its annual value 647*l.* In the diocese of Raphoe we find grants of the second year of King Charles I. of glebe-lands to the incumbents of twenty-five parishes. In the diocese of Kilmore we find grants of the same year of glebe-lands to the incumbents of twenty-seven parishes. In other dioceses we find similar grants of the same King.

In addition to these grants from the Crown directly to the clergy, we find a list of "grants of glebes included in patents granting lands to laymen in the reign of King James I." There is an Act of Parliament of the 18th year of King Charles I. which enacts generally, that the lands set out for glebes shall be vested in the incumbents and their successors, and letters patent thereof are to be passed to them "in like manner as is directed in the cases of adventurers and soldiers, and to be of like effect." By another Act of about the same time, all impropriations or appropriate tithes forfeited to the King are settled upon the incumbents of the parishes wherein the same exist or arise. We find intermixed with the grants to incumbents which have been quoted, grants of tithes and lands to the bishops of the dioceses. The total annual revenue derived by the bishops from lands is shown by the Report to be about 73,000*l.* It would be impossible to distinguish how much of this revenue is derived from lands which were the subject of the Royal grants set forth in the appendix. But a paper by Mr. Shirley, one of the Commissioners, shows that these grants must have dealt with a larger extent of lands. He quotes from a manuscript account of the northern bishoprics, written before 1609, which states that the whole estate of the three bishoprics of Derry, Raphoe, and Clogher, together with all the lands belonging to the Primate of Armagh, and the lands belonging to the bishopric of Kilmore, are all carried away from the Church, and are now in the King's hands or of his patentees. The manuscript then proceeds to recommend that these lands should be restored to the bishoprics, and this was afterwards done. "Hence," writes Mr. Shirley, "it may be said that the endowments of the Church, so far at least as the northern bishoprics are concerned, date only from a period long subsequent to the Reformation." There are, as we have seen, other lands in the hands of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, the corporations, and the dignitaries of the cathedrals. We have no information as to the times and circumstances of the gifts of these lands to the Church. The property of the Church in Ireland may conveniently be divided into four principal heads or classes—namely,

(1.) The tithe rent-charge, amounting, as has been stated, to about 364,000*l.* a year.

(2.) Lands belonging to bishoprics, corporations, or cathedral dignitaries, or in the hands of the Ecclesiastical Commission, of the annual value of about 142,000*l.*

(3.) Glebe lands of the parochial clergy, of the annual value of about 62,000*l.*, a great part of which was granted to the clergy by the Crown, after the Reformation, in pursuance of a scheme of Protestant colonization.

(4.) Endowments, or annual contributions from private funds. A list of these endowments or contributions, so far as known to the Commissioners, shows endowments to the total amount of 132,000*l.*, and annual contributions derived from other sources than these endowments to the total amount of about 7,000*l.*

When the Legislature comes to deal with the property of the Irish Church, it will have no difficulty as to classes 1 and 4. But embarrassing questions may arise as regards classes 2 and 3.

THWAITES'S FOLLY.

LORD ELCHO'S interference last night was well timed to remind the various officials—Boards, lawyers, surveyors, and amateur surveyors—who have through the vacation been fighting so briskly the war of the Thames Embankment, that the question, however interesting to themselves, is after all one on which the public will have the last word. As yet the fight has been amusing enough, and the ordinary reader has looked quietly on at the game of check and counter-check which has turned a great public improvement into a mere chaos of blundering and jobbery. But it is possible that amusement may be pushed too far. While we are laughing, the Board of Works is doing; and the tale of what it is doing, as Mr. Layard has recently explained it, is a very amazing tale indeed. When a high official "supposes," from its reckless improvidence, that an Act dealing with the finest site in London "must have been passed in the small hours of the night," when he denounces the project which the Act contains as "monstrous" and "unjustifiable," as "a scheme which would spoil at once and for ever one of the finest sites in the world," it is time to look about one. It is of no use relying on Mr. Layard, for, unluckily, these brave words have a very tame ending. "Government," Sir John Thwaites is good enough to tell us, "has no control over this Board," and the Chief Commissioner of Public Works can only go on to express the pleasure he will have in communicating with the autocrats of Spring Gardens, and using "what personal influence he can" in inducing it to hold its hand for the present. Luckily there is a force to which even hectoring Thwaiteses have in the long run to bow, and that is the force of public opinion. If it be true that Government can exercise no control over the insane blunderings of the Board of Works, the public must take at any rate one question out of the hands of peers and Boards and Chief Commissioners, and that question is whether the Thames Embankment shall be a disgrace to London or not.

We do not in the least doubt about the answer which public opinion will give to this question, nor, in spite of Sir John Thwaites's tall talk, have we much fear of any very desperate resistance on the part of the middle-aged and respectable vestrymen over whom "the Government has no control." But the history of the whole matter is of sufficient interest to tempt us to a little detail. Our interest has hitherto been chiefly drawn to the portion of the Embankment which lies eastward of Somerset House, and in the brisk engagement about the site of the Law Courts the existence of the far larger space which extends from Waterloo Bridge to Charing Cross has been almost forgotten. When cleared, however, as it soon will be, of the tumble-down buildings south of the Savoy, the space between the Adelphi and the river will afford by far the finest site which the Embankment in its whole length presents. It is this particular space which the Board of Works propose to doom at once to utter uselessness and to absolute ugliness. There is a grandeur of absurdity about such a doom which is only equalled by the simplicity of the means by which the end is to be accomplished. The site is to be bisected by a huge viaduct from the Embankment at Charing Cross to an outlet in Lancaster Place, in Wellington Street—a road which will not only run diagonally across the whole space, but, by a singular refinement of ugliness, will rise gradually from the one extremity to the other. It is, of course, only by slow degrees that this perfect absurdity has been arrived at. The first step was what Mr. Layard has ventured to call "a mere assumption" on the part of the Board of Works that the traffic between the Strand and the Embankment, when completed, will be so large as to require additional means of access. It might be as well, he very naturally suggests, to wait till such a necessity is proved before making provision for it; but even granting the assumption, a glance at the map would suggest that supplementary outlets are already in existence. On either side of the great block of the Adelphi streets run down towards the river, and the difficulties of levels and gradients are in some cases certainly not insuperable. Even the Board seem to have been struck with so obvious a fact as this, and, if we understand their official advocate, Mr. Newton, aright, they had included some such arrangement in their Bill as originally laid before Parliament. As to the actual parentage of this remarkable measure, we can hardly wonder that there seems to be some little dispute. "A more improvident Act was never passed," says Mr. Layard. "It was passed by the Government of 1862," retorts Mr. Newton, "of which Mr. Layard was a member." Whether Mr. Layard was then too busy with the Grand Turk, or whether, as he supposes, the Bill stole through "in the small hours of the night," certain it is that, whatever the merits or demerits of its previous schemes, all the Board gained by its struggle for free traffic was a bill of some three hundred pounds for costs.

It was from this defeat that the wonderful scheme for diagonal viaduct, to which the whole site should be sacrificed, took its rise. In schoolboy phrase, the Board took its pinch, and "passed it on" to the public. But, wonderful as it is, the first draft of the scheme was more wonderful still. The viaduct was to have passed directly to the corner of Wellington Street, sweeping away a corner of the burial-ground of the Savoy Chapel ere it reached the Strand, and burying the Chapel itself beneath this shapeless mass of earth. Here, however, the first growl of public remonstrance greeted their efforts. What the Savoy had been, what a memorable relic of the past its little chapel is, what historical associations still carry the feet of many a scholar to the dull little quadrangle and the quiet little churchyard which they proposed to mutilate, the retired grocers of the Board of Works can hardly, perhaps, be expected to know. To many, indeed, who have not wholly lost the past in the present, this project of the Board may acquire a new interest in first revealing to them the actual existence of the Savoy. There, however, it is, a mere stone's-throw from the bustle of the Strand, still recalling in its very name the memories of that great struggle for English freedom in which success was only made possible by the utter alienation of the Crown from national feeling, and the subjection of the actual Government to foreigners like Peter of Savoy. In the history of our social emancipation it holds a yet more remarkable place. When our historians condescend to pass from their battles and their Parliaments, and to trace the history of the people, they will find the first revelation of English democracy in that great rising of the peasantry which is now known only in its treacherous suppression by Richard the Second. The burning of the Savoy was the sign of the first popular victory, and the ruined Palace of the Duke of Lancaster shrank into a hospital and a chapel. The hospital went with the frauds of the Reformation; the chapel remains, still a Royal one, and attached, as in John of Gaunt's time, to the Duchy of Lancaster; while by its side another Royal chapel has arisen—the German Chapel, as it is called—in itself an historical monument of the highest interest, if only as marking, what hardly any other relic of the past does mark, the accession of a German house to the throne of England. To sweep this last monument away, and to pitch a huge mound against the very side of its fellow, required a certain audacity of tastelessness and ignorance which we may perhaps venture to style the "note" of the British vestryman.

The growl, however, of the public, backed by the interference of the Crown, had no sooner warned the Board off the sacred soil of the Savoy, than the viaduct found a new issue in Lancaster Place. As a mere outlet, none could possibly be worse, for the traffic of Wellington Street already forms a troublesome obstacle to the general traffic of the Strand; but this is the least of the objections to the scheme of such a viaduct. Its first result, as we have said, would be to reduce to absolute uselessness the whole of the valuable space between the two bridges that we gain by the Embankment. The ground to the north of it—and the value of such ground must be remembered—must remain to the end of time, should this scheme be carried out, a mere deep sunk hole between the Ebal and Gerizin of the viaduct and the Adelphi. Nor could any great public edifice, any line of stately buildings, any expanse of formal terraced garden, be placed in the narrow strip of ground which would be left between the viaduct and the front of the Embankment. In other words, if we adopt Mr. White's valuation of the site, some 300,000*l.* are to be recklessly flung into a ditch. The second result is one which, if less intelligible to the autocrats of Spring Gardens, is of even greater interest to the public. It is that this viaduct will for ever set on the Embankment the seal of absolute and irretrievable ugliness. Nowhere are large and lofty buildings more needed than here, where they might screen from observation the shapeless mass of the Charing Cross Railway-station, and nowhere would such buildings find a finer sight for their display than in the graceful curve of the river front. Not only, however, is their erection to be rendered impossible, not only is the railway-station to be for ever left open to the gaze of an admiring world, but the very curve of the river itself is to be cut across by the diagonal line of the viaduct; and as if this were not enough for human eyes, the huge earthen mound on which it is carried is to rise gradually from the level of the Embankment to the level of Waterloo Bridge. With such an abomination as this in prospect human patience breaks down. We do not wonder that the remonstrance of Lord Elcho and of the deputation which he introduced found quick sympathy from Mr. Layard. There can be no question as to the new Commissioner's love of art, and whether or not we agree with his artistic hope, that the Law Courts may find their way to the river-side, and be continued in "one of the finest series of edifices in the world," we can have little hesitation in echoing his verdict on this barbarous viaduct. The scheme is, as he says, "monstrous." No doubt anything is better than Baron Haussmann and a toll on metropolitan cabbages. It is a great thing to live in a country where the site of what must be the first of our public buildings, the new Law Courts, dwindles into a controversy about easy levels for gouty lawyers, and where a Minister "supposes" that an Act which he characterizes as monstrous and unjustifiable must have been passed "in the small hours of the night." We are not indifferent to privileges such as these, but not even our gratitude for the possession of a Thwaites can make us swallow his viaduct. The question, as we have said, is whether the Embankment, for which we have paid so many millions, shall be a disgrace to London or not, and about the answer to such a question we can entertain very little doubt.

GUSTAVE DORÉ.

THIS "Proteus of Paris" has been seeking of late to obtain for his genius some local habitation in London. Last year two Exhibitions were set apart for the astounding products of Gustave Doré's pencil; and already this year the "Triumph of Christianity" and other works, each remarkable of its kind, have renewed a sensation which the painter seeks, and which the public runs after. The trade in goods of this description succeeds so well that a whole cargo of some of the largest canvasses ever seen off the stage will probably be imported into England shortly. At any rate there seems reason to hope that measures will be taken to secure to London an Exhibition which shall be fully representative of the painter's great and varied powers. We are told by an ardent admirer that Doré's "studios, situated in various parts of Paris," "are simultaneously supplied with new pictures"; that "their walls are literally covered as if by magic with some of the most gigantic productions of our time, with paintings of every style and manner, vivid illustrations of Doré's versatility and unequalled artistic powers," &c. &c. This short specimen of rapturous rodomontade may suffice to indicate that Paris will find little difficulty in sparing some few surplus samples for London. Indeed, it would seem quite within the range of possibility that the time may come when most of the great capitals, both in the old world and the new hemisphere, shall rejoice in a special Doré Exhibition. We learn that New York already enjoys the privilege.

The "Triumph of Christianity," exhibited in London this year for a second time, may as a tour de force be taken as the measure of Doré's genius. The whole thing is tremendous; unless seen, the possibility of such a picture could not be believed. The characters here assembled are "Christ," "Angelic Spirits," "Christian Attributes," "Ministering Angels," "Gabriel," "Michael," "Hecate," "Thor," "Venus," "Cupid," "Jupiter," "Juno," "Jupiter's Eagle," "Jupiter's Crown," "Phœbus conducting the Chariot of the Sun," the "Bull Apis," "Winged Lions," and the bird "Ibis." A composition which begins with Christ and ends with the bird Ibis is likely to be somewhat heterogeneous and hybrid. As for the "Bull Apis," he may be taken as symbolic of the presumptuous person who rushed in where angels feared to tread. But to demand reverence would obviously be foreign to the whole affair. It were evidently beside the mark to object, in a composition got up as gorgeously as a Christmas extravaganza, that the conception of Christ has little of the divine. It is sufficient for the painter's purpose that the figure, by its stage attitude, is effective. As for the "Angelic Spirits," they may serve to recall an irreverent saying of Goethe, that if all the people get to heaven who expect to do so, the place will prove less pleasant than is usually supposed; there are certainly but few even among the "Ministering Angels" whom we should care to know upon earth, especially in any company where flaming wings cannot be worn with evening dress. Indeed, the painter's conception of angels is but poor and trite; rob the figures of wings, shields, and spears, and they would pass for something less than mortal. With considerable disappointment then we take leave of "Christian Attributes," and turn to the Pagan deities whom Christianity, in her triumph, is in the act of overthrowing. "Jupiter" appears in a kind of Charles Kean character; "Jupiter's Eagle" is like the clipped bird that a certain monarch is recorded to have carried to Boulogne when intent on conquering an empire; "Jupiter's Crown," painted in the act of falling into the mud, might find a place among the regalia at Astley's. In fact the artist evidently designs to bring Olympus, with its machinery and properties, into contempt. Yet Juno is handsome as Menken. Saturn too is a fine fellow, but the old gentleman, unless rescued forthwith, will certainly be run down by the wild horses of "the Chariot of the Sun." Poor Phœbus, seeing that the game is lost, has thrown down the reins; his upturned face of resignation gives signs of conversion to Christianity; his idea evidently is to be taken, like Elijah, straight into heaven at once, including his brass car, which certainly has seen its brightest days. The composition closes with divers monsters such as are carried about in provincial menageries. In particular the "winged lions" make pointed appeal to the sympathy of the spectator; they open their eyes and knit their brows in much amaze, scarcely knowing what it is all about, or what may come next. If this description fails in reverence, the fault is not ours; the subject is perhaps too vast to be compassed by art.

The "Triumph of Christianity" fails of religious character; the work, indeed, judged by the standard of spiritual schools, scarcely escapes irreligion. We look in vain for the purity, quietism, and humility which adorn Christian art in its best estate; we see in the style little in common with the spirit of the early Italian masters—Fra Angelico, Orcagna, Giotto, and others. Yet, if once the mind can be reconciled to the irreverence of modern religious art, this "Triumph" may win a fair share of praise. The Angel Gabriel, poised in mid air, pensive in downcast gaze, and St. Michael, sword in hand, with the swift swoop of an eagle, the wings curved as a half-bent bow ready to speed an arrow in its flight, are figures of grace and dignity. The whole conception, if mundane, is Miltonic; the grasp of thought is bold, the range through space grand. The treatment too is clever; if the types want refinement and elevation, if the drawing and execution are sometimes careless and even coarse, at any rate it is impossible to deny to the whole performance mastery and force. The artist wields a brush of singular power in the laying on of light, shade, and colour. The refulgence around the central figure is as the glory in Tintoret's "Paradise," or the golden halo which encircles the Madonna in Titian's "Assumption." Specially lovely is the colour, where light falls in silvery softness, and breaks as in opalescent spray shaded by tender blues and turquoise greens. Some of these effects are exquisite, notwithstanding the suggestion of transformation scenes lit by the lime light. Perhaps indeed the whole get-up of the picture has less of Christian sobriety and moderation than of the tinsel of Byron's Sardanapalus. The work, however, must be seen by everybody, and when once seen can never be forgotten. It will, we learn, be engraved by W. H. Simmons, to whom was entrusted Mr. Holman Hunt's "Light of the World."

The Herculean labours of this giant among painters will naturally obtain the wondering homage of the multitude. It was some years since calculated that the designs of Doré at the age of twenty-nine numbered forty-four thousand; thus, should the painter be spared to threescore and ten, his works may reach not far short of two hundred thousand. Turner's 19,000 drawings bequeathed to the nation form but a small percentage on such astounding totals, yet the National Gallery possesses one drawing for every working day in Turner's life! The incredible fecundity of the illustrious Frenchman may recall a boast made by Vasari, to the effect that such had been the progress in art that works were in his day thrown off in a single morning which would have cost earlier Italian painters good part of a lifetime to execute. Assuredly Gustave Doré may boast, like Vasari, that so rapid is the advance made by the arts in Paris, that the time has come when in a single hour designs can be struck off which would have cost Delaroche, Ary Scheffer, or Flandrin years to mature. Beyond cavil the great Gustave has earned the right to the well-known sobriquet borne by Luca Giordano—Fa Presto. We are told that Giordano, with matchless versatility, could assume the style of any master, and that such was the facility of his pencil that a few days sufficed for the completion of a vast altar-piece. But the Fa Presto of Paris may take warning from his predecessor of Naples; the practice of Giordano has been held in reprobation by posterity. One more analogy may be drawn from the decline of Italian art. The would-be sacred works of Doré recall a certain picture by Guercino which we have seen in the Gallery of Bologna:— "God the Father; a grand impromptu painting, done in a single night, and put up in the morning!"

Yet pictures which have been seen in London afford cumulative proof—if further proof were needed—that Gustave Doré has seldom if ever been surpassed for creative imagination, for bold grasp of subject, for wide range through space, for suggestive significance in colour, for grandeur in shadowy gloom. Take, for example, a highly poetic "scene from Milton's Paradise Lost." The combat between Michael and Satan is ended; night goes down on the battle-field strewn with winged bodies mutilated and gory; the sun, sinking in anger, illumines on topmost hill the white garments, the pinions, and the spears of St. Michael's victorious host. The picture, notwithstanding a certain cold brutality essentially Parisian, is eminently Miltonic. And assuredly the painter's swelling and grandiose style is more akin to Milton and Dante than in accordance with the subtle thought and simple diction of our Poet Laureate. Such a picture as that recently exhibited in London, "Merlin and Vivien," goes far to justify the opinion that the illustrations of the Idyls fail to give expression to the Saxon simplicity, the refinement and finish, of Tennyson. But Doré once more becomes himself when he approaches Dante; he is truly Michael Angelesque, even by impatience of detail and finish, in such terror-moving pictures as "Dante meeting Ugolino in the Frozen Circle." He equally rises to the height of the great argument in not a few of the sixty illustrations of "The Vision of Purgatory and Paradise" now before us in the handsome English edition published with Cary's translation. Of the brilliant Frenchman's "Bible" we abstain to speak; it is but too evident that the illustrator of the "Contes Drolatiques" has a free and easy manner which might better comport with scenes from Don Juan than with characters in Holy Writ.

The pictures of Doré are, for technical processes and art methods, worthy of observation. His drawing, when inaccurate, is not ignorant, but merely hasty; a critic once observed that his errors are but the random shots of a good marksman. His execution runs into opposites and extremes; sometimes it is blotchy, sometimes careful and close upon intention, sometimes opaque, sometimes transparent. The method of laying on colour is wisely modified according to exigencies. That the artist, however, often affects what is slovenly and ultra may be seen in a certain landscape, "Morning in the Alps," wherein paint has been so loaded upon foreground rocks that a rule measure can alone fairly appreciate the relief obtained. Thus pictures become bas-reliefs. Novel also and startling is the painter's use of light, shade, and colour, as instruments of expression. Highest lights are, as a matter of course, opposed to deepest darks, and warmest tones to coolest shades; sensation is first wrought to the uttermost and then subdued to repose. Doré has certainly, even to a fault, absolute mastery over the science of effect; the methods he uses, if clever, are tricky and altogether too obvious; thus, we repeat, his pictures have at once the merits and defects of scenes put upon the stage.

Doré as a landscape-painter has won a first position; here, at all events, he gives proof of genius, and nature serves as a wholesome safeguard. Sometimes, indeed, we have thought him greater in landscape than as a figure-painter; at any rate no living artist can throw around the drama of humanity so imposing an array of scenery; nature and man are brought into response and unity. Rivers, lakes, mountains, skies, live upon canvass with even more vividness than on the page of the poet; in fact, these imaginative backgrounds enhance what they illustrate. It were easy to object that Doré tortures nature into heroics and spasms. Still, it is a great gain to get into landscape some colouring of emotion, or even the abnormal character inseparable from eccentricity. The consequent penalty of an occasional earthquake or conflagration would seem comparatively slight to the advantages secured. Doré certainly comes as a relief to the dreary monotony of French landscape, to the hard mechanism of the German school, and to the trivial naturalism of the English. Yet the precise position which this painter—who certainly ranks among the most notorious, not to say the most distinguished, men of our times—may hereafter hold in the judgment of posterity it were premature to conjecture. We can scarcely now determine what exact place in the page of history shall be reserved for the erratic artist whose misfortune it is to follow after the great era ennobled by the classicism of Ingres, the academic dignity of Flandrin and Delaroche, and the pure spirituality of Ary Scheffer. It may remain the lasting glory of Gustave Doré that he is found to be worthy of the Second Empire.

Gustave Doré stands just now as the most startling art phenomenon in Europe; his genius at each turn changes, like colours in a kaleidescope, into something new and unexpected. The artist, still in the prime of his powers, seems to have reached the point where two roads lie before him—the one of life and truth, the other leading unto death. The fruits of coming years, either for good or for evil, must greatly depend upon whether age shall balance judgment and bring sobriety to imagination, or whether intoxication of success shall betray into more of carelessness and presumption. Henceforth the aim of Doré should be to do but little, and that little well. Seldom in the whole history of art has a painter been under responsibility more grave to resist besetting snares, and to use rare gifts with watchfulness.

THE MUSICAL PITCH.

THAT the musical pitch adhered to of late years in our theatres and concert-rooms is higher than is convenient to certain singers, tenors and sopranos in particular, and exactingly so to choristers in general, higher in fact than is at all desirable, has been frequently urged as well by others as by ourselves. In 1858 the question was taken up by the French Government, with the aid and counsel of some of the most renowned musicians, among whom were Rossini, Auber, and Meyerbeer, representing respectively Italy, France, and Germany (no one it seems represented England). The decision arrived at was that since the time of Rousseau the pitch had risen, not in France alone, but, indeed, all over Europe, more than a tone, and that it was absolutely indispensable to lower it. Whatever may be thought of the evidence brought forward by the Commissioners, and especially of that said to have been derived from the scores of "Gluck, Monsigny, and Gretry," which is really no evidence at all, such things being managed more systematically in France than in England, the inquiry led, as we have hinted, to a decision, and this decision was promptly carried out. After much serious debate, a fixed pitch was adopted, and a Report * issued by the Commissioners, explanatory of the discussion that had taken place, as well as of the result to which it had led. The "Diapason Normal," or French pitch, was then formally established by law. Shortly afterwards the question was taken up by the Council of the Society of Arts in London, who called a meeting for the purpose of considering it. This meeting was attended by a number of eminent musical professors—singers, players and conductors; but although a large majority were emphatically in favour of lowering the pitch, and what is called the German pitch was recommended for adoption by the Committee who drew up the Report, nothing ever came of it. It was just so much fruitless talk. A strong opinion had been elicited, but none heeded it. We had no Minister of State, no English Fould, to act with authority in the matter; and so it has rested till now.

Nevertheless, the testimony of three tuning-forks, of various standards, with which Messrs. Broadwood of London supplied the French Commission while the investigation was proceeding, sufficed to convince its members that the English pitch had varied more materially than any other, and was now indeed, according to the Broadwood Fork No. 3, with the exception of that used in Belgium by the band of the Guides, the highest in Europe. This fact is, we believe, acknowledged and deprecated by a large majority of our musicians. Whether the pitch has really risen a whole tone, or more than a tone, since the days of Handel cannot be satisfactorily established; but the history of our own Philharmonic Society, of which we are able to speak advisedly, shows at all events that it rose in England more than a semitone within half a century. In 1812, when the Society was first established, the still existing tuning-forks show,

* Published in the Moniteur, July, 1859.

A, on the second space of the treble clef, corresponding to $867\frac{1}{3}$ vibrations per second. Between 1812 and 1841-2 it advanced no further then to A = 868 vibrations per second; but from 1842 to 1859 it had gradually risen to A = $910\frac{3}{20}$ vibrations per second. We need scarcely remind our musical readers (those not more or less musically instructed will care little about the matter) that the pitch of a note is represented by the number of vibrations that produce it, and that the greater the number of these vibrations within a given space of time, the higher is the pitch. The pitch advocated by the Committee of Musicians, &c. at the Society of Arts in 1859 was C = 1,056 vibrations per second, which gives its true A = 880 vibrations per second, or equally tempered A = 888 vibrations per second. This, in short, is what is known as the German pitch, accepted by a congress of musicians at Stuttgart, in 1834—about one-third of a semitone higher than the Philharmonic pitch of 1812, one-fifth higher than the "Diapason Normal," and two-thirds lower than our long maintained orchestral concert-pitch, which is precisely the same as that of the Italian Opera. The German pitch was advocated by some of the vocal and instrumental professors, in preference to what is termed the "Philosophical pitch" of Sir John Herschel and the mathematicians—who would fain make C and A absolute immutable entities, whereas all musicians know that they are mere reflections of caprice and change, and this from the inevitable nature of things; it was advocated as a compromise, to meet the exigencies of certain wind instruments, and differs so immaterially from the "Diapason Normal" that it might be employed with just as much advantage—and even with more advantage, as Dr. William Pole, F.R.S., a distinguished authority, and one of the Committee who drew up the Report for the Society of Artists, suggests in a very interesting letter on the subject—inasmuch as "standard tuning-forks regulated according to its number of vibrations are on ordinary sale" in this country, where the German pitch has been to some extent made use of. At any rate, if the pitch must be lowered, which seems to be very generally admitted, there are three substitutes to choose from—the Philosophical or Mathematical pitch, which is the lowest (C = 1,024), the French pitch, or "Diapason Normal," which is the medium (C = 1,044), and the German or Stuttgart pitch, which is the highest (C = 1,056). Scientific men are unanimous in favour of the first of these, on the ground that the uncertainty of the pitch is even a worse evil than its height, and that if the change be effected, a uniform standard should be established capable more or less of universal application. Musicians, on the other hand, are divided about the "Diapason Normal" and the Stuttgart pitch, between which, however, the difference is so slight as hardly to be appreciable by the finest ear.

It is possible that the controversy which has for some weeks been raging on this question may, for a time at least, conduce rather to evil than to good. It has already given rise to a considerable amount of angry feeling in the professional world of music, and has brought out a quantity of newspaper writing, editorial and epistolary, very little of which is calculated to throw light on the subject, while much has quite the opposite tendency. But a still worse evil than either has resulted. The cry about lowering the pitch has been used by directors of societies, professors of music, vocal and instrumental, and even medical practitioners, as a means of forcing themselves into unwonted publicity. Some of these have done little to advance the cause. Mr. G. W. Martin, for example, director of a body of singers upon whom he has conferred the title of "National Choral Society," anxious to be earliest in the field, and emboldened by the recommendation of Mr. Manns, conductor of the Crystal Palace Concerts, to lower the pitch exactly a semitone, conceived the unhappy idea of acting upon that suggestion without taking into account the indispensable preliminary arrangements. He made his string instruments tune half a note lower, and let the wind instruments accommodate themselves to the alteration as best they might. The organ part was transposed, and the singers, chorus and principals, followed suit. Under these conditions two oratorios—the Creation and Judas Maccabeus—were performed at Exeter Hall; and, perhaps, on the whole, more unsatisfactory performances were never listened to. Every one employed seemed ill at ease, including Mr. Martin, who had thus attempted to cut the Gordian knot. All that resulted from this very bold and equally ill-advised experiment was a general conviction among professors and amateurs that the change in contemplation—a change which we are convinced must, sooner or later, inevitably be carried out—is not the work of a moment, and cannot be effected by a wave from the Harlequin's wand of any adventurous person who may complacently regard himself as the man of the situation. That Mr. Martin is not the man of the situation was proved only the other night, when Mendelssohn's Elijah was given, and the old pitch (that is, the pitch of the present day) restored. Mr. Barnby, the performances of whose "Choir" have within the last two years attained some notoriety, did better. Before actively coming forward as a champion of the lowered pitch, he at least took some necessary precautions. Mr. Barnby has been urged on by Mr. Sims Reeves, the original instigator and most zealous promoter of the movement; and what Mr. Sims Reeves frankly and openly advocates is sure of obtaining a fair amount of public consideration. That is, not very long ago, he expressed a determination to sing at no orchestral concerts where the actual high pitch was maintained; and that the unwillingness, or at all events inability, of the Sacred Harmonic Society to comply just at present with his wish led to his withdrawal from the performances of that justly-esteemed institution, is well known to those who interest themselves in the subject. Nevertheless, we cannot but think that Mr. Barnby, in availing himself of the opportunity thus thrown in his way, would have done more wisely in announcing his concerts without any covert reference to the Sacred Harmonic Society. He is at the utmost a beginner, and, independently of considerations about pitch, has no chance of upsetting the Sacred Harmonic Society, which deserves too well of the public to be lightly set aside, and at any given period can do exactly what Mr. Barnby is doing now, by adopting the "Diapason Normal." The lowering of the pitch is merely a question of expediency, and when that is settled in the affirmative, the money required for altering old orchestral instruments and purchasing new ones will be doubtless as readily supplied by the Sacred Harmonic Society as by the wealthy music-publishing firm represented by Mr. Barnby, which has owed no little of its commercial prosperity to the oratorio concerts in Exeter Hall. Not to digress further, however, Mr. Barnby, who revived Handel's Jephtha for the occasion, adopted the "Diapason Normal," and on the whole—although the means and appliances at his disposal, with the short time allowed him for preparation (the French instruments being by no means so easy to obtain as he had anticipated), were necessarily restricted—with a tolerable amount of success. That as the oratorio went on the pitch gradually sharpened, till towards the end it was very difficult even for a practised ear to detect any material difference, is true; but such would be the case, for reasons unnecessary to state, no matter what the pitch adopted One incident in this performance (to criticize which is not our intention here) caused no little surprise. Notwithstanding the lowering of the pitch to the French adopted standard, a stipulation enforced by the eminent tenor himself, as a condition of his taking part in Mr. Barnby's Oratorio Concerts, and thus lending them the attraction of his name, Mr. Sims Reeves still transposed "Waft her, angels, to the skies" half a tone (from G to G flat), precisely as he had done at the last Handel Festival. By the way, with such touching pathos does this gentleman sing "Waft her, angels," that we earnestly wish he would restore "Hide thou thy hated beams," to which, and not to the recitative, "Deeper and deeper still," "Waft her, angels," is the sequel. None of the music which illustrates the poignant anguish of Jephtha, just as his rash vow is on the point of fulfilment, should be omitted; and no more profoundly expressive air than "Hide thou thy hated beams" exists, even in Handel. But this has nothing to do with pitch. For his next Oratorio Concert Mr. Barnby announces Elijah; and as between the first and second performances a sufficient time will have elapsed, it is to be hoped that he may come forward more thoroughly prepared, and that a fairer chance may be offered of deciding upon the expediency of adopting the "Normal Diapason."

Meanwhile scarcely a day passes without a letter or letters to the papers on the subject. Many of these come from persons of no authority, but who by the outside world may be looked upon as possessing authority in virtue of the mere fact of their communications, with signatures attached, having been admitted into print. Some few, however, comprise suggestions worth notice. For example, the letter addressed by Mr. Manns to the Daily Telegraph—after the appearance in that paper of what the Crystal Palace music-Director, with a certain air of patronage, terms a "well-intentioned article," but which, though without exhausting the subject, was an article built upon facts —enters seriously into the matter and contains valuable hints; and this was followed by another, signed "J. W." (evidently the production of an orchestral performer), equally suggestive in its way. We need not enter into the historical disquisition in which Mr. Manns endeavours to trace the rise in musical pitch to a desire expressed, two centuries back, of amalgamating the "Chor-ton" and "Kammer-ton"—in other words the pitch that obtained in churches and the pitch adopted in secular music-rooms—because that in no way concerns the present time, or even Handel's time, and therefore has nothing to do with the matter immediately under consideration. Enough that, both from the letter of Mr. Manns and that of "J. W." —the first of whom advocates the lowering of the pitch, while the last is against it—we derive the information that nothing of the sort can be effectually accomplished without money. Mr. Manns, indeed, in the last paragraph of his letter, hits the right nail on the head, and we feel justified in quoting it:—

> Would it not be possible for the many solo vocalists (on whose behalf this movement is chiefly set on foot) to assist their hard-worked and badly-paid orchestral brethren, by voluntary donations or a slight percentage on every engagement, in favour of a fund for the purchase of new instruments? Many very able instrumentalists earn little more than two or three pounds per week, and have to support their families respectably, and live and dress as gentlemen. A sudden outlay of from twenty to eighty pounds will be an impossibility to many of them. The different conductors of operas and concerts might form themselves into a committee for receiving and disposing impartially of such funds. Every flute, oboe, clarinet, and bassoon player, in connexion with the leading bands throughout England, who presented himself to this committee with an instrument of the new pitch within the next six months might through this fund be at least partly reimbursed, and thus induced to assist the movement willingly. The greatest exertion should be made to render the alteration general, as otherwise the mischief would almost be greater than the benefit to vocalists and the musical art, because the pitch would not alone differ in different orchestras, but a proper intonation would entirely be destroyed through the unavoidable mixture of new and old pitched wind instruments.

In the last sentence of the foregoing it will be seen how Mr.

Manns agrees with Dr. Pole, that uniformity of pitch is of more vital consequence than anything else—an opinion in which we heartily concur. In juxtaposition with the extract from the Crystal Palace letter we ought to place an extract from the letter of "J. W." seeing that, though relating exclusively to military bands, it equally takes into consideration the irrepressible question of quid pro quo—in plain language, of money:—

> Mr. Manns says, "Military bands would merely have to purchase flutes, oboes, E flat and A clarinets, and bassoons," to which allow me to add bass-clarinets, saxophones, and D, not E flat, clarinets. Of course Mr. Manns is aware that the Government does not supply the instruments to our military bands, but that they are purchased by the officers. Now let us see what the expense would be to the officers, if the "pitch" be reduced a semitone. There are 181 bands in the army, exclusive of militia, yeomanry, and volunteer bands—the average number of wood instruments in each band is 12; number of wood instruments required, 2,172; cost according to published lists, 17,376*l.*; deduct 25 per cent., if paid for before the expiration of six months—total, 13,032*l.* This sum is exclusive of the cost for the necessary alterations in the brass instruments. Some of our bands have more than twelve wood instruments, but I think twelve will be found to be the average number. Now, Sir, who is to pay this large sum?

We need scarcely insist that, if uniformity of pitch is considered, as it ought to be, indispensable, the military bands cannot be overlooked, inasmuch as our operatic orchestras are continually reinforced by players on wind instruments who, having attained a certain mark as performers in regiments, seek to better their position by a wider utilization of their abilities.

That the dilettante element has entered freely and unreservedly into the discussion about pitch will easily be credited. The strange things that have been said and published, however, surpass belief. Only to name a single instance—we find a writer in an evening paper (which, a week previously, contained a well written and ably reasoned article on the subject) talking after this fashion:—

> Let Herr Joachim play a fugue of Sebastian Bach's, first with the high pitch, and then with the lower pitch, before a really intelligent musical audience, in a room where violin music can be properly appreciated, and let the opinion of his audience be taken. We would go even further. With a carefully tuned pianoforte the difference between one key and another is simply one of pitch, and not one of temperament also. Let Mr. Charles Hallé, then, play the last movement in Beethoven's Waldstein Sonata, or the Adagio which concludes the Sonata, Op. 111.—to our thinking, the greatest of all slow movements—not, as they appear on paper, in the key of C, but in B flat, so that they may sound as Beethoven intended them to sound, and note the impression they will produce, compared with their effect when played up to the present high pitch.

The italics are our own. Passing over the fact that "the greatest of all slow movements" is simply an air with variations, we should like to know what the writer means by "a room where violin music can be properly appreciated," and why the difference between one key and another should be "simply one of pitch, and not of temperament also" upon "a carefully tuned pianoforte," any more than upon a pianoforte that has not been carefully tuned. But this is nothing to the recommendation to Mr. Hallé to play the last movements of two sonatas (why these two sonatas, and why the last movements of these two sonatas in particular?) in B flat, instead of in C. In the first place, they would not "sound as Beethoven intended them to sound," for the reason that Beethoven would never have written the same kind of passages in B flat as he would have written in C, the characters of the keys, wholly independently of pitch (and this our dilettanti cannot comprehend), being entirely different. And next, as for the impression which the movements specified would be calculated, thus transposed, to produce on a large mixed audience, "compared with their effect when played up to the present high pitch," we must beg leave to say that the large mixed audience, even with the author of the singular article to which we are referring among them, would be for the most part indifferent to, because ignorant of, the transposition. The same writer, among a number of other extraordinary statements, informs us that "there is not a violin solo, nor a stringed quartet, nor a duet for violin or pianoforte, written by Mozart, Beethoven, or Mendelssohn, which would not gain in purity of tone, in fulness, in richness, and, we will add without hesitation, in sweetness also, by the adoption of the pitch which the French have now agreed upon." As if we had not been hearing with delight, not merely the chamber-music, but the orchestral music of these great composers, for the last quarter of a century, more or less at the pitch which it is now thought expedient, and for reasons wholly independent of instrumental effect, to lower. Such arguments as these only tend to confuse amateur readers, and to make the initiated smile. To assert that the music of Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven sounds a bit less effective and beautiful now than when it was first written is to assert that which is not a fact. The proof lies in the high esteem in which this music is held; and as we of the actual generation have only been allowed to hear it at the pitch which has so long been maintained, the fact that its beauty and effect are wholly independent of pitch is incontestable. We must be careful not to confound the two questions. Had Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven written at the present day, and with the present pitch, they would have written precisely as they did in their own time, when the pitch was considerably lower, the characters of keys having nothing whatever to do with pitch. But this in no way prejudices the case in point. The question, as we have said, is purely a question of expediency, and concerns professors of music alone—singers, players upon instruments, composers and conductors; and while we are entirely of the opinion pronounced by Rossini, Auber, Meyerbeer, Berlioz, Halévy, Ambroise Thomas, and others, at the French Congress, of which M. Pelletier was President—"that the elevation of the diapason is due to the efforts of instrument-makers and instrumental performers, and that neither composers nor singers have had any participation in it"—as singers are most interested in depressing it, we are forced to the conclusion that singers should combine among themselves to raise the necessary fund. They are by far the best paid among those who practise the art of music for a livelihood, and would be the only substantial gainers by the change.

REVIEWS.

LONGMAN'S EDWARD III.*

(First Notice.)

BEGUN simply as a continuation of the unpretending Lectures on English History which appeared about five years ago, the Life of Edward the Third has grown into an independent work of some length and importance. Mr. Longman's two volumes afford, in fact, a very fair specimen of a class of historical literature more common in France than among ourselves—the detached "study" of a period or person viewed in greater detail than the general course of history would allow. It is obvious that studies of this kind have both advantages and disadvantages; that, if they encourage closer and more accurate research, they are specially exposed to the danger of hero-worship; that proportion is apt to be forgotten, and the greater currents of history to be lost, while intellectual and moral forces which tell only on long intervals of time are overlooked in the crowd of minor incidents which affect human action directly and at once. But, on the other hand, it is certain that memoirs and biographies and studies of this kind are the feeders of history. It is from the mass of circumstances which gather round them that the historian can alone draw his materials for the larger treatment of the fortunes of a nation. Social facts, above all, can only be revealed by minute researches into the life of individuals, and characters treated in this isolated way acquire a vividness and reality which they still retain when transferred to a broader canvass. In a word, the historian deprived of these outlying aids is like an army whose communications are cut off, and whose supplies have to be gathered on the march. The chances are in such a case that the supplies will be bad in quantity as in quality, gathered at haphazard, and insufficient when gathered. It is not too much to say that the want of preliminary studies of such a kind as this is in reality the great difficulty with which English historians have to contend. We may take as an instance the last work of any magnitude which has illustrated a great period of our history—Mr. Freeman's account of the Norman Conquest. As its readers know, it will, when completed, cover the whole space from the accession of Æthelred to the death of the Conqueror—a century of memorable events and remarkable men. But over the whole of this space Mr. Freeman moves with hardly any other help than his own personal research. No scholar has cared to tell the story of the final struggle with the Dane, or of the reign of Cnut, or of the extinction of the first foreign dynasty. When he arrives at Godwine, Mr. Freeman finds indeed the ground prepared, but it is by some old papers of his own; Harold has found no vates sacer, the Confessor is left buried in the legends of Westminster. One or two archæological papers of little or no value alone represent the literature of the great battle which decided the after fortunes of the realm. Only the sketchy chapters of Thiery tell the story of the Norman settlement; the most worthless biography in the English language, that of Mr. Roscoe, remains the one biography of the Conqueror. The case is still worse if from the outer aspects of history we pass to the inner—if we ask for memoirs on the literature, the laws, the religion of the last period of Old-English history. Dean Hook's paper on Bishop Wulstan is a solitary contribution to our knowledge of the last; the two former subjects have not even found a Dean Hook. And yet it is precisely these phases of national progress which demand the previous labour and smelting of the special inquirer; it is impossible even for industry like Mr. Freeman's to cover singly the vast field of society and intelligence through which he passes, and the result is, in one after another of our historians, the sense of something wanting—of a want of "the one thing needful," the moral and spiritual life without which history is nothing but an old almanac.

We are quite ready therefore to welcome such a special contribution to historical knowledge as Mr. Longman has made in the present work. The book has real merits—the merits at any rate of accuracy, of industry, of good sense. There is very little hero-worship about it; a certain sobriety of judgment and calmness of tone saves its author from raptures over chivalry or a vapid imitation of the picturesqueness of Froissart. An evident effort is made throughout to teach at least the social and industrial life of the people itself. But while we are quite ready to fling aside the "picturesque incidents" of the story of our childhood, we could have wished that Mr. Longman had been able to invest the facts which he details with an interest as vivid though more true. Seen through the spectacles of chivalry, no doubt the reign of Edward is merely a pretty sham and delusion, but we are afraid that ordinary readers will prefer to retain their delusive spectacles till the historian can exhibit his facts in an order at least as attractive as the old. Such an interest will hardly be discovered till he is willing to stop at home instead of seeking his interest in Cressy and Poitiers. Some day, let us hope, it will dawn upon writers and readers that the history of England is to be found, not in France or Germany or America, but in England itself; that there is yet a story to be written which never has been written, and that that is the story of the people amongst whom they live; that the enfranchisement of English boroughs by Richard Lion-Heart is more important than his Crusade, the printing-press of Caxton than the wars of the Roses, the preaching of the Wesleys than the contests and friendships of Pitt and Newcastle. When that day arrives it may possibly be discovered that Cressy and Poitiers are among the most insignificant facts in the period of English history which we call the reign of Edward III. We may be content to loiter over the pages of Froissart, as of old, without taking the conception of society and events which gives us the measure of aristocratic intelligence in the fourteenth century as the precise measure for our own. The rise of a great trading class on the ruins of the purely feudal baronage will occupy the first place in the narrative of the time. The mighty social, intellectual, and religious revolution which produced Chaucer, Wycliffe, and Lollardism will form its close. Mr. Longman, with all his details and summaries and careful notices of Acts of Parliament, feels round the edges of questions of this sort, but without a frank acceptance of them as the basis of his work. The result is, as we have said, a sense throughout of accuracy and justice, but with this a sense of coldness, a want of enthusiasm and breadth of view, which throws a certain weariness and languor over the book. Such as it is, however, we are really grateful for it.

It is, we suppose, the original character of Mr. Longman's history as a mere continuation of his previous lectures which must account for the strange omission of the whole of Edward's life before his accession to the Crown. The omission, however, is a singularly unfortunate one; for it is in the aristocratic revolution which seated Edward on the throne that we must look for the real key to the earlier history of his reign. The victory of the baronage at once over the people and the Crown which began at Evesham, culminated in the deposition of Edward II. It is useless to seek a precedent for that deposition in the case of Ethelred the Unready, as Mr. Longman follows Mr. Freeman in doing. The deposition of Edward was a sheer feudal "diffidatio," the mere withdrawal of a revolted baronage from their military relation to a baronial over-lord. Under the son and the grandson of Henry III., the older notion of national kingship had almost disappeared. The government of the country, in spite of the desperate rallies of the Crown, was in the hands of the baronage and the Church. The legislative declaration of the right of a peer to be tried by his peers—the exemption, in a word, of the baronage and the ecclesiastical hierarchy from the common justice of the land—followed significantly enough on the deposition of the King. It was the ratification of their victory. Throughout Edward's early years the Crown is actually in wardship; power rests with the Council of Regency, the mere representatives of an oligarchy, jealous as oligarchies are ever jealous, and incapable as oligarchies are generally incapable. It is by fixing one's eye on the Scotch war that one is able to detect its influence and its policy. The war with Scotland had long ceased to be a war of the Crown; it had never been a war of the people. The crime of the Second Edward in the eyes of his baronage had been his policy of peace. To the great noble, devoured by his own hungry retainers, peace was ruin. War meant the maintenance of his military household at the cost of the State; the chance of booty, of captives to be ransomed, of broad lands to be won, for himself. The triumph of the nobles in the deposition of Edward II., their second triumph in the murder of Mortimer, was in each case followed by an instant renewal of the war, and it is significant that in the last case the war began with a return of the recalcitrant barons—Beaumont and his fellows—whose bitter opposition to the peace had sprung from the necessary restitution which it involved of the lands they had won from the Scots. The temporary successes of Balliol, the victory of Halidon Hill, the capture of Berwick, the cession of the Lowlands to Edward III., only preluded the desperate struggle of five years which exhausted the resources of the realm, while it filled the pockets of the nobility. The war marks the period of their rule, and what their rule was Mr. Longman has told simply enough. Turbulent, without sense of law, playing loosely with life (few of them lived to see forty), faithless and distrustful, reviving here and there the private feuds and petty warfare of Stephen's chaotic reign—it is amusing to turn from the charming chit-chat of the early chapters of Froissart to such a page of real history as this:—

> Armed men infested the courts of justice and endeavoured to overawe the judges. Great numbers of men banded themselves together in large bodies, living in woods and forests, robbing all persons that came in their way, seizing even the King's judges and extorting money from them by means of ransom; and the nobles, instead of aiding the sheriffs in punishing them, kept these robbers in their pay and protected them. Jousts and tournaments were forbidden unless under special leave. They served for the rendezvous of armed persons; from the number of places at which they were held, they were evidently a popular form of amusement, and furnished convenient opportunities for gathering together, and plotting if need be how to defeat the law. Special keepers of the peace, to be afterwards developed into the county magistrates of the present day, had been ordered to be appointed . . . but they were not able to put down the robbers, and at one time consequently it became necessary for the King himself to march at the head of a body of soldiers to attack and disperse them.

That such a state of things should make even their puppet Mortimer, when really entrusted with the reins of power, long for peace, is not to be wondered at. But even misrule at home was not to prove the worst and most fatal result of this aristocratic government, and its aristocratic love of plunder. Over a century of English history, corrupting national sentiment, blighting national progress, crushing literature and religion and freedom with its iron weight, enslaving the clergy to the Papacy, turning the merchant into a pirate, chaining the labourer in a new serfdom to the soil, hangs the cloud of the great French war. If we had to select the most praiseworthy pages of Mr. Longman's work, we should choose those which illustrate dryly, but with perfect clearness, the origin of the war with France. Whatever were Edward's faults, the great crime of having, out of sheer ambition, doomed two great peoples to an age of misery certainly does not rest at his door. Nothing is clearer from the facts which Mr. Longman has collected than the desperate tenacity with which Edward clung to peace with Philip. But day by day the struggle with Scotland made peace more impossible. France could not stand by and see her most valuable ally trodden under foot. With greater and greater pertinacity Philip forced on the war. Edward, on the other hand, conscious that the conquest of the North was hopeless if France once frankly interfered, submitted, year by year, to wrong and insult, in the hope of averting the struggle. It was in vain that Philip afforded a refuge to Bruce when driven from his throne, that he suffered French adventurers to enlist for Scotland, that he kept up the vexatious quarrels about Aquitaine, that Scotch ships were fitted out with his sanction at Calais, that he forced a truce on Edward in the midst of his victories, that at the moment when Scotland seemed reduced to submission her hopes were revived by French promises of aid. Nothing but the actual threat of invasion, the gathering of fleets in the Channel, the harrying of the coast, could force Edward into war.

Mr. Longman has followed very carefully the course of the tangled negotiations and preparations with which the great struggle began—the intrigues of Philip with the North, with Spain, with Genoa, the struggles of Edward even to the last against his fate. Nor is it less interesting to note how completely the war opens as a mere feudal rather than a national war; the King surrounded by Imperial allies, by the chivalry of Lorraine, unwilling frankly to break with the Count of Flanders, even while he intrigues with the Flemish democracy, wasting money, waging war in chivalrous fashion, marching, countermarching, doing nothing, spending all. It is hard to say all the time whether either of the combatants is in earnest. The tangled web of negotiation with Philip, with the Pope, is taken up again at every interval of the campaign. The first phase of the war ended at last, as every feudal struggle ended, in failure and despair. Heavily in debt, his alliance with the Empire dissolved, Scotland wrested from him, his coast ravaged, the realm lawless and discontented, Edward at the close of 1340 had had enough of this barons' war. Mr. Longman has painted very clearly the real sufferings of England amid all the chivalry and prowess of Edward's Flemish campaign; the seas swept by Philip's fleets, the suspension of commerce, the burning of Portsmouth and the Cinque Ports, the terrors of invasion along the coast. No war was ever at its opening more unpopular than the great struggle which was fated to become a national passion. It was the sympathy of the burgess class with the communal movement in Flanders, the hatred it imbibed from thence of France and its feudalism, the deep resentment of the merchant body for the persistent outrages of France during the following truce upon its trade, that enabled Edward at last to put the war on a national footing, and won for him the victories—more fatal to England than a thousand defeats—of Cressy and Poitiers.

MILITARY HISTORY OF GENERAL GRANT.*

AT the present moment, when General Grant is on the point of assuming the highest position in the United States Government, it is of greater practical utility to divine what sort of a President he will make than to determine what standard he has reached as a general. But though a good commander may turn out an indifferent or bad civil governor, while, again, a mediocre officer may show the soundest judgment as a politician, there is a sufficient stock of qualifications equally applicable to either career, to make a man's history in the field important as an indication of what he may be in the Cabinet. And, apart from his political future, the conspicuous share taken by Grant in the great historical struggle of the Northern and Southern States compels our interest in examining the outlines of his military achievements drawn in the volume before us. Its author, Colonel Adam Badeau, served upon Grant's staff during the two last campaigns of the war, and has since enjoyed full access to official documents, on the Confederate as well as the Federal side, for the compilation of an accurate record. The work is written with that soldierly respect for high qualities, even among the bitterest antagonists, which is the first characteristic of a good military history. Foreign impartiality may regret that the brave armies of the beaten cause should throughout be qualified as "the rebels," while the forces of the victorious majority are "the national troops"; but the opinion of the North would perhaps hardly have tolerated a more courteously equivocal description in any account of its favourite hero that wished to be popular as well as true.

The rudest historical outline of the facts of the American civil war proves Grant to have been a soldier of great energy, of a thorough gameness and tenacity of purpose, of strong self-reliance, absolute calmness, and a laudable readiness to undertake any amount of personal responsibility. He had been educated for the army at West Point, and had served as a subaltern through the Mexican war; but he never professed to be in any way a scientific theorist or tactician. Few citizens of either Northern or Southern Confederacy could show any better title to military command when the outburst of civil war on so gigantic a scale took both hemispheres by surprise. The few trained officers whom the nation could boast started on a level of rank with the many improvised civilian colonels and generals whose existence was rendered necessary by the size of the levies. The stern tests of an internecine struggle by degrees proved fatal to most of the unprofessional heaven-born commanders: and before the close of the war the real soldiers had worked their way to the front, with Grant at the head of them. His success in the ultimate result of an undeniably difficult task of enormous magnitude shows him to have been practically the man for the situation. The question on which we wish to be satisfied, by the light of Colonel Badeau's very clear narrative, and any other help that can be given us, is, whether he was more. Was he simply the stronger man armed, who by main force spoiled the strong man of his house and goods, or is he to be ranked as a general among the generals of history?

The fruitless and almost ruinous battles of the Wilderness, after fighting which Grant suddenly quitted hold of the Virginian line towards Richmond, to take up a new base which he could at any time have occupied from the sea without the risk of a single life, are the natural stumbling-block in the way of any discriminatingly enthusiastic laudation of Grant as a first-class general. We wait to hear what Colonel Badeau says of these in his next volume. If they are to be explained, except as the gross blunder in cold blood of a blind worshipper of brute strength, knocking his head needlessly against a wall, Colonel Badeau will no doubt show us what they did mean, with the convincing perspicacity which marks his account of Grant's earlier campaigns. If they are left unexplained, it is still perhaps possible that such a blunder may be made once by a commander who is nevertheless a great general.

It is clear from Colonel Badeau's history that from his first exploit in the war, the swift seizure of Paducah at the confluence of the Ohio and Tennessee Rivers, Grant always knew what he was aiming at, and always knew the military value of time. He soon formed a distinct idea of the proper way to handle the material he had to use, and struck out an equally broad general rule for dealing with the forces opposed to him. While McClellan was attempting, in the east, to drill the army of the Potomac up to the European standard of efficiency before committing it to a decisive campaign, Grant adhered to the principle "that when neither party is well disciplined, there is nothing to gain, in the nature of discipline, by delay. The enemy organizes and improves as rapidly as yourself, and all the advantages of prompt movement are lost." He took at Belmont the first occasion that justified itself, by the collateral object of relieving another Federal corps, to give his men that confidence in themselves and their leader which is won by a hard fight. The successive captures of Forts Henry and Donelson broke the strong chain of defence which the Confederates had judiciously drawn across Tennessee, and opened to the Northern gunboats many hundreds of miles on the Tennessee, Cumberland, and Mississippi Rivers. The obstinate siege of Vicksburg completed the possession of the Mississippi. Yet though each of these operations gave proof how strongly Grant's mind grasped any special importance in the fastnesses from which he had to dislodge his enemy, and how boldly and resolutely he clung to a hold once acquired, he early enunciated his belief that the strength and the weakness of the South lay in its men, and not in its positions, and that the first and last rule of Northern strategy should be to weaken and reduce the Southern armies by striking a hard blow wherever they could be met with. The correctness of this maxim in the main was not only proved by the result, but was acknowledged over and over again both in word and deed by the more skilful among the Confederate generals. No one saw more clearly than Grant that on the part of the South it was a people's war; and the practical inference drawn by him was the stern resolve to render the non-combatant residents of the theatre of war powerless to help the enemy, by the consumption and destruction of their supplies. This was not making war with rose-water; but from Grant's point of view, that the war could only have one result, which had better be reached as soon as possible, it was not impolitic, and was in a certain sense humane. When once experience had proved to him that on a march through a fresh country he could feed a column of thirty thousand men on the supplies they met with, every such sudden plunge forward of a flying force, to strike far away at the railways or magazines on which the lengthy lines of the overmatched Confederates' communications were based, gave a double blow to the South, by exhausting a wide district of provisions at the same time that it made the disparity of combatant power in the gross tell more and more in favour of the stronger. The system that was first struck out by Grant in his circular sweep round Vicksburg culminated in Sherman's great march from Atlanta to the sea-coast. The enormous area of the fertile Southern Confederacy, drained as it then was of any sufficient military force available for meeting such an invasion, guaranteed Sherman from the Nemesis which overtook Napoleon's not very dissimilar procedure in the Russian campaign, of being thrown back in retreat upon the very line of hostile country that he had lived upon and wasted in his advance.

It is a strong argument in favour of Grant's greatness that both Sherman and McPherson, his other most illustrious lieutenant, appear to have believed in him unhesitatingly, at a time when it was the fashion at Washington to speak of Grant as a brave but incapable blockhead who had blundered into various successes. Even where Sherman differed absolutely in opinion, he was content to carry out Grant's plans with a zeal and a faith which he would never have accorded to a leader whose military instinct he felt to be of a lower order than his own. It was against a strong protest from Sherman that Grant passed the whole of his army from the northern to the southern side of Vicksburg, and marched inland from Grand Gulf to strike at the magazines and railroads of Jackson, to beat off the relieving force of Johnston, and to roll back Pemberton's defeated army within those lines of Vicksburg from which it was only to issue again as a dispirited and disarmed body of thirty thousand prisoners of war. Yet through the whole of that difficult campaign of three weeks, far away from any base, Sherman marched and manœuvred with the perfection of swiftness and docility; and when at its close the two stood together on the till then unapproachable Haines's Bluff, north of Vicksburg, Sherman was the first to acknowledge the greatness and the truth of the conception against which he had protested.

It is worthy of remark that, until his Virginian campaign against Lee, Grant had only once or twice come into serious contact with any of the best class of Southern generals. Polk at Belmont, Tilghmann, Pillow, and Floyd at Fort Henry and Fort Donelson, were not antagonists whose defeat was in itself a necessary mark of high strategic qualities. At Shiloh Landing, one of the most obstinate and dubious battles Grant ever had to fight, the Confederate general, Albert Johnston, was killed during the first day's engagement, and his place filled by Beauregard under the obvious disadvantage of entering on the command-in-chief during the actual hand-to-hand struggle. Joseph Johnston, when beaten at Jackson, was, from the quickness of Grant's unexpected movement and the slowness of Pemberton's, in too small force to have any chance of a combat on equal terms; and after Grant had invested Vicksburg and fortified his own position, Johnston's strength was still too small to risk an attack without the co-operation from inside which Pemberton never afforded him. Pemberton himself, whom Grant beat at Champion's Hill, again at Black River Bridge, and finally forced to surrender at discretion in Vicksburg, appears to have been a vain and weak man, incapable of estimating his own situation or the comparative value of the courses of action suggested to him by Johnston. Braxton Bragg, the loser of Chattanooga, seems to have played into Grant's hands, by his movements during the battle, to a degree not compatible with a first-rate order of generalship; but it is clear, from the reports of both sides, that a needless and unaccountable panic suddenly possessed the troops in Bragg's centre on this occasion. Shortly before, Bragg had detached his best lieutenant, Longstreet, against Burnside at Knoxville, with a corps not strong enough to crush Burnside, though large enough perhaps under Longstreet to have made all the difference of the balance of forces in the more vital struggle on Missionary Ridge and Lookout Mountain. Colonel Badeau speaks of Longstreet more than once with sincere admiration, as of an adversary who always took the most soldierlike course, and even in defeat made the victory over him as barren as possible. It is clear that, after the siege of Knoxville was raised by the detachment of Sherman's corps to the aid of Burnside, the forces under the command of the latter as senior general were sufficient to have pushed Longstreet clear out of East Tennessee into Virginia, if the opportunity had been seized. We may expect an equally generous impartiality to mark the writer's appreciation of Lee, when he comes forward in the volume that treats of the final Virginia campaigns.

Grant's written instructions to his subordinates in command are very clear in the indication of the general object required. They leave, as a rule, the details of action almost absolutely to the discretion of the officer charged with the execution of the order; abstaining from minuteness on the plausible theory—which by a weaker man might, like many other truisms, be carried too far—that the movements of the enemy must determine the counter-movements of the Federal divisions. For the proofs of his clearness of foresight we must therefore look rather to the general conception of his greater movements, such as the operations round Vicksburg, the relief of Chattanooga, the march of Sherman's corps to Meridian, and in the following year the great march across to the sea-coast, of which, though the execution belongs to Sherman, the original idea was due to Grant. His vigorous simplicity of mind always prompted him to take the initiative rather than wait on his adversary; so as to be able, as he says in one letter, to select his own campaign instead of having the enemy dictate it for him. The relative strength of the two parties was such as eminently favoured and justified Grant's adherence to this maxim; but the ground for a critical estimate of his strategic qualities is very much narrowed by the fact that he was almost invariably in the position of playing the bold and winning game. Some of the features in Colonel Badeau's sketch of his hero bring back touches of Soult and of Blucher rather than of any other modern generals we can call to mind.

THE LLANOS OF VENEZUELA.*

WE have read few works of travel more interesting or entertaining in their way than this, the first volume of an intended series of South American journeys. If the author fulfils his purpose, and if he is but half as successful in the narration of his foreign experiences as in his account of the wilder regions of his native land, he will not only establish for himself a well-deserved reputation, but contribute not a little to familiarize the English reader with the natural and political history of a quarter of the globe of which less perhaps is popularly known among us than of any other. Don Ramon Paez is the son or near relative of one of the most distinguished leaders in the Columbian War of Independence, who was afterwards more than once President of Venezuela, and subsequently an exile in the United States. He has, therefore, the disadvantage of writing in a foreign tongue, in which, however, he seems perfectly at his ease. His style is not such as to add any artificial charms to his narrative, which owes all its interest to the intrinsic character of the subject, and to the simple, unaffected, graphic manner in which the writer relates his experiences, and describes the scenes wherein he bore a part. The attraction of the book lies in the novel and exciting nature of the life it portrays, and in the extraordinary features of the fauna and flora of the wild regions in which the scene is laid.

Venezuela is the northernmost part of South America, between Guiana and New Granada. The northern portion of the country, nearest the coast, is for the most part mountainous and agricultural; the variation of the temperature at varying heights, with the advantages of a tropical climate equally enjoyed at all altitudes, allowing the inhabitants to produce the choicest fruits of every zone, and to rear alike cotton, coffee, tobacco, cocoa, apples, peaches, and corn. At and about Caraccas, the capital, some 4,000 feet above the sea level, the land enjoys a perpetual summer not unlike that of the most favoured sub-tropical or semi-temperate countries; and in the gardens fruits of every sort may be seen growing and ripening side by side during the whole year—oranges, mangoes, peaches, and apples thriving in perfection in close proximity to grapes as choice and luscious as those of European hothouses, and to the delicious native fruits of the country, some of which appear to be intended by nature as a substitute for some of the animal luxuries of a colder climate, hardly attainable under a sun of 97 degrees. Among these is the chirimoya, said to resemble "lumps of flavoured cream ready to be frozen"; while two different species of bread-fruit would seem almost to rival the invaluable food from which they draw their name, and the so-called "alligator pear" (Persea gratissima) yields an excellent vegetable substitute for butter. The plant which in Europe is known only by its lovely "passion-flowers" there bears a delicious juicy fruit, about the size and shape of a water melon; and a multitude of other delicacies, too numerous to mention, ripen with little culture and no distinction of season, and seem to render more solid food hardly worth the labour of procuring it. But other food is cheap enough. Beef, we are told, sells for a halfpenny per pound; coffee and chocolate abound; monkey is not bad eating; and humming-birds form, for the unsentimental, a dainty choicer than larks; the iguana lizard is a favourite dish; and the waters, as we shall presently see, furnish such choice and store of fish that even the strictness of a Catholic Lent hardly involves more than the semblance of fasting. Life in such a country, even were its population as dense as ours, could hardly involve the fierce struggles and sufferings which are incident to the civilization of less favoured peoples. No one can want food where with a few days' toil in the year an acre of ground will yield bananas, pumpkins, and maize enough for a family; and clothing and shelter scarcely count for necessaries in a climate where cold is unknown. And again, in such a climate, life itself is a luxury. The delicious air, perfumed by the scent of innumerable flowers; the glorious and perennial vegetation, the shade of trees whose leaves never fall, the ground carpeted, the bushes covered with splendid flowers; the swarms of humming-birds, in every variety of exquisite colour; the delights which appeal to every sense at once, cannot but make the conditions of happiness and contentment other and far simpler than in a temperate climate, and bring them within the easy reach of all. It would seem as if nothing but human folly and perversity could make man's life, in such scenes, other than delightful. And if these countries are not densely peopled, thriving, and prosperous, with a contented people, a successful industry, a vast commerce, and a daily increasing wealth, human folly and perversity must bear the blame. In the hands of Englishmen, or even under an English Government, that part of Venezuela would be the paradise that nature has striven to make it. It has taken all the ingenuity of a false philosophy and a mischievous philanthropy, all the fatal influence of an enforced equality between races absolutely unequal, all the disastrous effects of republican institutions in the hands of semi-savages, all the absurdities of government by a majority where the minority are white men, and the majority are Indians, negroes, and mongrels of every sort of mixture, to make Venezuela what she is now.

* Travels and Adventures in South and Central America. First Series: Life in the Llanos of Venezuela. By Don Ramon Paez. London: Sampson Low, Son, & Marston. 1868.

The southern or inland portion of Venezuela is one vast plain, intersected by great rivers and small tributaries, covered with grass, with here and there small woods or jungles, and surrounded in certain quarters by vast forests; bordered by mountains, below which comes a sort of series of terraces, marking the successive shores of the great sea or bay which once occupied this region, now called the Llanos. The people who inhabit this country are chiefly half-breeds of mixed negro and Indian blood, particularly hardy, brave, wild, strong, and lawless; living on horseback, accustomed from infancy to feats of skill and strength with the lazo and the lance, unrivalled hunters and cattle-guards, splendid guerillas, and dangerous banditti. The Llanos are covered with herds of cattle, almost wild, but each belonging to a particular farm, which must at certain times be collected, counted, and branded, and which are about as amenable to this discipline as the buffaloes of the Western prairie. This is the duty of the Llaneros; and the work of a rodeo or collection of cattle for the branding seems to be, on the whole, a good deal more dangerous, and certainly a severer test of skill, strength, courage, and endurance, than a tiger or elephant hunt. The wild cattle are driven together from great distances by a circle of horsemen continually closing round them; into the wild and raging mob of excited beasts thus gathered the Llaneros plunge, to drive out animals belonging to other farms; then the herd is driven home, and forced into the corral, not unlike that employed for the capture of elephants, but stronger; and then the fierce creatures must be dragged forth, one by one, to undergo the operations required. All the duties of the farm are done by men and boys, the latter being early trained for their work; for even the milch-cows are too wild to be safely handled by women. They, of course, do not belong to the savage herds we have described; but, with a certain number of tame oxen, are kept at home, and may be about as manageable as the least manageable cattle of the Welsh or Cumbrian mountains. The author's descriptions of these scenes are lively and interesting in the extreme, and some of his facts appear to be altogether new. Thus he relates that on one occasion he was awakened by the well-known sound of bellowing at a time when no wild cattle were in the corral; and, looking out, perceived a number of bulls in a state of passionate excitement, roaring, lowing, tearing the ground with hoofs and horns, on the spot where one of their species had been slaughtered the day before; the creatures seeming perfectly to understand what had happened there, and to be moved to violent sorrow and wrath by the sight of their companion's blood.

Wild animals are abundant on the Llanos. Besides the cattle, and troops of wild horses from which the Llaneros from time to time supply themselves with animals for use or sale, as in the case of the cattle, there are droves of hogs, apparently derived, like the cattle and horses, from domestic animals run wild; and such native creatures as the capyvara and the ant-eater, and the terrible jaguar, or American tiger, with the less formidable puma and panther. Snakes abound both by land and water, and the largest of them will swallow a deer or a calf whole. But the denizens of the waters are more dreaded and destructive than those of the land. The rivers are numerous, and must constantly be crossed by swimming; and besides, the country is periodically inundated, when the danger to the cattle, from both terrestrial and aquatic enemies, is considerable. The water teems with fish of all species, in such abundance that by driving them into a net stretched for the purpose a larger supply can be caught in a few minutes than a numerous party, such as accompanied General Paez and the author on their expedition to the Llanos, can eat. An anecdote told of Bolivar illustrates this abundance. General Paez, accompanying the Liberator in a canoe, amused himself by slightly tipping the fragile vessel, so as to ship a little water; at the same time shipping so many fish that Bolivar, unaware of the trick, fancied that the fish were leaping into the boat of malice prepense, and urged his friend to get to land as quickly as possible, since even the fish were "savages." The alarm of the distinguished patriot was not so unnatural as it may seem, for the rivers of the Llanos are inhabited by creatures quite as ferocious as the jaguar and the puma. The caiman, alligator, or crocodile—he is called by all three names—is to be found everywhere, and attacks both men and animals with equal fierceness and pertinacity. The natives have the same idea with regard to these creatures that prevails in India with respect to the "man-eating" tigers, and in Africa regarding the lion—namely, that having once tasted human flesh, they ever afterwards prefer it to any other food, and are on the look-out for fresh victims. We have seen this supposed peculiarity in the former instances ascribed to the fact that the "man-eater" is an aged beast, whose strength no longer enables him to chase any more active prey, and who therefore lies in wait for victims less swift than the stag and less formidable than the buffalo; but this explanation will not apply to the caiman cebado. The Llaneros have the courage to attack the crocodile with harpoon or lazo, and even in some cases to encounter him in the water, with no other weapon than a long knife, which is plunged into the only spot—the armpit—where the creature is easily vulnerable. But other denizens of the rivers, much less terrible in appearance, are much more feared by these intrepid sportsmen. The gymnotus, or electric eel, can stun a man by a single stroke, so that his contact is fatal to the solitary swimmer. The payara has two or more large, sharp teeth, which cut like a razor, and inflict a gash almost as severe as that of a sabre. But the most dreaded of all is a little creature of the shape and size of a carp, called, from its ferocious habits, the caribe, or cannibal. Its vast numbers and insatiable appetite render the rivers in many parts impassable to men who would face the crocodile without flinching. The author on several occasions amused himself by endeavouring to secure specimens of this extraordinary fish. Hooks were useless. The strongest tackle was bitten through in an instant; even the hooks themselves were easily severed by the shark-like teeth which can penetrate iron or copper wire with apparent ease. But by dipping a strip of tough ox-hide into the water, he succeeded in hoisting a number of the tenacious caribes into his canoe; and then found himself seriously embarrassed, if not endangered, by the savage attacks of his untameable captives. We give the description of this aquatic cannibal in the author's own words:—

> Each time the nets were hauled in shore, half a dozen or more of these little pests were to be seen jumping in the crowd, their jaws wide open, tearing whatever came in their way, especially the meshes of the nets, which they soon rendered useless. Their sharp triangular teeth, arranged in the same manner as those of the shark, are so strong that neither copper, steel, nor twine can withstand them. The sight of any red substance, blood especially, seems to rouse their sanguinary appetite; and as they usually go in swarms, it is extremely dangerous for man or beast to enter the water with even a scratch upon their bodies. Horses wounded with the spur are particularly exposed to their attacks, and so rapid is the work of destruction that, unless immediate assistance is rendered, the fish soon penetrate the abdomen of the animal and speedily reduce it to a skeleton; hence, doubtless, their appellation of mondonguero—tripe-eater. There are other varieties of the caribe in the rivers of the Llanos, but none so bold and bloodthirsty as this glutton of the waters. So abundant is this species in some rivers of the Apure, that it is a common saying among Llaneros, "There is more caribe than water."
> Every feature of this miniature cannibal denotes the ferocity and sanguinary nature of its tastes. The piercing eye, surrounded by a blood-looking ring, is expressive of its cruel and bloodthirsty disposition. Its under jaw, lined with a thick cartilaginous membrane which adds greatly to its strength, protrudes considerably beyond the upper, giving, as this formation of jaw does to all animals possessing it, likewise an expression of ferocity. Large spots of a brilliant orange hue cover a great portion of its body, especially the belly, fins, and tail. Towards the back, it is of a bluish ash colour, with a slight tint of olive green, the intermediate spaces being of a pearly white, while the gill-covers are tinged with red. The inhabitants, being often compelled to swim across streams infested with them, entertain more fear of these little creatures than of that world-renowned monster, the crocodile. This last, although a formidable antagonist in the water, can be easily avoided, and even conquered in single combat by daring men, while the former, from their diminutive size and greater numbers, can do more mischief in a short time than a legion of crocodiles.

The vast animal wealth of the Llanos was greatly reduced by a strange pestilence, which attacked every species of living being except, apparently, men and horned cattle. It swept away the herds of horses which grazed on the plains, destroyed the wild-boars, capyvaras, and beasts of prey in their jungles, and even devastated the populous rivers of the country, which in some parts are described as covered for miles with a floating mass of putrefaction. Such an animal plague, making equal, and indeed greater, havoc among wild than among domesticated creatures, has, we believe, few parallels in history, and would afford an interesting subject of investigation to the naturalist.

Our space will not allow us to follow Don R. Paez in his account of the turtle fishery of the Orinoco, if fishery it can be called where the reptiles are caught by thousands as they crowd the sands in their effort to reach a place where they may deposit their eggs, while millions of the latter, collected without trouble or search, supply the natives with abundant food, an excellent oil, and a valuable article of export. Nor can we undertake to describe the less lucrative but more interesting mode of capture by which the turtle are caught elsewhere; the Indians being trained from boyhood to shoot them under water with an arrow whose head, attached by a string to the shaft, comes off in striking, and remains fixed in the creature's shell, while the shaft, floating on the water, indicates the position of the prey, and exposes it to the stroke of the harpoon. We can only say that almost every chapter of the volume—by no means a large one—contains some novel and interesting fact or description; and that its general result is to convince the reader that the natural resources of Venezuela are almost boundless alike in quantity and variety, and that, under a Government which could offer tolerable security to person and property, no country in the world could hold forth greater attractions to the settler, the traveller, or the scientific inquirer.

WASPS.*

IT has been the misfortune of wasps to be set down as an idle, wasteful, and utterly useless order in creation, as well as in a peculiar sense, both by temperament and habit, hostes humani generis. Hence they have never been taken to as a subject of study in anything like the same popular and kindly spirit as their better famed, albeit not less dangerously armed, congeners, the bees. Neither by naturalists, poets, nor moralists, any more than by the vulgar, unthinking herd of people, has justice at any time been done to wasps. Their very existence and toleration in nature has been thrown by sceptics in the face of the wisdom and beneficence of creation. Their fussy, spiteful, and irregular ways have furnished weapons sharp and venomous as their own stings against this classe dangereuse of the great social economy of nature. Yet these little creatures have a history of their own, and play a part in nature as important, it may be, as many insects or beings more pretentious in size or of higher repute in the moral scale. Dr. Ormerod, in a very pleasant little book upon the subject, has taken up the cause of these neglected, if not maligned, insects, in a way which may have the effect of kindling an unwonted degree of interest in this comparatively unfamiliar branch of entomology. Wasps and wasp-nests having been, he informs us, his companions for years, since his attention was first drawn to the subject of wasp-paper, his detached observations have insensibly grown into a continuous Natural History. Being largely derived from personal study and observation, his work has a value which is often wanting in labours of a more ambitious kind, in which speculation makes hazardous advances beyond strict induction from facts. His style is plain and sensible, and the technicalities of the subject are judiciously avoided by referring the reader who would look closer into the many problems connected with this department of insect life to a wide list of works of a more special or scientific character.

* British Social Wasps: an Introduction to their Anatomy and Physiology, Architecture, and General Natural History. By Edward Latham Ormerod, M.D. London: Longmans & Co. 1868.

This particular branch of what Coleridge whimsically defined as "life in sections" is not without an archæology of its own. It is true, whatever be the cause, that wasps have not been found in the fossil state. The hymenoptera are otherwise fairly represented among the insects found in amber, but no wasps occur among them. The calcareous marl in gypsum beds has yielded remains of hymenoptera; but no wasps, and but a few Polistes. In literature wasps found a place from early times—then, as now, types of all things petty and annoying. Dr. Ormerod's classical reading recalls the exquisite touch of nature with which Asius, in Homer, rushing out of Troy, likens the watchful, swarming Greeks who will not come out to meet him to wasps guarding their nests. Here Lord Derby, we may observe, following Chapman, Pope, and Sotheby, gives a wholly wrong turn to Homer's σφῆκες μέσον αἰόλοι. The poet's reference is not to the "yellow bands" of the wasps, but to their rapid, restless, wriggling motion from the waist—ποικίλοι, says Heyne, non colore sed motu variato et celeri. Wright's "flexible slender waists" is correct, but not so close or expressive as Worsley's "slim wasps quivering bright." Parnell is singularly wrong, as our author does not fail to point out, in giving to hornets instead of gnats (κώνωπες) the honour of sounding the trumpet in the "Battle of the Frogs and Mice." Ælian, he might have added, speaks (Nat. An. iv. 39) of foxes despoiling wasps' nests, and characteristically dodging their stings. How, under the title of Wasps, Aristophanes lashed the fussy, troublesome, litigious Dicasts of his day, it were superfluous to draw out in detail. Poverty, in the Plutus, fastens upon the analogy with wasps as one of the happy qualifications of her votaries over those of wealth. But this ill-chosen comparison at once turns the tables against her. No one, in fact, among poets or poetasters, ever had a civil word for wasps. Aristotle, in his marvellous Natural History, shows a knowledge of their structure and ways as remarkable as any of the chapters which bespeak his keen and correct observation of nature. He was aware that the colony originated from a single wasp which survived the winter, and that the nest was, in the first instance, the sole work of this insect. He knew that the cells were made larger as the season advanced for the young queens or mother-wasps which were then produced, and that the labour of building was at this time delegated to the workers. The chief difficulty in following him, Dr. Ormerod points out, seems to arise from his not having sufficiently distinguished the species:—"His meaning is generally clear enough with regard to the social economy of the σφῆκες, but when we get to the ἀνθρῆναι all is confusion; and it is not clear whether it is always the same insect which is designated." Wasps have a place in legendary lore. Mrs. Jameson has illustrated the singular fable of St. Veronica relieving Vespasian of a wasps'-nest in his nose by the sight of her miraculous cloth. This ridiculous story was plainly concocted out of the name of Vespasian, in complete ignorance that in the time of that Emperor vespa was not the familiar word for a wasp. Coming nearer to our own time, we find Olaus Magnus of Sweden, in the sixteenth century, devoting to wasps a chapter or more of his Natural History of the Northern Nations. His classification, as briefly drawn out by Dr. Ormerod, is strange enough, sliding them in, by what he evidently thinks a perfectly natural transition, between stag-beetles and snakes. His descriptive touches are, however, true to nature. Mallow-leaves were, he tells us, the approved remedy for wasp stings in his time. Hornets, the great yellow wasps, were called Boolgetingh in the Gothic language. The curious epithets applied to wasps and hornets in the Welsh tongue, such as "yellow-tailed," "carpenter," "singer," might be taken to denote a singular interest in the insects thus diversely characterized. Still, Dr. Ormerod assures us, they are far from being favourite objects of allusion in the Triads. The form of the language, no particular affection, dictated the form of expression. Lhuyd, in his Archæologia Britannica, gives Kakkynen for the common Welsh name, chuilkiores and guihen for the Cornish, and eirkveach for the Irish, while the Armorican guezpeden and guezpel show the late Latin Vespa already creeping into use.

It is only of late years that the confusion and vagueness which arose from the want of a strict discrimination of species has been removed from the natural history of wasps. Even Réaumur's great work does not wholly escape this influence, which makes much of Aristotle's remarks unintelligible. Among the precious remains of Hunter's MSS. snatched from the flames were two papers on the "Economy of Hornets and Wasps," in which the writer's habits of close and accurate observation have laid the basis for a solid fabric of facts. The great source of error, however, has finally been removed by the labours of Mr. F. Smith, of the British Museum, who, in his Catalogue of British Fossorial Hymenoptera, Formicidæ, and Vespidæ, has condensed into a few pages the specific characteristics of the British Social wasps, and realized, it is not too much to say, with Dr. Ormerod, "Latreille's wish for another Kirby to clear up the natural history of the wasp family."

Besides the possession of two pairs of clear membranous wings, from which it takes its name, the general order of Hymenoptera is distinguished by a peculiar instrument placed at the end of the abdomen in the female sex. This instrument has been adopted as a basis of classification into species or tribes. In the Sirex and Sawfly it takes the form of a piercer or saw. In the Gallfly and Ichneumon it is an apparatus of pointed bristles. In the Ruby wasp it is a telescopic tube; and in the four remaining tribes, hence called the "aculeate hymenoptera"—namely, ants, bees, wasps, and sand wasps (fossores)—it is a sting. The fore wings in the wasp are marked with undeviating regularity by certain nervures differing in the several families, and in repose are folded longitudinally. By this single character the Eumenidæ or Solitary wasps, and the Vespidæ or Social wasps (diplopteryga), are distinguished from the fossores, which do not fold their wings. These distinctions, which may appear somewhat arbitrary or artificial, are more abruptly marked in the British than in the exotic fauna. In the foreign series, in which all the connecting links are supplied, the Vespidæ shade into the Eumenidæ as gradually as these do into the fossores, clinging by their anatomy to the former, by their habits to the latter. The great distinction between the Social and Solitary groups, though based, as their names imply, upon differences of function, may doubtless be explained by—as they must ultimately, if founded in nature, take their origin from—anatomical or structural distinctions latent within the organism. Though we cannot be said, with our existing knowledge of the anatomy and physiology of these insects, to have the power of correlating the external phenomena of wasp life with the diverse structures or tissues of each several class, yet there is much in Dr. Ormerod's excellent chapter on this subject to show a fundamental connexion between them. The natural history of Solitary wasps not coming within the proper scope of his remarks, he limits himself to but a slight sketch of the Odyneri, which from their general habits and aspects typify to most of us the British Eumenidæ. In distinguishing but two "species" of British Solitaries, the author appears to us less accurate than is his wont. It would have been more in accord with the most received and soundest classification to refer to Eum. coarctata and Eum. odynerus as cognate genera, of the latter of which we are able to distinguish twelve species. The technical or anatomical character whereby the Social and the Solitary wasps, typified in this country by the Odyneri and the Vespæ respectively, are marked off from each other, is found partly in the mandibles and tongue, partly in the tarsal hooks, which are simple in the social and denticulated in the solitary group, as shown in the microscope. Hence probably is to be traced, had we the means of minute physiological observation, much of the difference in nest-building and other habits distinctive of the two classes.

Of true Vespidæ, or Social wasps, we have in this country seven species of the typical genus vespa, including the hornet (V. crabro). The Polistes, which makes its nest without any outer covering, the "pasteboard wasp" of British Guiana, the mud wasp of India, and such as hang their flimsy structures by threads to twigs and leaves, are strangers to us. On the other hand, the Vespæ are unknown in Australia, though well represented in the Indian Archipelago. Of British species (V. Crabro, the great hornet, standing alone) three are tree wasps—namely, V. Britannica, V. Sylvestris, and V. Arborea or Borealis. Three build by preference underground.—V. Germanica, V. Vulgaris, and V. Rufa. The specific distinctions among these are best shown by the aid of illustrations, which in Dr. Ormerod's work are of unequal merit. The best of this series strikes us as V. Crabro, which is firmly and symmetrically drawn. In most of the specimens the wings are not only far too long, but also fail to render the nervures or outlines with character and precision. In Plate IV., the male of V. Vulgaris has wings that never belonged to a wasp, and the worker of V. Rufa has unknown antennæ, with the eyes and head of a fly. The diagrams of wasp faces are much better done. The drawings of nests lack definiteness of outline, especially the last, taken we should say from a photograph, which ought to render better the geometrical rigour and truth which marks the paper fabric of the wasp, even beyond that of her wax-secreting congener the bee. We would recommend our readers to go—Dr. Ormerod's excellent monograph in hand—to the nest-room in the British Museum, there to study the admirable collection of nests, British and foreign, arranged under the care of Mr. F. Smith. Conspicuous amongst these are the curious results of experiments made by the late Mr. Stone in artificial wasp architecture. By the use of wires and bits of pasteboard, to lay down the leading lines of the fabric, the labours of the tiny builders may be made to result in an edifice hardly less complex or elaborate than St. Paul's itself. One of the most valuable parts of Dr. Ormerod's book is that in which he shows the various forms of cells, and their aggregates into nests, to be typical of the species of their builders. He is right in insisting upon the fact of the distinctive architecture of insects such as those not arising out of any external physical necessity, but out of an inner subjective influence, or instinctive impulse.

It has been sought of late to detract from the geometrical exactness popularly assigned to the cells of bees and wasps. Their hexagonal form has been explained as the mere result of uniform lateral pressure, under which cylinders of any soft substance take the form of hexagons as the nearest polygonal figure capable of filling space. Actual observation has, however, disposed of this damaging hypothesis. Certain wasps do indeed make their combs—very small ones—entirely of cylindrical cells, the lateral pressure notwithstanding. But in the ordinary case the hexagonal principle is manifest even in the rudimentary basis of the destined comb. Still more clearly is it seen in cases where the industry of the wasp seems to find a supererogatory vent in a lacework of detached cells exterior to the walls of the house. On the unfinished margin of such a series may be seen stretching out unmistakeable straight lines, the embryonic walls of hexagons never to be fully enclosed. As regards our insular varieties at least, the architectural laws involved, as well as the materials employed, in these beautiful products of nature are explained with clearness and truth in Dr. Ormerod's instructive pages. As a popular manual upon a subject very little studied, no less than as a source of valuable suggestions for the study of professed observers, his book is one to be confidently recommended to the notice of the public.

PROBYN'S ESSAYS.*

THIS volume consists of reprints of six articles written at various times from October, 1865, to April, 1868. One, the earliest, is translated from the Revue des Deux Mondes; the rest are reprinted from the Westminster Review. Mr. Probyn very reasonably asks "those who think it worth while to read these Essays, to bear specially in mind, while doing so, the exact date at which each of them was written." Events, as he truly says, march so fast in these days, that a very short time will altogether change "the circumstances and condition of a whole country." The perfectly reasonable inference is that, in times like these, we are not to be very hard upon Mr. Probyn if he sometimes sees reason to change his opinions, or if his expectations of the future have sometimes turned out wrong after the future has become the present. We shall certainly not be hard on Mr. Probyn on any such grounds. We hold, with Lord Macaulay, that a man who, in a time of great changes, thinks exactly the same at the end as he did at the beginning must be either an inspired prophet or an obstinate fool. In such times everybody changes more or less. The real difference is that some men have the wit to know that they change, and the honesty to confess it, while others are either too stupid to know that they change, or else too dishonest to confess it. We once knew a man, who gave us no reason to think that he was dishonest, who gravely said that he always thought the same as the Times. And have not a great number of worthy and honourable gentlemen been trying to persuade themselves that they always think the same as Mr. Disraeli? Mr. Probyn does not belong to this class. He has sense enough to know that he has changed his mind on some points, and he tells us so like a man. We like him all the better for so doing.

The essays which please us most are the three which have to do with Italy. They have the advantage of being written from personal knowledge, and they have the merit of setting before us in a connected shape a great deal that many of us have taken in only in a confused, because in a piecemeal, way. They give Mr. Probyn's impressions of things at three different stages in the recent history of Italy. The first, the essay which is translated from the Revue des Deux Mondes, was written in 1865, in the interval between the last two Italian wars, after the liberation of Milan, but before the liberation of Venice. Mr. Probyn draws, from his own observation, a powerful contrast between the state of the liberated and the still enslaved city. The second essay is one on "Italy, Venice, and Austria," which appeared in the Westminster Review of July, 1866. It was therefore written just before that Italian war which formed so important a pendant to the great German war, and it must have been in the press at the very time that the battle of Custozza was fighting. The last, written in March, and published in April, 1867, contains a narrative of the war which was contemporary with the former article. It contains a minute military description of the fight of Custozza, which the table of contents says is illustrated by a map, though we cannot find any map in the copy which has reached us. These essays are all written with a good, honest, hearty appreciation of the Italian cause. But with this natural sympathy for Italy is strangely mixed up a strong leaning to France, and even to the present ruler of France, which is amusing enough. We are bound however to say that this is one of the points on which Mr. Probyn has learned from experience. He seems, when he began, to have really looked upon Louis Napoleon as a sincere friend and honest benefactor of Italy. This belief gets rudely shaken as he goes on; Mr. Probyn is driven to some very hard shifts in his third article, and from another, that headed the "Two Temporal Powers," it seems that his Bonapartism has now pretty well given way. The Antibes Legion and the "wonder-working 'Chassepot'" were too much for him. In this essay the "two Temporal Powers" spoken of are, oddly enough, the Protestant Church in Ireland and the Papal dominion at Rome. Mr. Probyn is more successful in dealing with either of these subjects separately than he is in trying to make out any kind of connexion or parallel between them. The article headed the "Church System in Ireland and Canada" is much more to the purpose. It is obvious that there is a natural connexion, and an obvious contrast, between the systems of ecclesiastical policy which have been followed in these two countries respectively, and the Canadian precedent may be fairly held up as an example for Ireland to follow. The last essay is on an American subject, "The Constitution and the Secessionists," and bears date April, 1866. It was written therefore about a year after the murder of President Lincoln. Mr. Probyn is a strong, but not unfair, supporter of the Northern cause. But in this essay comes the most remarkable case of his change of opinion. In April, 1866, he expected great things from President Johnson. He has been grievously disappointed, and he says so manfully. In his Italian essays, the Bonapartism with which Mr. Probyn set forth seems to die out naturally before the facts, but it is nowhere retracted in so many words. But in the American essay he finds it necessary to make a solemn abjuration of President Johnson in a note set apart to that end. We have nothing to object. It is not so much Mr. Probyn who has changed as Mr. Johnson, and Mr. Probyn's estimate of Mr. Johnson therefore naturally differs at different times.

* Essays on Italy and Ireland and the United States of America. By J. W. Probyn. London: Trübner & Co. 1868.

On all these subjects Mr. Probyn, without displaying anything very profound, novel, or brilliant, writes in a sensible and straightforward way; and his narrative of the Italian war of 1866, the fights of Custozza and Lissa, is a really good piece of contemporary history. The essay which we like least is the one on the two Temporal Powers. As we have said, we cannot make out the connexion between the two parts of it, and in the Roman part Mr. Probyn's way of talking about the Pope somehow degenerates into a sort of vehement, and yet decidedly commonplace, preaching. Otherwise, we have not much to say about his style either way. He is always intelligible, and generally unaffected. But many of his sentences are too closely formed upon foreign models, and he has especially that unpleasant habit of using the inflected genitive, in positions where modern English usage does not allow of it, which is so common in the English writing of foreigners and of Englishmen who have become more familiar with the literature of foreign countries than with that of their own.

Mr. Probyn gets a little out of his depth in his Irish history, when he fancies that Ireland was conquered by Henry the Second in 1156, and it sounds rather ludicrous to hear about "the Roman Catholic Church" being "established" by him. It is wonderful to see how many minds are affected by this sort of confusion. They really seem to think that Henry upset one religious society in Ireland and founded another. In truth, as we have often explained, the only ecclesiastical result of the conquest of Ireland was to put the finishing stroke to a tendency by which, for some time before, the Irish Church had been gradually drawing nearer and nearer to English models. But the hopeless confusion of Mr. Probyn's mind on this sort of subject is plainly enough revealed by the following paragraph:—

> The great religious revolution of the sixteenth century, known as the Reformation, separated both England and Scotland from the Church of Rome. The result of their conversion to the Protestant faith was the establishment in the former country of the Episcopal Church, and in the latter of the Presbyterian.

Perhaps Mr. Probyn may be, after all, the prophet destined to enlighten us in our great difficulty, and to give us the date of "the Reformation."

Mr. Probyn succeeds much better when he gets into more purely practical matters, and contrasts the ecclesiastical condition of Ireland with that of Canada. The contrast is certainly most striking. The parallel is closer than any that could be found between any other two parts of the British Empire; it is so close as to afford a reasonable hope that a change which has wrought so much good in Canada may at least do some good in Ireland. Canada, not so long ago the scene of rebellion, has been tranquillized by the very means by which it is hoped to tranquillize Ireland. The parallel is very well worked out by Mr. Probyn. And he sees with equal clearness through the false parallel which was so well worn during the late election—the transparent fallacy that the overthrow of the Church Establishment in Ireland involves the overthrow of the Church Establishment in England. This whole essay on the "Church System of Ireland and Canada" is well worth reading. Some of its statements and arguments had been already used by Mr. Probyn in the essay on the "Two Temporal Powers," but, as we before said, we cannot see the connexion between the two parts of that essay. The Irish Protestant Church is not a "temporal power" in Ireland in the sense in which the Pope is a "temporal power" in Rome. There are very good reasons for altogether changing the position of both institutions, but they are reasons of quite different kinds. And to deprive the Pope of his temporal sovereignty need not carry with it either disestablishment or disendowment. In this essay too Mr. Probyn brings in some considerations which are not to the purpose, such as the great fortunes left behind them by certain Irish Bishops. Now Mr. Probyn admits, with some simplicity, that in some of these cases the wealth of these prelates was by no means wholly ecclesiastical wealth, but that it came very largely from their private estates. He admits also that he is describing a past and not a present state of things. But the truth is that statistics of this sort do not really touch the question. For a Bishop to make himself a great private fortune out of the estates of his church is undoubtedly a scandal. But it is not a greater scandal to do it in Ireland than to do it in England. The frightful abuses of the Irish Church, some of which never could have happened in England in the worst times, have undoubtedly done much to make the Irish Church still more unpopular than it would have been otherwise. But most of these abuses have been reformed, and anyhow they do not touch the root of the matter. It is not a question of particular abuses, but of the great abuse itself, the existence of the Irish Establishment at all. A good and faithful Irish Bishop, doing his duty as well as he can, is, so long as he retains his connexion with the State, really as great an injustice as the careless and scandalous Bishops a generation back. It is quite off the point to argue, as one often hears, that it is a shame for an Irish clergyman, who has perhaps twenty Protestant souls to look after, to have such and such an income, perhaps not more than the average income of an English clergyman. Now it is manifest that, if you endow a clergyman at all, you must give him enough to live upon, whether he has twenty souls or twenty thousand to look after. The fault is not in the amount of the endowment, but in there being any public endowment at all. We do not hesitate to say that, if there is to be a Protestant Rector of Clonmult, he ought to have more than 174*l.* a year, even though his Protestant congregation numbers only nine. But then we say that there should not be any Protestant Rector of Clonmult, holding a public endowment at all.

But the latter part of this essay, though it seems to us to have no natural connexion with the former part, is very good in itself. It is especially pleasant to see the Bonapartist feeling, with which Mr. Probyn set out, gradually dying out. The later conduct of France towards Italy is here well set forth, and the testimony is all the more valuable as coming from one who is certainly not anxious to be harder than is necessary on the present state of things in France.

BREEZIE LANGTON.*

HAD the author of Breezie Langton omitted his name from the title-page, we should have unhesitatingly credited Mr. Whyte Melville with his labours. The force and truth of the hunting and racing sketches, the lively chat of the clubs and the barracks, the pleasant flirting scenes, and the general tone of good society that chastens even the slang, all carry us back far beyond the days of the extravagant White Rose to those of Kate Coventry and Digby Grand. We do not say that Breezie Langton is of a high class of fiction. Mr. Smart does not trust himself in the subtle mazes of complicated character, nor does he plunge into the depths of human nature to fetch up pearls from unlikely places. He deals chiefly with people who wear their hearts on their sleeves, and who rattle out what comes uppermost; and probably for the best of reasons. In fact, we fear the book may be taken as a very fair and not unflattering picture of certain sets in modern society; the dialogue is shallow, and yet with just enough of sparkle and humour to make it fairly readable without being unnaturally clever. We should call it a tolerably realistic picture of all that it professes to describe, were it not that the author sometimes sacrifices to the traditional improbabilities of conventional military fiction. Every man below the rank of a field officer—and pleasant fellows and agreeable companions most of them are—goes ahead in the most reckless manner. They bet on "good things," play unlimited loo, travel from barrack to ball over the length and breadth of England on unlimited leave and very limited means; and yet the survivors get to the end of the story without leaving much of their fleece with the usurers, and with small damage to their modest patrimonies. Then it is sheer socialism to represent humble subalterns in the Line as received in the best houses, courted for private theatricals, and accepted offhand as eligible partis, with just the same improbable good fortune that used to fall to the lot of Lever's earlier creations. But even deducting all this—and it scarcely strikes you as unnatural, unless you approach the book in the cavilling spirit of the critic, so naturally is it all taken for granted—there is an air of truthfulness that strikes you throughout, and assures you that Mr. Hawley Smart has studied from the life what he undertakes to describe. We don't think he has been fortunate in his title; but, if he has failed there, it is a fault that carries with it its own penalty. Breezie Langton sounds like a dull conundrum that few people will take the trouble to guess. If you go to the book for the solution, you find Breezie is a fresh, airy, buoyant girl. She has fast manners, but then the novel is a fast one altogether. Tried by trouble, she proves to be cursed with deep feelings; and, although she is not the sort of woman to inspire a settled passion in a thoughtful man, few of Mr. Smart's readers will meet her often without being slightly taken with her. With Breezie and ourselves it was very far indeed from being a case of love at first sight, but she certainly improves on acquaintance, and so do most of the ladies in the book. The title might be "Breezie Langton, or Much Better than We Seem." They are all more or less of flirts, which is the less to be wondered at considering how very carefully all their chaperons are kept in the background. But then, when they marry for love, they make excellent wives, and find their disinterestedness rewarded; and even when they marry for money, they extricate themselves with dignity and virtue from the false position they have accepted. As for the men, we see at once that the book is written by one of themselves. We have none of the muscular fiends that "Ouida" loves to paint, with their girlish forms, nerves of steel, and constitutions of iron—men modelled on the Rudolph of Eugène Sue, who always rise superior to the emergency, no matter how formidable, and brace their unfailing strength and unflagging courage with a ceaseless round of effeminate debauchery. Mr. Smart's gentlemen see a good deal of life of one sort or another, and are very far from being ascetics. They are very generally of the Turf, turfy, and look on Newmarket, Epsom, and Doncaster as the great centres of English industry. But they are gentlemen, and men of like weaknesses with ourselves. They occasionally are deceived in their knowledge of human nature, none of them know absolutely everything, and headache is usually found to follow on dissipation. Perhaps we may take exception to the monotony of the characters, and wish the author had launched out into a wider range; for even the men who not only have been gifted with brains, but have been at the pains to cultivate them, chime in with the common tone. Tom Lyttlereck—we were nearly scared back by the name on the very threshold of the book—successful writer of articles and novels as he is, has the good taste invariably to adapt himself to the tone of the company in which he finds himself, with the tact of a gentleman and the versatility of a man of genius. Cis Langton, also a writer and a newspaper correspondent as well, seeks distraction from an early blight of his affections by plunging into reckless speculation on the Turf, and only reverts to the literary labours he lives by when he has parted with the proceeds of his last bout of industry. But it is clearly pleasanter reading when the conversation is levelled up than when it is levelled down, and, we repeat, the dialogue, repartee, and story-telling are most flattering echoes of what one is likely to hear in any news-room or smoking-room in London clubs or British garrisons.

Frail and rickety in the extreme, the structure of the plot is the feeblest part of the book; but then the book scarcely rests on it, and all the interest lies in the series of separate incidents, and the personages who figure in them. Take the hunt steeple-chase, for example, where Charlie Repton, the hospitable owner of the neighbouring mansion filled with the crowd of his guests, rides his own horse. It is made one of the two favourites, the other being The Slasher, a horse famous in the hunt. Repton's friends have backed him heavily, and Delpré—the demon of the story, Captain in Her Majesty's service, over head and ears in difficulties, and something of a leg—plays a grand coup for extrication: and, fancying he has got on to a good thing, "plunges" heavily on Repton and his mare. He has made up his mind she is decidedly better than The Slasher, and believes there is nothing else in the betting. But as he passes the weighing-room, "a little man was seated in the scales, apparently in a state of great nervous agitation about his weight":—

"What horrible weather," he exclaimed, "to ask a man to ride in. I shall get my death of cold, or be laid up with rheumatism for the remainder of the winter."

"What's that?" inquired Delpré of a bystander, and he indicated the horse.

"This, sir," answered the little man in the most plaintive of tones—he was got up all in black, and looked in manner and costume as if dressed for his own funeral—"is Mr. Martin's brown beast 'The Novice.' I'm the other one. Novice I mean, not beast. Nice sort of animal and nice sort of day to begin one's career as a steeple-chase rider, isn't it? So kind of Mr. Martin, wasn't it, to bring me down to ride that beast of a brougham horse through a pea-soup fog. . . . Now, Martin, where's the fire-escape to get up by?" said the small man. "Oh, well, chuck away, but you'll never do it," he continued, as Mr. Martin, on the broad grin, advanced to give him a leg up. "By Jove, I'm all here," he said, as he was thrown into the saddle. "Mind, if it is not my neck, I'll have brandy and water as soon as you can get it down my throat. Telegraph to Fergusson to come and set what's broke; none of your country doctors, mind; that's our agreement, and you're to keep me till I'm all right again."

"Best looking and best goer of the lot!" mutters Delpré, as he saw The Novice and his rider canter past. "Has Mr. Johnson ridden much?" he inquires of his neighbour. "Johnson be dommed!" was the reply. "That's Plausible Plum, the biggest gammoner out," &c.

And Plausible justifies his name by rushing at his fences alongside of Repton's fiery mare, flurries her, throws her out, lands "The Novice" a winner by a head, and swamps Delpré.

Finally comes the campaign in the Crimea, breaking up all the flirtations, and carrying off some of the characters, among others the lover of poor Breezie Langton. And we venture to pronounce the pictures at Constantinople and the seat of war, the scenes from the camp and the trenches, very much more vivid than anything in Dr. Brady, although that was written by the "pen of the war." There is little attempt at military history or fine writing. We live under canvass with subalterns who are hard set to kill time and eke out rations, not with generals of division, weighed down with their responsibilities, and commanding the meagre markets for their larders. Lieutenant Rolls—Crumbs is his regimental sobriquet, and literally his nom de guerre—is a fellow of infinite jest, who devotes time, money, and energies to supplementing the commissariat. He varies his foraging by exhibiting his taste for horseflesh in pony dealing, or rather pony stealing. In fact his manner of trading would have undoubtedly brought him to the bar of the Old Bailey in England, or of Judge Lynch in the Trans-Mississippi States. He comes by appointment to fetch his friend Travers and baggage from Balaklava to the front:—

"Confound it, Jack," he said; "blessed if they have'nt stole my pony while I was shopping. It's true I've got hold of another, but he's not half so good as my own. Besides somebody may claim him any minute. I have'nt an idea where he is. Wait a minute while I get a pair of scissors. He's very rough, and wants trimming a bit. Won't look quite so like himself either, after I've operated on him, which will be an advantage."

Having docked the animal's tail and hogged his mane, Rolls loaded his friend's baggage on its back, and the three started for the front. Unluckily the roads were heavy, and the pace slow, and the bereaved owner, following the trail, overtook and reclaimed his property; his natural indignation and his gravity finally yielding to the cool impudence of the culprit. A very similar Providence sent Rolls a goose for his Christmas dinner:—

I happened to be cruising about our lines early one morning, and met my friend waddling along not very far from the Colonel's tent. "Deserting by Jove," said I, and immediately knocked him on the head and picked him up. Then it struck me I had heard the Colonel had got hold of a goose or two, so I sat down and plucked him right off.

Stories like these partake rather more of the character of broad farce than genteel comedy, but we believe they are not much of caricatures, although all corps were not blessed with such zealous and unscrupulous caterers as Mr. Rolls.

After giving these practical Joe Millers, it would be unfair to part from Mr. Smart without a specimen of his descriptive powers. Take the unsuccessful attack on the Redan. It is unpretending, and seems to us very vivid:—

"There go the supports," said Jack, as another mass slowly forms outside the parapet. Crash go the flank batteries of the Redan, and a storm of grape cuts up the ground in front of the storming column. The smoke now almost concealed the works. The trench is a blaze of musquetry, and the fierceness with which the grape and shot whistle about it shows that the Russians endeavour to reciprocate its attentions. The smoke lifts. Clear against the sky, standing on the parapet of the salient angle of the Redan, is the figure of a man. He is a Russian evidently, and is firing rifles at the assaulting party as fast as his comrades can hand them to him. Good God! they have not got in yet, or he could not be there. More than a hundred rifles are aimed at him. He bears a charmed life, and continues to fire rapidly from his exposed position. Ah! he is hit at last. He throws his arms wildly in the air, and falls backwards among his comrades in the interior of the work. . . . The fire gradually slackens, the supports have thrown out skirmishers, the grape cuts the ground all around them, three or four roll over never to rise again, the skirmishers retire, still rapidly dropping. The truth flashes across Henries—"We are beat back."

In fact, Breezie Langton is a book of which one can best give an idea by quotations, and as, like most novels, the style is more diffuse than terse, it is difficult to do that and yet do it justice. Superfine readers may with some show of reason call it fast and slangy, but it would be utterly unreasonable to pronounce it immoral or vulgar. We predict for it a decided success in clubs and barracks, and it will recommend itself most to those who are most at home in the scenes it describes. And, forced and improbable as is the plot, its heroine interests us quite sufficiently to put us out of temper with the author for clouding her sunny life with a catastrophe so melancholy.

THE name of the Bishop of Alet will probably be new to many of our readers. Few even of those who are familiar with the interesting autobiography of the late Mrs. Schimmelpenninck are likely to be familiar with her Memoirs of Port-Royal, and Nicholas Pavillon is not mentioned, so far as we recollect, in Sir James Stephens's well-known essay on the Port-Royalists, or in St.-Beuve's more elaborate work on the same subject. Yet the Bishop of Alet well deserves a vates sacer on more accounts than one, though we fail to discern the close analogy between his character and career and Bishop Ken's, which seems to have impressed so forcibly the mind of his present biographer. Both were conspicuous for their piety in an age of perhaps more than average worldliness, and both exhibited to a generation of timeserving and obsequious prelates a bright example of independent adherence at all costs to their own convictions of right and truth. But there the similarity ends. No apology, however, is needed for rescuing from oblivion the memory of a bishop appointed by Richelieu, and whose episcopate extended over the first thirty-seven years of the reign of Louis XIV., but who was no courtier, and who in the scandalous crusade of the Jesuits against the Jansenists deliberately took the side of the persecuted party in opposition alike to Pope and King. The external events of the life of Nicholas Pavillon are not, for the most part, remarkable, though he lived to the age of eighty; but his public career coincides with a period of French ecclesiastical history which is on many accounts instructive. The Church of the ancien régime, which was finally swept away at the Revolution, was already beginning—to use words frequently applied a generation back to the Church of England—to "die of dignity." Though Pavillon's parents appear to have been pious people in their way, they felt no scruple in purchasing a rich canonry for him while still a boy, and only allowed him to resign the appointment, at his own urgent request, on condition of his retaining the stipend! Later, when he became Bishop of Alet, he had great difficulty in ejecting a youth, who had only received the first tonsure, from the deanery of his cathedral, and enforcing residence on his clergy, among whom non-residence seems to have been the rule rather than the exception. Even in a case of gross profligacy his deprivation of the offending curé was summarily overruled by the metropolitan. The distrust of conventual establishments which, as we shall see, he manifested throughout his life, may be partly explained by the disreputable condition of too many of the religious houses in France at the time. A large number were suppressed by Innocent X. and Alexander VII., the former of whom called them "asylums for licentiousness and crime." On the other hand, as often happens in an age of moral declension, the Church was torn by the fiercest theological passions. Pavillon lived to witness the iniquitous persecution of the Port-Royalists, and the monstrous attempt of their Jesuit assailants to impose on them the infallibility of the Pope in questions of "dogmatic fact," through the condemnation of the famous "Five Propositions," said to be extracted from the works of Jansenius, in sensu auctoris, as they persuaded Alexander VII. to word it, though his successor waived the point. He only lived to see the beginning of the contest between the Regale and Pontificale, when the same Jesuits, finding Innocent XI. favourably disposed towards the Jansenists, threw the whole weight of their then immense influence into the scale of the Royal authority against the Papal, and succeeded, through the influence of the Court confessors with the King and his mistresses, in filling all the French sees with creatures of their own. Little as he sympathized with Ultramontanism, he would have been amazed to find Jesuits employed in drawing up the Declaration of Gallican Liberties, and at a later period, when threatened with dissolution, actually offering to teach the "Four Propositions" in all their colleges. Yet these are undoubted facts. A work by one of them, Père Maimbourg, in defence of Gallicanism, was put on the Index, and the Pope ordered them to turn him out of the society—an order they evaded. When their General, Gonzalez, wrote, by Innocent's desire, against "probabilism"—the system so scathingly exposed in the Provincial Letters—and in defence of Papal autocracy, they held an extraordinary chapter to depose him, and were only restrained from doing so by the express prohibition of the Pope. In the earlier period of the quarrel, during which Bishop Pavillon was mixed up with it, they were able to use the combined influence of the French and Roman Courts to crush their opponents, and they used it with a cynical indifference to the moral aspects of the controversy which seems almost incredible to us now, for whatever of moral and spiritual life remained in the French Church ranged itself conspicuously and without hesitation on the side of the Port-Royalists. If ever there were saints on earth, men like Nicole and Arnauld must be reckoned among them. And the subject of the present narrative has an equal claim to the title, though no one is less likely to be canonized.

Nicholas Pavillon was born in 1597, and was early distinguished for his piety, and his abilities as a preacher. Cardinal Richelieu, who had a commander's eye for genuine merit, of whatever kind, and was willing to reward it where he could do so without prejudice to his policy, offered him, in his fortieth year, the see of Alet, which he was, after long hesitation, persuaded to accept, though he rigorously declined all subsequent offers of higher promotion. Two years elapsed before the necessary Bulls for his consecration could be obtained from Rome, owing to the misunderstandings existing between the French and Papal Courts, and he devoted the time to prayer and study. On his arrival at Alet he found the episcopal palace in ruins, his predecessors having preferred to reside at a neighbouring château, and both clergy and people in a state of the lowest ignorance and demoralization. The following passage will give some idea of the state of the French Church in the middle of the seventeenth century:—

> With regard to spiritual matters the state of things which prevailed on the arrival of M. d'Alet was equally deplorable. For nearly a century this bishopric had been held by five or six prelates as if in Commendam. It was only in the year 1622, after the spoliation of the town of Alet by the Huguenots, who kept possession of it for a period of ten or twelve years, that M. Polverel, a gentleman of Auvergne, was nominated to this see. He had the reputation of being a pious and learned man, but died before the necessary preparations could be made for his installation. His brother, who was at that time a cavalry officer, an ignorant man, of immoral character, and destitute of any learning or ability, and who had done some service for the Crown, was advised to apply for the vacant bishopric as a recompense for his services. He did so, and some idea may be formed of the fearful abuses prevalent in that day in France during the reign of Louis XIII. by the fact that such an application should be successful. The bishopric of Alet was conferred upon this man in the year 1622, and he kept possession of it until his death, which took place in the year 1637. During the fifteen years of his episcopate his manner of life was very much the same as before he entered upon it. With the revenues of the see he purchased the appointment of Almoner to Queen Mary de Medicis, and also that of Chapel Master to the King. When not at Court he resided chiefly at the Château de Cornavel, in company with a female whom he had formerly seduced, and by whom he had several children, two of whom he publicly acknowledged and provided with the best benefices in the diocese. He went so far as to give two or three of the most valuable livings to one of his nieces, who received the revenues and engaged hired priests to perform the duties.

On hearing who was appointed to succeed this estimable prelate the first act of the clergy was to unite in a vow to the Blessed Virgin to secure her protection against their new Bishop, and they actually had a picture of the pious ceremony painted, which is still preserved. The Bishop at first availed himself of the aid of the Jesuits, in reforming his diocese, but soon found, as might have been expected, that they would submit to no authority but that of their own Order, and the estrangement thus commenced only deepened in the course of time. The account of his devoted labours in raising the spiritual condition of both priests and people is very interesting. One of his methods, which came afterwards to be associated with the Jansenist programme, was the revival of public penances—in which, by the by, he reminds us more of Bishop Wilson than of Bishop Ken—and this appears for the time to have been a success. But then the diocese of Alet was in a remote part of the country, and the inhabitants were mainly of the humbler classes, though the Bishop applied the same discipline, if we may accept his biographer's statement, to the lord of the manor as to the peasant. With the monks as well as the Jesuits, who took an early opportunity of bringing a charge of Jansenism against him, the Bishop came into collision, nor did he gain anything beyond fair words by an appeal to Rome against their opposition to his measures. In a sisterhood of "Regents" which he founded, and which Mrs. Schimmelpenninck has described in her Memoirs of Port-Royal, he strictly prohibited vows, or indeed any attempt at permanent organization, on the double ground that all communities degenerate in the course of time, and that the works of charity suited to one age may not be those required in another. He seems invariably to have dissuaded those who consulted him about entering religious orders, whether male or female. Thus he advised the Princess of Conti against retiring into a Carmelite convent on her husband's death; and when several ecclesiastics in his diocese had taken a vow to embrace the monastic life, he applied to the Pope for a dispensation, which was granted, on the ground that their services were needed for active work, and that "it has ever been the mind and feeling of the Church, that its true interests should be preferred before vows and obligations of this description." Coincident with the decay of masculine piety was the growth of an extravagant and maudlin devotion to the Virgin which was censured in a work, highly recommended by the Bishop of Tournai, entitled Salutary Counsels from the Holy Virgin to her indiscreet Devotees. The monks and many of the secular clergy were indignant, but Bishop Pavillon arranged for its republication with the imprimatur of a considerable number of the French Bishops.

It was not till the later years of his episcopate that the Bishop was directly involved in the Jansenist controversy. In 1656 appeared the Provincial Letters, which he hailed with thankfulness, but soon afterwards followed the Apology for the Casuists, reproducing all the lax principles of morality which Pascal had condemned. On this Pavillon wrote to Pope Alexander VII. to point out the danger to which true religion was exposed in France, not, as formerly, by the assaults of heretics, but by the teaching of the ministers of the altar. And, in conjunction with four other Bishops assembled at Alet, he subscribed a formal censure of the Apology. This was to declare open war with the Jesuits and the monastic Orders, and they pursued him for the remaining twenty years of his life with that ingenuity of malicious bitterness which only the odium theologicum can produce. We cannot follow the details of the famous controversy on the Augustinus of Jansen here. Suffice it to say that the work had appeared in 1640, and the Five Propositions deduced from it by the Jesuit critics were censured by Innocent X. in 1653 on the application of thirty-eight French Bishops, on which a formulary was drawn up and required by the Government to be subscribed. But the opposite party denied that the propositions, which they professed their readiness to condemn, were contained in the Augustinus. Thirty-nine Bishops met in Paris and decided against them, and the next Pope, Alexander VII., decided that the Five Propositions were extracted from Jansen's book, and were condemned in the sense intended by him, thus tacitly claiming infallibility in matters of "dogmatic fact," as the phrase ran. This opened out a fresh controversy, and bitter were the persecutions the Port-Royalists were subjected to in order to induce them to sign what they held to be a false declaration on a question of fact. Pavillon at first refused to take any side in the controversy, and even replied to Arnauld that those who were required to make the subscription ought to make it, whatever might have been their own previous opinion. But on being further pressed, and, examining the matter more closely, he felt unable any longer to remain neutral, and when, in 1661, Louis XIV. sent a circular letter to all the Bishops requiring them to sign the formulary, he not only refused, but explained his refusal in an outspoken letter of remonstrance addressed to the King, protesting against the usurped authority of the Government, which the Jesuists had invoked, in questions of faith. At their instigation a second decree was issued the following year, ordering the immediate signatures of all the Bishops who had hitherto refused. Pavillon was firm, and two years later a fresh declaration of the King was made in Parliament, threatening severe penalties on all who still resisted. On this the Bishop wrote again to the King, and moreover forbade any of his clergy to sign under pain of excommunication. The few who disobeyed him were only pardoned on making a formal retractation of their signatures, besides undergoing various penances. The King and the Jesuits were very angry, and after various futile attempts at accommodation, a Brief was procured from Alexander VII., on his deathbed, positively enjoining the four Bishops who still held out to sign the formulary without reservation within thirty days, on pain of suspension and interdict, but within three weeks the Pope died, and the Brief became void. Nineteen Bishops now addressed the new Pope, Clement IX. in vindication of their four brethren, whose eminent virtues they said were the ornaments of their order, and many more expressed themselves against the infallibility of the Church on matters of fact. At length the four recalcitrant prelates agreed to sign a letter to the Pope, accepting the formulary "sincerely," instead of "purely and simply," which was understood to leave open the question of fact. This argument was called "The Peace of Clement VII."; but, as might have been expected, the Jesuits would not allow it to remain undisturbed, and Pavillon always afterwards regretted his partial concession. On another point he was less flexible. The Jesuits had extorted even from the gentle and judicious Clement IX. a condemnation of a work called the Ritual of the Bishop of Alet, in a Brief pronounced by competent judges to be the most scandalous and irregular ever issued from the Court of Rome. It was, as the biographer justly observes, "a striking evidence how generally the interests of the Court of Rome prevail over the true interests of the Church, and that, however great may be the Pope's love for truth and justice, it is a difficult matter to resist the current of opinions that prevails around him, and which often leads him to sacrifice his better judgment to political considerations." The Bishop prepared a defence of his Church and Ritual, endorsed by the signatures of twenty-nine French Bishops, and the death of Clement IX., after a pontificate of only three years, terminated the affair. His next contest—for his career was one of perpetual struggle, though he was naturally a man of peace—was with the King about the Regale, and in this he had the full sympathy and support of Innocent XI. (Odescalchi), but he died the year after that able and excellent pontiff ascended the throne, worn out with labours and trials.

The translator has discharged his task very creditably, but the narrative would have read more naturally if he had been rather less solicitous about adapting its language to the supposed requirements of members of the English Church. There is something a little affected, for instance, in constantly speaking of "administering" or "celebrating the Holy Communion," when the original doubtless speaks of celebrating the mass. But the book is one which will have an interest for many readers both of the Bishop's communion and the "Layman's."

BURRITT'S THOUGHTS AND NOTES.*

THIS little book is a republication of essays contributed some years ago to the Christian Citizen, the Bond of Brotherhood, and other lively periodicals, now, it would seem, extinct. Their author is Elihu Burritt, otherwise known as the "learned blacksmith," and a very good specimen of the genuine Connecticut Yankee. Their merit in a literary point of view is of course trifling, and they may be set down as rising to about the ordinary standard of religious tracts. It is difficult to say what may be the tastes of consumers of that kind of intellectual food, and perhaps our verdict would not be of any great weight with them. We will therefore content ourselves with bearing testimony to the fact that the book is perfectly harmless, that it contains nothing likely to disturb the most infantile powers of digestion, and that, if it does either good or harm, we see no reason to doubt that the good will distinctly preponderate. To criticize such a production seriously would be a complete waste of labour, but it may be just worth while to notice it as a picture of one phase of human character. There are a great many people in the world who sit at the feet of Mr. Elihu Burritt and teachers endowed with similar qualifications for the prophetic office. Although we do not share their reverence, we could not afford, even if we were inclined, to despise their sentiments. They have the importance due to numbers and to an average degree of intelligence. If we could look upon our own time from a purely philosophical point of view, it would perhaps be as important to understand the tendencies of the lower stratum of the middle classes as those of the more cultivated thinkers who flatter themselves that they have pierced to the essence of things. After all, many philosophers talk as great nonsense as any human being can talk, though the fact is concealed from their own generation.

Let us endeavour, then, to sum up the principal articles of the Burritt creed. It is short, simple, and, in a certain sense, undeniably true. Mr. Burritt is a philanthropist of the most cosmopolitan aspirations. His ideal is a vast confederation of mankind in which there shall be no war, no drunkenness, no slavery, and a universal system of penny postage. This last improvement seems to occupy a rather disproportionate space in his anticipations of the future. For England, in the warmest outpourings of enthusiastic philanthropy, he can find no better title than "Land of the Penny Post"! Rising to his loftiest mood, he remarks:—"Sunbeam of summer, what is like thee? sung a sweet spirit whose poetry was the breath of flowers. Had she lived to witness the light of gladness which Rowland Hill's great boon diffuses every morning through thousands of English homes, she might have answered, One thing is like thee—it is the PENNY POST." And he proceeds, in a glowing rhapsody, to point out the close resemblance between the post and the sunbeam. This was written before the adoption of a similar system in America; but, if we may put any faith in Mr. Reverdy Johnson's promises, we may see before long the adoption of an ocean penny post, and then the analogy between the post and sunbeams will be, if possible, stronger. We fear that Mr. Burritt's other anticipations have scarcely the chance of so rapid a fulfilment. War, he says, costs a great deal of money and a vast number of lives, and it ought to be speedily put down. With a touching persistency he republishes an essay written some twenty years ago, proving by the arguments then so familiar that the cause of universal peace was about to triumph. There was the great meeting at Paris, where Cobden and Victor Hugo sat beside Carové of Germany and Durker of Wisconsin, U.S. The Brussels Congress, the great arbitration movement in England, and the noble demonstration in Paris, all transpired, he says, within the space of eleven months. "Contrast the progress of those eleven months with that of the preceding eleven years, and see if it has not proved that we are reaching onwards to the grand consummation of that cause by an intense ratio of geometrical progression." Unluckily we can now contrast it with the progress of the next twenty years, and if we would adopt this ingenious mode of reasoning, we should have cause to infer that we are going backward to the ages of incessant warfare by an equally rapid progress. Within that time every great nation of Europe and America has been carrying on desperate wars with its neighbours or itself. Poor Mr. Elihu Burritt recommended his countrymen to abolish slavery by compensating the owners instead of by fighting. He remarks pathetically that they have spent ten times more in money alone than would have been sufficient to carry out his peaceful plan. We rather think that the war has converted many American peace advocates to the conclusion that there are certain questions which, in the present stage of civilization, can only be settled by downright brute force; and if a further dream of Mr. Burritt's should ever be carried out, this principle will receive a few further illustrations. Looking at matters from an American point of view, he cannot see why there should be more than three nations in Continental Europe. Every clear-sighted American, we are told, sees this to be inevitable. Sweden is as near to Germany as Ireland to Great Britain; and by dividing Europe into three parts, none of the resulting nations would have a greater population than that which will occupy the United States in another generation or so. Thus Germany should take in Denmark, Sweden, Switzerland, and the whole of Italy. France should include not only Belgium, but Holland, and, more strangely still, Spain and Portugal. Russia would of course occupy Greece and Turkey and the Principalities. What would become of poor little England we know not; perhaps it would be taken under the wing of the great Western Republic. Why Mr. Burritt should go so far and then stop it is not easy to see. One great recommendation of this ingenious plan is that the mixture of different nationalities would tend to counteract their faults The French vivacity, for example, would be advantageously tempered by Dutch phlegm; and the lymphatic temperament of the German race would be all the better for admixture with the more fiery South. Whilst he is about it, he might as well have stirred up the whole mass into one homogeneous whole, and mixed a gigantic salad from the various elements of European civilization. Of course this is all to be brought about peaceably, and perhaps in another thousand years or so our descendants may enjoy a millennium in which Europe will be occupied by a vast population of many hundreds of millions of people, with no marked differences, and all of them, if we may venture an anticipation on our own account, strongly resembling Mr. Elihu Burritt; for, of course, every social reformer thinks that reform consists essentially in making every one else as like as possible to himself.

We are in the habit of laughing at peacemakers; and yet they might retort upon us with apparent fairness. Can you really say, they may ask, that our dreams are not better than your cynicism? We look forward to the advent of universal peace, and advocate it on grounds of commerce and Christianity. Laugh if you will, but how dispute the statement that a good many millions a year would be saved, and that the world would be much better if our policy were adopted? Pascal was surely right when he said that it was wicked for men to cut each other's throats simply because they lived on opposite sides of a river; and Voltaire, when he demonstrated that men in all ages had been immense fools for murdering each other by wholesale instead of settling their disputes by pure reason. If the scorners would lay aside their cynicism, they would remove the great obstacle to the advent of common sense and universal peace. They have no right to mock at our enthusiasm when their mockery is the very thing which makes it visionary. Even if we grant that war once had its uses, may we not hasten the good time when we shall be able to dispense with what is already an anomaly, and which becomes more anomalous in proportion as we can induce men to cherish our dreams? Certainly, we make no direct objections to this. It is very likely well that Burritts should flourish, and that many people should receive in such form as is most suitable to their minds the truth that war is a great evil which sometime or other may be expected to disappear. Even the most prosaic of visions, the dullest millennium that was ever pictured by a Quaker or a cottonspinner, is better than a simple acquiescence in the existing evils of the world. Only we would suggest to Mr. Burritt's school that there is a weak point in their argument, which they may as well consider, and which is illustrated by the cases we have just noticed. The ardent abolitionists of America were for the most part peacemakers. Mr. Hosea Biglow denounced slavery, an equally denounced war:—

> As for war, I call it murder,
> There you hev it plain and flat;
> I don't want to go no further > Than my Testament for that.

Unluckily, in the existing state of human nature, the cry fo abolition led of necessity to war. It was all very well to say tha human nature ought to be better. Undoubtedly it ought; bu meanwhile you must be content either to abandon your denunciations of evil or to abandon your hopes of peace. If the world i to be imbued with an ardent aspiration for gathering Europe int three great nations, it will undoubtedly have to fight for its realization. The prophet can excite believers, but unluckily he only produces a counter-irritation in the mass of non-believers. He does not bring peace into the world, but a sword; and to say that he is not responsible for the evil which he indirectly produces is to make as good an excuse as a man who should put a match into a powder-magazine, and say that he had requested it to blow up softly. Some people have extended thei dislike to capital punishment to a dislike to all punishment whatever. We should all sympathize with them most heartily if they would only persuade other people to give up crime. For the present, an objection to war is much of the same value. It will simply leave the tyrants and military zealots, who will no listen to the charming of Mr. Burritt, to have their own way; and, on the whole, we consider that there was better logic in the decision of the last Peace Congress, who proposed to prepare the way for universal peace by finishing up all the arrears of war, and settling every conceivable question permanently and once for all. In short, it is the characteristic of narrow-minded reformers to propose the absolute suppression of some symptom of social disease without trying to suppress its causes; yet we may hope that what is sensible in their efforts will not be thrown away, and that they will gradually increase the reluctance to appeal to brute force. And as Mr. Burritt is an amiable as well as a "learned blacksmith," we will take leave of him on good terms, with the expression of this sincere wish.

GERMAN LITERATURE.

A BIOGRAPHICAL dictionary of dates *, giving the periods of the chief events in the life of every person of celebrity, would be an invaluable work, requiring for its satisfactory accomplishment, not only great erudition and perseverance, but also much judgment and discrimination. It may be feared that Herr Oettinger is somewhat deficient in these latter qualities. His plan is at once too narrow and too wide. The dates of birth, marriage, and death, which are all he gives, are acceptable so far as they go, but only go a little way. The compiler virtually acknowledges the insufficiency of his system on arriving at Napoleon Buonaparte. His heart fails him here; he cannot content himself with the bare information that the great Corsican was born, married, and died; and, in contempt of his own principle, he records the dates of the chief events of his life. What has been done here should have been done everywhere, and the necessary space should have been obtained by the sacrifice of the innumerable insignificant names which encumber the work. We are not solicitous for information respecting "Audovera, consort of King Chilperic," or "Henrietta Hedwig, divorced from Johann Ludwig von Sandersleben, and subsequently espoused to the Duke of Wurtemberg-Mumpelgard." Herr Oettinger also seems to labour under the delusion that every English peer is ipso facto a statesman, which has crowded his work with names much better known at Newmarket than at St. Stephen's. His omissions are sometimes as surprising as his insertions; it is, for instance, to his credit to have discovered Mr. Daniel Wakefield the Chancery barrister, but how the diligence that unearthed Daniel should have failed to detect Edward Gibbon Wakefield is very difficult to imagine. A work of this kind can hardly be satisfactorily accomplished by one writer, or indeed by a committee of writers of the same nation. Foreigners cannot be expected to possess an exhaustive and accurate knowledge of the history and literature of other nations. A Spanish collaborator would have saved Herr Oettinger from making St. Francis Borgia an Italian; an English colleague would have informed him that Robert and Elizabeth Browning were poets, and that the designation Schriftsteller was as inappropriate to them as it would have been to Tennyson, whose marriage, by the way, has escaped his research, and who hence makes no more conspicuous figure in his pages than the humblest son of Apollo. One notice is particularly amusing from its meagreness, that of Nancy Parsons. As nobody knows when she was born, and Herr Oettinger does not know when she died, and she probably dispensed with the marriage ceremony, she is simply recorded as "an English actress, dates unknown." Why, then, mention her at all in a dictionary of dates? On the whole, we must regard this enormous, and in many respects meritorious, volume rather as the skeleton of a future edifice than as an edifice itself.

Austria is at present out of fashion in Germany; she is the scapegoat on which the sins of the nation are laid. Germans are naturally unwilling to attribute their long disunion and comparative impotence to defects in the national character. An equally specious and much more agreeable explanation is readily found, now in the blind bigotry, now in the selfish policy, of the State which so long aspired to lead the nation. Any inquiry whether Austria's successful rival might not be equally open to the same indictment would probably be discountenanced as impertinent and unseasonable. Under these circumstances, it is surprising to find any history of the vituperated State, especially one written by a Professor in the Prussian dominions, so favourable as the posthumous work of Professor Perthes.* The explanation must probably be sought in the writer's personal or political affinities. However this may be, his impartiality even degenerates into indulgence. Although a Protestant himself, he is ready to defend that alliance with the Court of Rome which has occasioned half the misfortunes of Austria, and which her statesmen would now so willingly dissolve. The work is, however, pleasingly written, displays much skill in arrangement and condensation, and contains many interesting sketches of celebrities, especially one of Gentz. It is incomplete, but reaches the days of Napoleon.

Herr Burckhardt's work on the Italian Renaissance † would demand a very elaborate notice if it were perfectly new. Although a republication, it yet deserves to be indicated as a mine of information in this much misrepresented era of human development. Puritan intolerance, though assuming a different form and manifested in a different way, has desecrated the shrines of the Renaissance as effectually as it did the cathedrals of the middle ages. The conscientious effort after absolute perfection, visible in all the artistic and intellectual creations of the period, has been persistently represented as narrowness, conceit, and sensuality. It is Herr Burckhardt's merit to insist on the romantic aspect of the epoch. He shows not only its strength and its refinement, but its genuine simplicity, displayed in a fashion which, in the nature of things, can never be repeated. The ancient world can have no second resurrection; there can be no other such thrill of amazement and admiration as then penetrated all orders of society, and of which the author adduces many most interesting and even touching examples. The chivalrous sentiment of the middle ages was not extinguished; it was merely transferred to a different class of objects, but for which influx of ideas Europe would have become as stagnant as the East. The author, for instance, shows how the pensive feeling evoked by the contemplation of antique ruins, unappreciated until then, became an important factor in the modern sentiment for landscape. Herr Burckhardt is more successful in the accumulation than in the arrangement of his materials; but his work is nevertheless a treasury of information interspersed with picturesque traits and anecdotes.

Baron von Maltzan ‡ is already known to us as an adventurous and entertaining traveller in Arabia, and we find him again on what, if not geographically, is perhaps essentially, the most Oriental district of Europe. Sardinia was for ages debateable ground between the children of Shem and of Japheth, and to this day sufficient traces of Phœnician and Saracenic occupation remain to repay the careful attention of Orientalists. More curious still are the nondescript remnants of a pre-historic religion, leavened with the ideas of Greece, Egypt, and Phœnicia; and the nuraghe or ancient forts, the counterparts of the round towers of Ireland, of which, more truly than of the Pyramids, it may be said that they have forgotten the names of their founders. The archæological element is copiously represented in Baron von Maltzan's book, which is profusely illustrated with engravings of the objects described. Personal narrative is not lacking, and there is a perfect opulence of information respecting towns, landscapes, manners and customs, the political and social condition of the country, its commerce, natural productions, and geological conformation. There is also a most interesting chapter on the language and literature of the island. The former would appear to be a remarkably fine dialect of Italian, approximating to the Spanish type (Lusbe, the name of the evil spirit which so puzzles Baron von Maltzan, is the Spanish Luzbel), exquisitely musical, and capable of a high degree of cultivation. The most valuable part of the literature is the poetical, which is chiefly amorous or religious. The estrangement and imperfect civilization of the island have been favourable to the local muse, who will probably be dislodged from her haunts when the inhabitants have learned to look upon themselves as Italians. According to the Baron, they have invariably yielded but a grudging submission to the Piedmontese, but are perfectly contented to be comprehended along with their former masters in the general union of Italy. Baron von Maltzan's work is evidently to a considerable extent a compilation, but there is enough of independent research to maintain amply his credit as a traveller.

Herr Titus Tobler §, the renowned and veteran topographer of the Holy Land, has added to the numerous obligations under which he has already laid all students in this department of knowledge, by a most elaborate treatise on Nazareth. Dissatisfied with his personal exploration of the locality, and unable from age and infirmity to supplement it by a second expedition, he has applied to the resident missionary, Zeller, who has furnished him with categorical answers to no less than two hundred queries, and also with a plan of the city. Tobler's gigantic industry, and perfect acquaintance with whatever has been written on the subject, have done the rest, and enabled him to produce a work moderate indeed in compass, but teeming with information, historical, topographical, and archæological. It may not be generally known that a pillar in the convent at Nazareth emulates Mahomet's coffin by remaining suspended in the air. In this case the explanation of the mystery is not far to seek—the column is indeed disconnected from the floor, but by no means from the ceiling. The miracle does not suffer on this account in the estimation of the pilgrims.

"From Eden to Golgotha"* is a very different sort of topography from the prosaic but sober and accurate labours of Titus Tobler. The conception is good; the writer proposes to accompany the Hebrew race through every stage of their eventful history, and, as the scene of action shifts from age to age, to bring the light of his research to bear upon the constantly varying features of geography, philology, and ethnology. No way deficient in the learning demanded by his task, he is so to a most unfortunate degree in the humbler, but not less essential, requisite of a sound judgment. The work starts with an enormous paradox. Determined to allow nothing for the play of imagination, and bent on finding a literal interpretation for every legendary passage, the author insists on assigning a specific locality for Eden. Others have done the same, but no one before, we should suppose, ever dreamt of pitching Paradise upon Lebanon, and there discovering Pison and Gihon, Havilah and Hiddekel, bdellium and the onyx-stone. It may be easily conceived what tortures this remarkable hypothesis inflicts upon the original, and upon a hundred other passages cited in illustration. Almost every chapter of the book embodies some theory equally eccentric.

The appearance of a second edition of the last volume of Ewald's "History of the People of Israel" † affords us an opportunity of noticing Ewald's emphatic condemnation of the Tübingen school in the preface. Writers in France, Holland, and this country often speak as if the extravagances of these critics—especially their notable discovery of the late origin of the Acts—were generally accepted in Germany. It should be known that the reverse is the case. Baur's extreme is not a whit more respectable than Hengstenberg's in the eyes of Ewald.

Dr. von Haneberg's "Religious Antiquities of the Bible" ‡ comprise an exceedingly full and careful account, in the first place, of all temples, tabernacles, sacred vessels and ornaments; and in the second of all liturgical and other religious rites, ceremonies, and observances. The writer professes to have devoted an unusual amount of attention to the traditions, commentaries, and modern practices of Judaism.

Schleicher's "Indo-German Chrestomathy" § carries out the excellent idea of publishing select passages from all the ancient Indo-European languages in the same volume, so as to afford materials for a ready comparison among themselves. The purest texts have been chosen for the purpose; thus, Sanscrit is represented by a passage from the Mahabarata, Zend by one from the Yaçna, Old Persian by the Behistun inscriptions, Umbrian by the Iguvan Tables, and so on. A glossary of each language is added, and a few notes.

Moritz Schmidt's "Lycian Studies" ‖ consist principally of two indexes, in which the words of the inscriptions are respectively classed according to their initials and their terminations. An appendix contains some attempts at the restoration of mutilated inscriptions; and Dr. Pertsch contributes an essay on the bilingual inscription known as "the decree of Pixodaros."

The first instalment of a work of large promise for both theology and Egyptology lies before us in Dr. Ebers' "Egypt and the Books of Moses."¶ In thus reversing the title of Hengstenberg's work of 1841, he indicates at once that their ways will be diametrically opposite. In speaking of that production, the author deals leniently enough with a theologian of an obsolete school, who could so far give way to his "party stand-point" as to speak of the Egyptians as "a people who had as little historical sense as the Indians," evidently forgetting not merely the pyramids and temples, teeming with mementos and written tokens intended for the very latest generations of man, but also that other characteristic fact, that their very workmen's tools were covered with hieroglyphics. Yet even if Hengstenberg had been competent to illustrate the Bible from Egyptian monuments, there now lies almost a generation between that first effort and the present attempt; and how great has been the wealth of information since acquired is known even to the uninitiated. The Papyrus Anastasi I. gives—to mention but two facts—an account of Canaan and Palestine, then unknown, while the Leyden Papyrus speaks of the Hebrews who were carting stones for the city of Ramses at the very time when it was written. Dr. Ebers also, instead of having to believe blindly what Egyptologists told him, is able everywhere to look for himself. The volume before us carries us only as far as Pharaoh's dreams, but the amount of interesting Egyptian material in Genesis, together with the valuable ethnological investigations which the author found it necessary to add, is so prodigious, that we almost wonder that he has been able to bring so much into this one instalment. A linguistic introduction on hieroglyphics and their deciphering is followed by geographical chapters on Egypt and the River Gihon. Next comes the genealogical table in Genesis, the discussion of whose bearings and difficulties alone might fill a volume of its own. The Egyptians, the Hamites, and the sons of Mizraim, are separately treated of in many special divisions and subdivisions. The question of the Caphtorim and the Phœnicians—that people which begins to claim more and more attention every day—together with their indigenous sources of information, is next gone into. Here we first enter upon Egypt as such, its remains, literary and otherwise; and the "Hyksos" brings us finally to the Patriarchs and their surroundings. We would neither subscribe to all our author's conclusions, nor could we conscientiously recommend the book as light and graceful reading. But those who wish to see the latest results of these out-of-the-way studies brought before them by a trustworthy Egyptologist will be glad to turn to this book, the value of which is enhanced by a number of carefully executed illustrations.

The origin of language is an abstruse subject, which loses none of its abstruseness in the hands of Herr Geiger.* If his views are correct, but at the same time incapable of being presented in a more comprehensible and popular form, it can only be said that this department of truth is not likely to be accessible to many in our generation. When, quitting generalities, he descends to the region of facts, his style becomes sufficiently clear, and his matter entertaining.

Dr. Köstlin † is not obnoxious to the complaint of impenetrable obscurity frequently preferred against æsthetic writers. Nothing can be more simple and decisive than his convictions; he is perfectly satisfied that a handsome face is better than an ugly one, and fully alive to the distinction between an opera and a pantomime. The youth of the University of Tübingen will learn no æsthetic heresies rom their teacher; it is another question whether they will learn anything beyond the art of wrapping up commonplaces in pompous verbiage.

"The Gods and Heroes of Greece" ‡, by Otto Seemann, combines Hellenic art with Hellenic mythology, the æsthetic element perhaps preponderating. Both divisions of the subject are lucidly treated, and the accompanying illustrations are numerous and excellent, all the chief museums of Europe having been laid under contribution.

Dr. Naumann's work on Physical Science and Materialism § is directed to prove that the latter derives no support from the former. His modus operandi is to choose out a single work as a representative of the materialistic school, and refute it paragraph by paragraph. His choice has fallen upon Büchner's well-known Kraft und Stoff. Materialists have been too ready to extol this superficial and arrogant book to have a right to complain of Dr. Naumann's selection, or of the castigation he bestows on a conceited sciolist. For Dr. Naumann's own sake it may be wished that he had chosen a more formidable opponent, or at least that he had profited by his opponent's example of terseness and conciseness. The latter has time and space on his side, and we apprehend they will prove more than a match for all Dr. Naumann's arguments.

Ludwig Nohl's "Sketchbook" ‖ consists of various essays on music, giving a general survey of the present state of musical matters at Munich, now one of the European centres of the art, in virtue of the King of Bavaria's patronage and amateurship. As all the world knows, the royal taste is the reverse of orthodox, which may or may not be a deplorable circumstance in itself, but has at all events the advantage of securing new ideas a fair chance for existence. Few innovators in art or any other department of human activity have propounded their views under such favourable circumstances as Herr Wagner. If not an entire convert to Wagner's theories, Nohl is a decided admirer of his practice. His elaborate essay on the composer's last work, "The Mastersingers," is the most interesting part of his volume, the rather as it will probably be a very long time before this opera is performed out of Germany.

"Reminiscences of Mendelssohn," * by the celebrated actor Devrient, form an acceptable supplement to the volumes of correspondence published by the family, but go only a very little way towards supplying the desideratum of a complete biography. The period of Devrient's chief intimacy with Mendelssohn was that of Mendelssohn's youth, when he was between thirteen and twenty-one, and consequently that when information respecting him is of least importance. Much that naturally appears delightful in the biographer's recollection seems trivial in his narrative; we are, however, indebted to him for some really interesting glimpses of the interior of the Mendelssohn household, and of the method pursued with Felix's education. Some casual sketches of other notabilities are graphic; Zelter's ruggedness is well portrayed, and so is the languid conceit which Heine affected in society. There is an amusing picture of Varnhagen—his wife's Boswell—hovering at a respectful distance around that intellectual queen of Berlin society, and eagerly inquiring after any remark of hers which had failed to reach him. After Mendelssohn's departure from Berlin, his intercourse with Devrient was of necessity only epistolary, and his few letters, though interesting, cannot for a moment be compared with those addressed to his own family. There is no stronger symptom of the goodness of Mendelssohn's heart than the inspiration which always came over him when his powers were invoked for the entertainment of his own circle. After several years Mendelssohn returned to Berlin at the invitation of Frederick William IV., who expected the regeneration of Prussian music at his hands. With an instinctive perception of the situation, Mendelssohn wished to abandon this ill-starred project from the first, and it was chiefly in deference to Devrient's advice that he persisted in the undertaking which eventually occasioned him so much chagrin. His resignation again interrupted his personal relations with his biographer. It should be added that the irritable as well as the amiable side of Mendelssohn's nature is brought out in this sketch, but that the portrait gains thereby more in vividness than it loses in attractiveness.

Wasielewski †, the meritorious biographer of Schumann, has produced another work which will be highly appreciated by musicians. The first part contains a history of violins and violin-makers, the second and more extensive is devoted to composers and performers on the instrument. Violinists have in general been the most erratic of the musical fraternity, and the romantic incidents of their lives will be found such as to repay others besides strictly musical readers for perusing Wasielewski's biography.

Albert Hahn's edition of Mozart's Requiem ‡ comprises a commentary, a comparison of variations between the standard edition and the original manuscript, a new German translation, and a very disparaging criticism of the old one, which certainly appears a conspicuous exception to the usual fidelity and spirit of versions in this language.

THE BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE OF LORDS.

THE House of Lords has struck for more work. It is indignant at its enforced leisure, and at the ridicule entailed on it by having nothing to do for four months, and by then being called on to pass a vast variety of Bills, under the dictation of the Commons, in the hot days of July. Lord SALISBURY, as a peer capable of doing real work and eager to do it, especially frets at having to stand thus idle in the legislative market-place because no man will hire him. He cannot find any consolation in being told, on the authority of the late Lord ABERDEEN, that the abuse of which he complains has lasted for at least fifty years. What he says, and says perfectly truly, is that he finds himself a member of a body which is called a legislative body, and which does nominally concur in a vast amount of annual legislation, but which has no real legislative power. The Lords, as he says, only sit to register the edicts of the Commons. Now, on any possible theory of the present uses of the House of Lords, this must be wrong. Supposing we adopt the Archbishop of YORK's theory, and say that the main function of the House of Lords is to scrutinize the measures of the Commons, still the Lords ought to have time and opportunity given them sufficient to make the scrutiny effective. But when all the legislation of a Session is sent up to them in a mass, they cannot exercise any scrutiny which is at all worthy of the name. They must take the Bills as they find them, or render the labours of the Commons altogether nugatory. Rather than do this, they pass Act after Act the operation of which is wholly uncertain, and the clauses of which are totally unintelligible. The next year sees Bills for amending the Acts of the year before, and the next year Bills to amend the amended Acts; and so English legislation goes on continually being built up with the least method and skill ever shown in the legislation of any civilized country. From much of this chaotic confusion in Acts of Parliament the Lords would be perfectly able to rescue the country if only the chance were given them. But it is not practically recognised that their business is to scrutinize the measures of the Commons. In real life the Lords are expected, not to improve the measures of the Commons, but to pass them as they stand. The only function accorded them is a sham legislative function. Naturally they resent so humiliating a position being thrust on them; but what are they to do? Every now and then they threaten that they will not pass Bills sent up to them by the Commons after a certain day, and Lord SALISBURY indulges in the hope that he will be able to keep them firm in their resolution this year if they will join with him in saying that the Peers, rather than pass Bills which they are not permitted to discuss, will reject them. This has been tried, but has hitherto been tried in vain. When the pinch comes, the Lords give way. They will not stay in London, to fight the Government day after day, after the season is over. They shrink from the odium of having it said that, from mere pique and from jealousy of their privileges, they are bent on depriving the country of legislation that it needs. By a bold effort a resolute, energetic man like Lord SALISBURY might during one year perhaps succeed in whipping up an opposition in the Lords that would reject a large batch of Bills because they had come up from the Commons a day later than the time which, in the exercise of a purely arbitrary discretion, the Lords had chosen to say was the limit within which they must come up. But it is obvious that this could not be repeated. The House of Commons would next year send up its Bills too late, and the Government of the day would make every exertion to get the Lords to yield. And the Government of the day would be sure to win sooner or later. As Lord SALISBURY confessed, it was not a party question, and a Conservative Government would work just as hard as a Liberal Government to induce the Lords not to render the legislation of the Commons fruitless. When once the Lords had yielded to the entreaties of a Conservative Government, the precedent would be established, and a Liberal Government would claim to be treated on an equal footing. Some years ago a resolution not to proceed with Bills sent up after a certain date was adopted in the most formal manner by the House of Lords. But the proviso was added, that Bills sent up after that date might be proceeded with if of great importance. The Bill establishing Partnerships with Limited Liability was sent up too late, and the Government of the day moved that it was a Bill so important that it ought to be proceeded with. It was exactly the kind of Bill that the Lords were entitled and competent to discuss fully and fairly, but they were cut out of all effectual discussion of it by a resolution stating that it was an important Bill, and it passed into law with the merely nominal assent of the Peers.

The difficulty which lies at the bottom of the whole question of the proper functions of the House of Lords is far too deep and wide to be met by resolutions of the Peers not to do this or that except at their own time and on their own conditions. This difficulty is, that legislation is not now the enactment of measures which wise men think the best for the nation, but the enactment of measures which the nation, through its representatives, wishes to pass. All legislation implies change, and the instruments of legislation will vary according as the motive power of change resides in one set of persons or in another. The Lords may possibly represent some classes in England, but they do not represent the classes in which the motive power of change resides. They are thus necessarily cut out of the sphere of legislation, and every day their exclusion becomes more complete. Theoretically it seems as if the Cabinet would do wisely to bring some of its measures forward in the Lords, and some in the Commons, but each measure in turn seems important when the leaders of the Ministry examine it; and, if it is important, it is important because some considerable section of the classes in whom the motive power of change resides wishes for it and needs it. But if people care about it, they naturally wish their own representatives to discuss, modify, and improve it, on their behalf; and so each measure in turn seems as if it must go to the Commons first. Lord GRANVILLE himself said that he was taken by surprise at hearing that no Government measure was to be introduced in the Lords; he had quite hoped for two at least to be allotted to the Upper House. He promised to do his best to get some work for the Lords to do, and he has been partially successful. The Lords are to have two Government measures to discuss at once, the Scotch Education Bill and the Bill for the Repression of Crime. The Law Lords pleaded hard for having the Bankruptcy Bill also brought back to them. It is, in a sense, the Bill of the Lords, for the Upper House has for some time worked very hard at Bankruptcy Bills, and it might be thought that in a Bill dealing with a very wide and complex branch of law, the professional skill of the Law Lords might be most advantageously utilized. But the CHANCELLOR, who was inclined at first to think that the Bankruptcy Bill should begin in the Lords, says now that this cannot be. In spite of all complaints from his legal friends among the Peers, he adheres to his resolution. His reason is most significant. The Bankruptcy Bill necessarily interests the great centres of trade and manufacture, and the large towns all wish the Bill to begin in the Commons. They are not satisfied with having a Bill drawn by competent and skilful persons like the Law Lords and the more intelligent Peers; they want their own men, the men who represent them, the men they have sent to Parliament, to have the moulding and handling of the Bill. The Peers say that the object might be effected equally well by having the views of the leading persons in large trading towns communicated to the Lords by deputations, petitions, and so forth. This brings us to the root of the matter. The commercial towns are not satisfied with submitting views to mere non-traders. They want their fellow-traders, whom they have elected, and who know exactly where the shoe pinches, to have a say in the making of an Act which will affect them every day of their lives in a hundred different ways.

As they could not resist the appeal of Lord GRANVILLE, and naturally did not wish to wound the feelings of the Peers on the eve of a renewal of the contest about the Irish Church, the Government decided to hand over two Bills to the Lords, and the two which they thought might best be handed over to them were the Bill for the Repression of Crime and the Bill for Regulating Education in Scotland. The only reason for choosing these two must have been that the objections to giving them up to the Lords were rather slighter than the objections to transferring any other of the Government measures from the Commons. But the objection to letting these Bills begin in the Lords, and especially to letting the Scotch Education Bill begin in the Lords, are very considerable. The legislation of the House of Lords on Scotch Education must almost inevitably be a piece of sham legislation. A Scotch Education Bill, to be acceptable to the Scotch people, must be a very liberal measure. It must take that side in educational matters which is warmly opposed by the majority of both our old Universities, by four Bishops out of five, by the vast majority of the English clergy, and by the bulk of the Conservative party. The Bill introduced by the Duke of ARGYLL virtually applies compulsory rating in aid of secular education. This Bill has been introduced into an assembly composed mainly of English Bishops, English University Conservatives, and Scotch Peers, who not only do not represent the political opinions of Scotland, but are elected for the precise reason that they hold the views of the large landowners, not those of the Scotch people. If such an assembly were possessed of real legislative power, if it could do what it pleased with the Scotch Education Bill, it would make mincemeat of it. It would either reject it at once, or would cut it up and mend it and patch it until it had quite changed its nature. That this will happen is not likely, because the House of Lords will scarcely venture to assume legislative power with regard to such a Bill. It will think that Scotland ought to please itself about such a measure. English Bishops will hardly like to legislate adversely to the wishes of a Presbyterian society. Nor will the House of Lords wish to begin its business by stifling at the outset one of the two little Bills it has got hold of with so much trouble. It will therefore, perhaps, adopt the Government measure without much alteration. But this is only registering an edict of the House of Commons beforehand instead of afterwards. The Lords will but declare that they are prepared to assent to what they understand would please the Scotch members in the House of Commons. This is not legislation in the sense in which the House of Commons legislates. It is only such an arrangement of sham legislation as seems to keep up a little the dignity of the Peers. When we enter on so difficult an investigation as that of ascertaining the true function of the House of Lords in modern England, we necessarily begin by clearing the ground and discovering the direction in which efforts to give new activity to the Peers will be futile. It is not without regret that we are forced to the conclusion that the Peers cannot emerge out of their present false position, either by any resolution not to proceed with business sent up after a certain date, or by getting one or two minor Government Bills entrusted to them at the beginning of the Session.

SPAIN.

THE Constituent Cortes seem to have commenced their functions with moderation and prudence. The Republican minority, conscious of its weakness in the Assembly, was compelled to console itself by protestations that the Provisional Government had interfered with the freedom of election. A party never appeals to the alleged opinion of the people until it despairs of Parliamentary success. It is useless to argue that the Cortes are incompetent to determine the questions which have been formally referred to their decision, for there is no other visible authority to compete with them as long as they act in harmony with the Executive Government. It is highly probable that the Ministers have exercised an influence which would be considered undue in England, but the constitutional traditions of the Continent are less intolerant of official dictation. One of the Ministers aptly replied to a charge of bribery by the remark that the Republicans had in some districts offered a gigantic bribe, in the form of a repartition of private property. It is wrong perhaps to purchase a vote, but the offence is considerably aggravated if the means of corruption are provided by a preliminary process of spoliation. A further objection to the actual constitution of the Cortes is founded on the exclusion from the suffrage of all persons under twenty-five years of age; and the Republicans naturally assert, with more or less truth, that the youth of Spain shares their opinions. A sweeping measure of disfranchisement, in the form of a decree issued by the Government, may perhaps appear to be anomalous; but Marshal SERRANO and his colleagues had no better legal right to grant universal suffrage in name than to limit its operation by exceptions. A qualification founded on age is less invidious than any other mode of diminishing the danger of a promiscuous franchise, and probably the limitation has not injuriously affected the wisdom and calmness of the constituencies. Even if it is true that the younger generation of Spaniards is Republican, there is no reason to believe that experience will fail to produce the wholesome scepticism which ordinarily comes with advancing years. ARISTOTLE, if he is correctly quoted by HECTOR in Troilus and Cressida, thought young men unfit to attend lectures in moral philosophy. It is still more undesirable that they should teach their elders either theory or practice. If the Spaniards who have not yet reached twenty-five retain their Republican opinions a few years hence, they will have abundant opportunities of testing their philosophy by experiment.

The moderate majority of the Cortes has resolved to prolong, with a formal alteration, the power of the Provisional Government. Marshal SERRANO is to hold a position corresponding in some respects to the old English title of Protector, but with more limited powers. Some years ago ESPARTERO occupied a similar rank, under the name of Regent; but a Regency implies the existence of a King. The Cortes retains to itself the right of revoking the powers which it has conferred; and, while the temporary arrangement lasts, Spain may be regarded as a Republic under an Assembly exercising supreme power, both legislative and executive. The Republican party in the French Constituent Assembly of 1848 wished to make a similar system permanent, and their foresight was justified by the subsequent conduct of a President who derived his title directly from the people. The English Constitution has within fifty or sixty years placed the Executive authority in the hands of a Minister who is virtually appointed and dismissed by the House of Commons. If SERRANO were a Parliamentary leader instead of a military chief, he would resemble a First Lord of the Treasury without a titular Sovereign above him. He probably owes his appointment in some degree to a mediocrity which furnishes no cause of alarm either to his colleagues or to the Cortes. It is understood that PRIM cordially approves of a selection which will leave him substantial power without unnecessarily ostensible responsibility. The most solid and real authority in Spain will long be inseparable from the command of the army; and PRIM has apparently satisfied himself that SERRANO will content himself with a nominally higher post. The arrangement which the Cortes is prepared to adopt will moderate any impatience which either Marshal may have entertained for the definitive settlement of the Constitution. The Duke of MONTPENSIER or King FERDINAND might possibly ascend the throne with the most cordial feelings to the chief promoters of their elevation; but a King could not afford to employ an independent Minister, and he would with still stronger reason be jealous of a permanent Commander-in-Chief. As long as the name of a Republic is avoided, a Government without a King will not be associated in the popular mind with subversive social doctrines. Time will show whether PRIM has a secure hold on the affections of the army, which still retains the same ultimate power which it possessed under O'DONNELL and NARVAEZ.

The Cortes, having apparently adjourned the choice of a King, are about to employ themselves on the questionable task of establishing a Constitution. In the present temper of the nation, it seems not improbable that religious liberty will be affirmed in principle, even if it is found necessary in practical administration to humour the prejudices of the people. In other respects there is little for the Cortes to do in the way of organic legislation. Many previous Constitutions include the most enlightened novelties of modern Liberalism, as they have been propounded by the authors of successive revolutions. No country has for a generation enjoyed larger verbal franchises than Spain, although, unluckily, the Ministers, the satellites of the Court, and, above all, the chiefs of the army, have governed according to their respective interests and inclinations. The majority of the Cortes, which three or four years ago was arrested for presenting a loyal address to the QUEEN, possessed privileges not less ample than those which are claimed by the House of Commons. The political difference between the two countries consists not so much in their Constitutions or their laws as in the national modes of thought. The Constituent Cortes may perhaps do some good by reaffirming truisms which have been hitherto systematically accepted and disregarded. The late revolution affords a proof that Spaniards are not content with the anomalous system which has long prevailed. After a time it will perhaps be understood, in Spain as in England, that interference with the personal liberty of the most obnoxious politician is a grave offence against the community. The Provisional Government was probably unconscious of committing an illegal or irregular act when the assassins of Burgos were tried by court-martial for a crime committed while all the regular tribunals were in full exercise of their jurisdiction. The equality of all citizens before the law implies that the law itself is not to be suspended or superseded at the pleasure of civil or military authorities.

Marshal PRIM has announced his irrevocable objection to the choice of the Prince of ASTURIAS as King; and SERRANO is still thought to be favourable to the candidature of the Duke of MONTPENSIER. Some ingenious partisan of King FERDINAND has devised the fable that the English Government has formally protested against the contingent union of the whole Peninsula into a single kingdom. The opponents of the Portuguese candidate will probably make a counter-appeal to Spanish jealousy by dwelling on the fact that King FERDINAND is a Prince of the House of COBURG, and a cousin of the King of the BELGIANS and of the future King of ENGLAND. The same ground of alarm was suggested three-and-twenty years ago by M. GUIZOT in the course of his intrigue for the eventual succession of the Duke of MONTPENSIER to the Spanish throne. It was then alleged that the pretender supported by England was a COBURG, and that the interests of France would be gravely compromised by the choice. Well-informed Spaniards must be well aware that England has neither the wish nor the power to interfere with their free disposition of the Crown. For the present the Duke of AOSTA appears to have been forgotten.

On one question all parties in Spain are for the moment united. Liberals and Catholics, Progressionists and Republicans, are equally determined to retain the cherished sovereignty of Cuba. It is not for Englishmen to criticize too harshly a sentiment which exactly reproduces the feeling of their ancestors during the American rebellion. In spite of the indignant protests of the Opposition, and notwithstanding the scandalous mismanagement of the war, the English people, from first to last, cordially shared the resolution of the KING to resent to the utmost the dismemberment of the Empire. The Spaniards of the present day have probably been guilty of graver errors in the administration of Cuba, but they are as patriotic and as proud as the English of a hundred years ago. The malcontents of Cuba naturally seized the opportunity of a revolution in Spain to commence the insurrection which they had long been meditating; but their offence is aggravated, in the judgment of the mother-country, by their selection of a time when popular enthusiasm anticipated the abolition of all domestic and colonial grievances. Some of the planters who have favoured the rebellion may perhaps have been alarmed by the partial agitation against slavery which followed the outbreak of the revolution in the last autumn; but the Provisional Government hinted only at gradual abolition; and in a matter which excites but a lukewarm interest in Spain, the colonists would ultimately have been allowed to determine their own policy. It has never been satisfactorily explained whether the insurrection is favourable or hostile to the liberation of the slaves. In some districts the rebel chiefs have proclaimed freedom to the slaves of loyal proprietors, but they have not yet adopted or avowed any systematic purpose of emancipation. Their principal grievance consists in the alleged preference by the Government of Spanish settlers and functionaries to the native Creoles. The Colonial Office of Spain has never copied the modern English practice of allowing distant dependencies to manage their own affairs, and the local Government of Cuba is administered by strangers, who are generally believed to profit largely by their residence in the island. The injury or affront seems exclusively to affect the higher class of the Cuban population; but there is nothing surprising in the sympathy which the general population apparently feels for their cause. As it appears that the Americans have no intention of interfering on behalf of the insurgents, General DULCE will, with the aid of the reinforcements lately despatched from Spain, almost certainly suppress the rebellion, if he has not already accomplished the task. The vast spaces which were a sufficient defence of the North American colonies are not to be found in Cuba, nor can any intelligent colonist believe that the island can become an independent State. The Spanish army is brave and well disciplined, and the fleet will command every port in Cuba. The struggle may perhaps tend to unite contending parties in Spain, although it will embarrass the administration of the finances.

THE RATES ON WEEKLY TENEMENTS.

A GRIEVANCE which Mr. GLADSTONE promised on the hustings to make an effort to redress as soon as he came into power, and which especially hurts the feelings and vexes the constituents of Mr. BRIGHT, could not be expected to lie long dormant without the attention of the new House of Commons being called to it. The tenants of small cottages at weekly rents were seriously inconvenienced by the Reform Bill of 1867, even after the abolition of the famous Compound Householder had done something to make their position better than that which was originally offered them under the Ministerial scheme. Their real grievance was that the personal payment of rates was inserted almost by accident, as a device for making the Conservative party think that some sort of check still remained after they had abandoned all the principles on which they had opposed a Reform Bill. It was most inconvenient and annoying to these poor people that they should have the great nuisance and trouble of themselves paying their rates, which their landlord was quite willing to pay for them. The nuisance was inflicted on them for no end whatever except to make the Conservative party a little more comfortable for a moment. Long before the Act came into operation the Conservative party ceased to care for rate-paying checks, and went in for the magnificent illusion of a great Conservative residuum. But the annoyance to the weekly tenants, devised to please the Conservatives, remained, and an Act of Parliament provided how it should be inflicted. Even now the mischief cannot be directly repaired. It would be casting a sort of open slight on the Conservative party to repeal the ratepaying clauses of the Reform Bill. In England, long after political parties have ceased to care about measures effete or inoperative, the measures often remain unrepealed because it would wound the vanity or harass the feelings of some set or class of people to have them distinctly abrogated. The Ecclesiastical Titles Bill has been a dead letter since it was passed, but hitherto it has been found impossible to repeal it, because the people who passed it are still powerful, and do not like to confess in plain terms that they were led away by a silly panic. The present Ministry, therefore, have very wisely refrained from proposing that tenants and landlords shall please themselves as to who shall pay the rates, and that the arrangement shall be totally disconnected from the question whether the tenant is to vote; but they want to put the tenant in a comfortable position, and practically to get rid of the nuisance devised for his torture, without seeming to win an evident political triumph. This is a very roundabout, unbusinesslike way of accomplishing a very simple end. But in Parliamentary government such concessions and compromises are necessary; and, if the Ministry can but get a Bill through Parliament which will make the tenants easy without raking up the old jealousies and animosities of the Reform Bill, they will have gained a practical end which, under the circumstances, is probably the best they could achieve.

The astonishing things that may be said and accepted in Parliament when both sides are willing to repeal an Act provided that it is done for courtesy's sake in a roundabout way, were strikingly illustrated on Thursday night when Mr. GOSCHEN introduced the Government measure. The real drift of the measure is to make the landlord pay the rates for the tenant, and Mr. GOSCHEN hazarded the proposition that this fully carried out the principle of the Act of 1867. This principle he boldly declared to be that the rates should be paid by some one, but that it was quite immaterial by whom they were paid. Conservative members whose memories could take them back two years must have smiled at this audacious account of the principle which they then treated as one of life and death. They must have thought of the long hours during which it was unfolded to them by their leaders that the great discovery had been made of one grand abiding Conservative principle which would make any Reform Bill safe, however otherwise democratic. This grand principle was the personal payment of rates by the tenant. The sordid, unfeeling, spiritless outcast who would not go through this amount of trouble in order to exercise the noble privilege of voting was depicted in the blackest colours, while the patriotic tenant saving up his halfpence until the day when he proudly paid the tax-gatherer, and thus bought his right to go to the hustings as an elector, was held up to the justest and the warmest admiration. Here was an infallible test by which for all time the sheep might be divided off from the goats. The sheep whom Conservatives might trust would alone vote, while the naughty goats who hated the bore of personal payment, and whom Conservatives most properly despised and distrusted, should never aid in Americanizing our institutions. And now Conservatives have lived to hear that the rate-paying clauses were never meant to have any political effect, but were solely devised in the interest of the overseer. Their principle was that the rates should be promptly and punctually paid by somebody; but the overseer cannot care by whom they are paid, and so it makes no difference whether one person pays them or another—whether the tenant bores himself by saving up his halfpence and fronting the tax-gatherer like a man, or whether he prefers shifting all the trouble and responsibility on to his landlord. Mr. GOSCHEN felt keenly the humour of his assertion that this was really what the Conservatives meant, and added that, at any rate, the residential qualification remained. In other words, he reminded the Conservatives that if the test on which they relied was really taken altogether away, the test on which the Liberals relied, and which the Conservatives pronounced wholly insufficient, would still be maintained. But he knew he was on safe ground, for he was able to inform the House that the late Government had been scared by the amount of nuisance which their measure had inflicted. Summonses by thousands on thousands were issued against the occupiers of weekly tenements for taxes which had previously been paid by the landlord, and these summonses could not be enforced on account of their number, and the taxes could not be collected from the tenants. There were no less than twenty-five thousand summonses issued in Birmingham, and when so many lambs shepherded by Mr. BRIGHT were annoyed, it was certain that their shepherd would have a word of advice to give to any Ministry that might be in office. Accordingly the Conservative Government instructed their officials that there was no reason why the landlord should not pay the rates, and be looked on as the agent of the tenant. This was very sensible, but it entirely destroyed the famous test of personal payment; and the parochial authorities not only obeyed their instructions, but of their own mere motion restored the dead Compound Householder. They took upon themselves to lower the assessment on houses when the landlord paid the rates, thus offering the very bonus and inducement to the landlords on which the scheme of creating the Compound Householder rested. Mr. GOSCHEN found that the Conservative Government and the overseers had between them virtually repealed the rate-paying clauses of the Reform Act, and all he had to do was to carry out what had been done, but to carry it out in a rather more methodical and systematic way.

The landlord, when he pays the tenant's rates, is accepted as the agent of the tenant. The tenant is held to pay personally for all electoral purposes when he does not pay personally but some one else pays for him. If the landlord consents to pay the rates, the tenant gets his vote quite comfortably, and the ratepaying clauses of the Reform Bill are, for him, non-existent. What the tenant wants is therefore a scheme by which the landlord shall be induced to pay the rates. Under the system of Compound Householders this was done by giving the landlord a bonus. He paid less than the tenant would have paid, but he got back, in the shape of rent, or at least had an opportunity, which he seldom neglected, of getting back, the full rate from the tenant. Where this system prevailed it was equally acceptable to the landlord and the tenant, and there were bitter complaints made in 1867 that a useful and convenient social arrangement had been wantonly set aside in order to attain a useless political object. The system of Compound Householders might have been restored by Mr. GOSCHEN, just as it had been virtually restored by the Conservative Government and the overseers. But there were two objections. To have restored the Compound Householder might have been regarded as a sort of open triumph over the Conservative party; and then—which was a more serious objection—the system of Compound Householders had never been universal, and it was a mere matter of accident whether it happened or did not happen to prevail in any Parliamentary borough. Mr. GOSCHEN, therefore, set himself to devise a means of enabling the landlord to act as agent of the tenant, which would operate everywhere. He proposes to secure this end by an enactment which is seemingly simple. His Bill provides that if the tenant pays the rates he may deduct what he pays from the accruing rent due to the landlord. The rate is thus treated as primarily payable by the landlord, and if the tenant is made to pay it, he will at once stop it out of his rent. But this is not all. The tenant might, under the present system, find it very difficult to pay the rate, because the rate for a year or a half-year is levied all at once, and it is levied in advance, so that a tenant might be called on to pay a year's rate and then be turned out of his holding, and have no means of getting it back out of his rent. Mr. GOSCHEN meets the difficulty by providing that no more than a fortnight's rate shall ever be levied at once. The tenant can never, therefore, have more than a very small sum to pay at once, and he is certain of getting back what he pays. The landlord will thus be under a very strong inducement to pay the rate himself. He must pay it sooner or later, and he must pay it within a fortnight after the tenant has paid it. He has, therefore, to choose between paying it himself, and avoiding all dispute and trouble, and having it stopped out of the rent. Obviously it will be much more convenient to settle the rate directly with the overseer, rather than go through the trouble and annoyance of seeing whether this or that tenant is entitled to withhold a few halfpence out of his weekly rent. The device would probably be efficacious, but it is not impossible that the House of Commons may prefer some system even more simple and direct. When once the landlord is taken to be the agent of the tenant, and the payment is treated as one that the landlord is legally compelled to make, the whole scheme of testing electoral qualifications by personal payment on the part of the tenant is so completely cut away that it is hardly any use going through the farce of pretending that the rate-paying clauses of the Reform Bill are preserved; and the Conservative party may perhaps be willing to yield to the opinion of the House of Commons, while they would have resented a direct proposal if made by their political opponents.

THE ALABAMA TREATY.

ALTHOUGH the Foreign Affairs Committee of the American Senate has, as it appears, not yet reported, the rejection of the Alabama Convention may be regarded as inevitable; for the sanguine Minister who has on all former occasions asserted that the dispute was settled, admitted at Manchester that the ratification of the Senate would probably be withheld. The Democrats will agree with the Republicans in the determination to keep the quarrel open, for the dominant party has plagiarized from its opponents the tradition of hostility to England. When the Senate a few months ago unanimously ratified the appointment of Mr. REVERDY JOHNSON as Minister to England, it was distinctly understood by himself, and generally assumed both in England and in the United States, that he would be allowed to negotiate the effective arrangement of existing differences. No serious politician can have expected that he would obtain better terms than the profuse concessions which are included in the draft of the Convention; but the anxiety of the English Government and nation for a just settlement has defeated itself by encouraging additional demands which are wholly inadmissible. Mr. REVERDY JOHNSON'S unaccountable want of tact in proclaiming the imaginary good-will of his countrymen to England has largely contributed to the same result. It was undoubtedly irritating to the speakers and writers who had, with unanimous consistency, expressed the deepest resentment, to be assured that their animosity was factitious or insincere. It was in vain that Mr. REVERDY JOHNSON combined with his amiable professions an almost litigious tenacity in negotiation. His treaty was condemned before it was seen, on grounds which would have been equally fatal to a still more advantageous compact. The vague statement that the measure of damage suffered by the United States was the cost of one or two years of the civil war may perhaps have been erroneously attributed to General GRANT, but it has been adopted by a large part of the American press. As it would obviously be impossible to frame a treaty on any such assumption, the thoroughgoing opponents of ratification must be understood to object to any possible settlement. It would follow that all the discussions to which Lord STANLEY and Lord CLARENDON devoted so much labour were from the first entirely purposeless. There is a certain inconvenience in the constitutional provision that every treaty to which the United States is a party must be ratified by two-thirds of the Senate. In dealing with other Powers, diplomatists know that the agents with whom they deal will be either summarily disavowed or sustained by their own Governments; but it is impossible to ascertain whether an American Minister has authority even to enter on a negotiation.

Although the popular attacks on the treaty have little relation to its contents, it is probable that some of the members of the Senate may disapprove of its terms on special grounds. It is objected that in a possible contingency the claims of English subjects might be allowed by the Commission, while the liability of the English Government for the captures of the Alabama would be successfully disputed. Such a result would undoubtedly be annoying to the losing party, as indeed failure is one of the most disagreeable possibilities of all public or private litigation; but it was scarcely to be expected that the English Government would enter on a one-sided reference from which the claims of its own subjects would be peremptorily excluded. All Mr. SEWARD's projects of arbitration included the claimants on both sides; nor was it until lately contended that in this respect he had been too liberal. As an able writer in the New York Tribune justly remarks, there is nothing in the protocol which imposes any condition on English claimants in relation to their attitude towards the United States during the continuance of the war; nor indeed is it probable that the owners of vessels seized by American cruisers are or were enthusiastic partisans of the Federal Government. Few citizens of the United States could prefer a claim against England if they were subject to the preliminary condition of proving that they had not professed to share in the national animosity. No Court can take cognizance of the private feelings of litigants, or even of their acts if they have no bearing on the immediate issue. There is no foundation for the further objection that the Commission might deal with subject-matters which properly belong to American jurisdiction. A claim founded on a capture would be conclusively barred by the proof that the captured vessel had been condemned by the proper tribunal. It is wholly immaterial whether claims, either well or ill-founded, are preferred by "a class of "Englishmen whose sympathies were all on the side of slavery "and the rebellion." The counter claims would probably have been advanced by Americans whose sympathies were on the side of Russia during the Crimean war, of NANA SAHIB during the Indian mutiny, and of the Fenian conspirators. Unless, indeed, Mr. REVERDY JOHNSON should himself unexpectedly have appeared before the Commission, every claimant would probably have avowed himself on all possible occasions the irreconcilcable enemy of England.

Some genuine surprise seems to be caused by the discovery that the Alabama claims are not conceded. The rash or sycophantic concessions of English politicians have been accepted in the United States as national admissions of liability. Lord STANLEY, in the course of the last Session, unnecessarily and imprudently expressed the opinion that the Alabama claimants would probably recover damages. Mr. MILL, in strict consistency with his own predilections, declared that England owed compensation to the United States. Lord RUSSELL is quoted as another witness, because, at a meeting in honour of Mr. GARRISON, he made an abject confession of error; and of course Mr. GLADSTONE's humble and humiliating apology for his presumption in miscalculating the respective forces of the North and the South is not forgotten. It might have been added that Mr. BRIGHT, with that patriotic feeling which prejudices him against his own country wherever American interests are concerned, took a public opportunity of stating that the Government of the United States, as represented by Mr. REVERDY JOHNSON, had been too forbearing. It may be natural that ordinary Americans should believe that the English Government is bound by the unauthorized language of conspicuous politicians, but official persons and statesmen ought to know that a State can only be represented by its Government. Lord STANLEY's speech assumed that there would be an arbitration, though he injudiciously anticipated its results. Mr. MILL and Mr. BRIGHT are devoted to the cause of the United States; and Lord RUSSELL and Mr. GLADSTONE, though by their ostentatious repentance they gravely compromised their own personal dignity, entirely abstained from prejudging the question of liability. It would have been especially difficult for Lord RUSSELL to retract the arguments which he used in his controversy with Mr. ADAMS, inasmuch as he would have been wholly unable to refute his own maxims and deductions. It is one of the disadvantages of sound reasoning that it cannot be disavowed or recalled, and accordingly diplomatists more astute than Lord RUSSELL frequently rely by preference on vague rhetoric and transparent sophisms. The escape of a single vessel destined to become a Confederate cruiser, from an English port, during a war of four years, may or may not justify a claim for compensation. If the American contention is valid, the demand would have been allowed by an arbitrator; but without the intervention of some impartial tribunal the English Government could not honourably admit a liability which had been repudiated by the United States in the analogous Spanish and Portuguese cases.

The more extravagant demand of a reference to arbitration of the English recognition of Confederate belligerency was not expressly excluded by the terms of the Convention; and it is, therefore, perhaps fortunate that the Senate should terminate the negotiations before a question is raised which would have brought the proceedings of the Commission to a standstill. In his speech to the Manchester Chamber of Commerce Mr. REVERDY JOHNSON insinuated that Lord STANLEY or Lord CLARENDON had finally conceded the monstrous claim in dispute. When Sir H. BULWER calls the attention of the House of Commons to the negotiation, the members of the late and of the present Government will perhaps be able to correct or explain his statement. Having, in its anxious desire of peace, yielded everything, and perhaps more than everything, which was consistent with national self-respect, the English Government can only wait for some future opportunity of negotiation. The apologists for the rejection of the treaty urge in substance that arbitration ought to have been preceded or rendered unnecessary by the concession, on the part of England, of the matter in dispute. The pacific language and feeling of the English nation, and the anxiety of Lord STANLEY and Lord CLARENDON to effect a settlement, are used as arguments for insisting on an absolute and humiliating submission. As the object has not yet been attained, the dispute is to be kept open until some opportunity occurs of exacting vengeance. As the New York Times accurately remarked, the doctrine which General GRANT is supposed to have propounded leads, by logical necessity, to an immediate declaration of war; but, as nations are happily not bound to be logical, it is perfectly understood that there is no intention of despatching an army to Canada or a fleet to the West Indies. The Tribune correctly describes the popular policy in threatening to equip piratical cruisers against English commerce whenever England is engaged in a foreign war; and Mr. REVERDY JOHNSON hints a similar menace. The untoward escape of the Alabama is represented as an intolerable violation of law, but the American Government is deliberately to permit innumerable Alabamas to issue from its ports. No English Minister, jurist, or politician has at any time maintained the right of equipping vessels of war against a neutral. The whole controversy has always turned on the special circumstances of the escape of the Alabama, and the Alexandra was afterwards seized in excess of the strictly legal powers of the Government. Against deliberate violation of the international code there is only one mode of protesting, which may be highly inconvenient. It is, fortunately, not indispensable to enter a formal protest against vague menaces of future lawlessness. The rejection of the treaty as it stood is not to be lamented; and the regret which is caused in England by the unwillingness of the American people to close the dispute will be henceforth entirely unembittered by self-reproach.

LORD BURY ON MINISTERIAL RE-ELECTIONS.

MR. GLADSTONE drew a sound distinction between complicated measures and Bills affirming simple propositions, when he refused to allow Lord BURY's Bill the formal compliment of a first reading. The House was perfectly competent to decide the question, rightly or wrongly, as soon as it was raised; and the mover might at his pleasure have answered the arguments of his opponents in his reply. Lord BURY probably exercised a sound judgment in withdrawing, without unnecessary discussion, a Bill which would otherwise have been summarily rejected. It is sometimes as useless to reason with a majority of the House of Commons as to argue against the master of twenty legions. The short debate on the Bill was only made remarkable by a maiden speech in which Mr. VERNON HARCOURT showed how thoroughly he had already acclimatized himself in the Parliamentary atmosphere. On future occasions Mr. HARCOURT may probably rise into higher levels of eloquence, and he can scarcely fail to deal with more interesting subjects; but, in proving that Ministers ought to forfeit their seats on the acceptance of office, he displayed at the same time his well-known command of language and his appreciation of the tastes and habits of his audience. Next to the great efforts of its most conspicuous orators the House of Commons admires conventional truisms, or fallacies elaborated with rhetorical amplitude of argument and illustration. It is no longer the fashion for Tories to rely on the wisdom of ancestors; but when traditional sanction can be quoted in support of some apparently popular principle, the Liberal majority is delighted with the venerable authority which sanctions a possibly absurd conclusion. Mr. HARCOURT solemnly reminded the House that the restrictions or pecuniary fines imposed upon official members were nearly coeval, if not with Parliament itself, at least with the modern system of Ministerial responsibility. It would not have been convenient to add, that if the present working of the Constitution could have been foreseen, no legislator would have dreamed of making so gratuitous an addition to the difficulties of representative government. It was as a safeguard against the exercise of a prerogative which has since fallen into disuse that it was proposed at one time to exclude Ministers from Parliament, and afterwards, by a compromise, to send them back to their constituents for re-election. If the original measure had been carried, the existing Constitution could never have existed; and the present relic of obsolete jealousy interferes in some degree with its practical operation. There is a presumption that, when the reason of a law has expired, the effect of an extinct and forgotten cause ought not to be allowed to survive its origin; but, as experience has shown that some antiquarian laws become useful in unexpected ways, English Parliaments generally hesitate to abolish the parasitical appendages which have twined themselves round the ruinous parts of the Constitution. Mr. HARCOURT received merited applause for his historical exposition of the well-known origin of the law; nor was he less successful when he afterwards defended, on entirely different grounds, the continuance of a troublesome and mischievous prohibition.

Parliamentary majorities have long since superseded the Crown in the virtual power of appointing and dismissing Cabinets; yet apologists who have by long habit or natural genius attained a due gravity of demeanour have no difficulty in arguing that an appeal ought in every case to lie from the Imperial Parliament to Greenwich, to Birmingham, or to the Radnor boroughs. When the Jacobin Club demanded that the Convention which represented the whole of France should acknowledge the supremacy of the people as embodied in the Paris mob, the pretension was backed by physical force ready for action. The electors of the boroughs or counties which are temporarily deprived of their members by a change of Government have not the smallest desire to dictate to Parliament or the country; and they generally deprecate the trouble, and the waste of time and money, which are caused by the existing law. The constituents of a leader of the Opposition send him to Parliament for the express purpose of making him a Minister; and when their object is at last attained, they require no formal inquiry, by a Speaker's writ, whether they are inclined to pocket their political winnings. Mr. HARCOURT, who is as ready with party allusions to gratify his own friends and allies as with historical platitudes for the edification of the House, satirically remarked that the inmates of Caves, or, in other words, seceders from their own party, may be supposed to have disappointed their constituents. Mr. WHITE had anticipated the sarcastic insinuation that Mr. LOWE, if he had taken office under Lord DERBY, might possibly have been embarrassed by the necessity of a fresh election for Calne. As the contingency never occurred, the illustration failed of its complete effect; and it is a sufficient answer that if the obsolete law were repealed, constituencies would choose their members with full notice that they might possibly become Cabinet Ministers. Mr. HARCOURT proceeded to prove that the necessity of re-election might possibly throw obstacles in the way of the acceptance of office by Mr. DISRAELI, and that it would to a certain extent furnish to a Minister governing with a minority an additional reason for a dissolution. Sir ROBERT PEEL, as Mr. HARCOURT had, with praiseworthy research, ascertained, stated as a reason for dissolving, on his accession to office in 1834, the inconvenience which might have arisen if any of his colleagues had failed to be re-elected. The researches of a judicious advocate always stop with the discovery of a precedent which suits his immediate purpose. Further inquiry would have shown that in the autumn of 1834 the new Minister was in a minority of more than a hundred, which was reduced to twenty or thirty by the general election. Sir ROBERT PEEL was never in the habit of pinning his heart or his motives on his sleeve for political critics to peck at. When a plausible reason was valid as far as it went, the sagacious Minister invariably preferred it for public use to a fuller manifestation of conscience. If the exclusion of Mr. DISRAELI from power is a proper object of constitutional legislation, it unluckily happens that the necessity of re-election neither prevented his acceptance of office in 1866, nor forced him to dissolve Parliament before the close of 1868. The antagonism between the law and common sense has of late years produced among all parties a feeling that in ordinary cases it is unfair and ungenerous to oppose a newly-appointed Minister at his re-election. No contest of this kind occurred when Mr. DISRAELI'S or Mr. GLADSTONE'S Cabinet was formed, nor has there probably been a similar instance within twenty years. Of many questionable arguments, perhaps the weakest was the suggestion that the loss of Mr. BRIGHT'S election speech at Birmingham would have been a public misfortune. There is a general and growing belief that hustings' speeches might be advantageously abolished; and if constituents wish to hear the reasons of eloquent members for taking office, they can easily invite them to dinner.

Mr. DISRAELI and his colleagues were, as it has been said, re-elected without a single exception; and therefore the reference to the constituencies was in their case useless. Lord PALMERSTON in 1859, and Mr. GLADSTONE in 1868, took office immediately after a general election, in which the claims of the two great parties and their leaders to power had been the principal point in issue. One of the speakers in the debate of Tuesday pertinently asked why there should be an appeal from the House of Commons to the borough of Tiverton; but in 1859 the voice of Tiverton, whatever it might be worth, had been within a few weeks audibly expressed. When a Government resigns in consequence of an adverse vote, the Session is interrupted for two or three weeks, even for ordinary business, through the natural unwillingness of members to attend the House in the absence of the Ministers. The heads of the great departments are at the same time interrupted in their laborious efforts to master the current business of their offices by their necessary attention to a useless ceremony; and notwithstanding the multiplication of gratuitous inconveniences, the professed object of the constitutional rule is only half attained. The votaries of ancestral wisdom have the good sense not to make copies of their idol, nor to propagate its worship. The peers who form half or more than half of an average Cabinet cannot be included, because they have no constituents; yet the power of the Crown is as dangerously exerted in the choice of Lord CLARENDON, Lord GRANVILLE, and the Duke of ARGYLL, as in the appointment of Mr. CARDWELL. The remaining SECRETARY of STATE was, as it happened, exempt from the necessity of returning to the ill-judging constituency which had rejected him at Merthyr. Until Mr. BRUCE was elected for Renfrewshire, Mr. HARCOURT and other constitutional purists must have seen with alarm that four-fifths of the seals of State had been distributed without the subsequent ratification of any constituency whatever. The Secretaries of the Treasury, the Secretary of the Admiralty, and the Under-Secretaries of State are, by a convenient fiction, supposed to derive their offices, not from the Crown, but from their respective superiors. If the House of Commons had really believed in the expediency of the law as it affects Cabinet Ministers, the same restrictions would long since have been imposed on their respective subordinates. Although it is not allowable to suppose that Mr. AYRTON or Mr. BAXTER could at any time have seceded from their party, Mr. LOWE might at an earlier period of his career possibly have been a Secretary of the Treasury. Mr. GLADSTONE may be excused for discountenancing a measure of Reform which is not avowedly approved by the majority of the House. The inconvenience, though it is entirely unmixed with advantage, is limited in operation, and it is endurable because it is old. The fear of unpopularity which restrains members from the expression of their real opinions is probably unfounded; but the removal of the restriction might decorously originate with the non-official section of the House. Mr. GLADSTONE and his colleagues may feel a delicacy in proposing to relieve themselves from a fine of some hundreds of pounds if at any future time they again form a Government. The moderate measure by which the last Parliament rendered it possible for the members of a Government to change offices with impunity has in some degree diminished the ancient nuisance and weakened the bulwarks of the Constitution. Mr. HARCOURT'S future Parliamentary reputation will not be less solid because its first instalment has been earned by the defence of a sacred and acknowledged abuse.

THE COMMANDER-IN-CHIEF.

EVERY one who has watched the course of a trial at law must have observed that witnesses sometimes affect to misapprehend the drift of a question, and give answers which, though literally true, convey a wholly false impression. These fencing tactics seldom succeed when the examining counsel is determined to have a bonâ fide answer; but occasionally counsel and witness are in the same mind, and questions are framed for the purpose of eliciting replies true to the ear, but not to the sense. Such nisi prius tricks are not thought very creditable, and, in spite of all temptations, we know that they are never practised in the House of Commons. Still it does sometimes happen that an accidental slip creeps into the terms of a Parliamentary question, and that a Minister, though desiring to reply with the most perfect frankness, mistakes the real object in view, and, by answering the words instead of the spirit of the questioner, inadvertently deceives every one who hears him.

This is exactly what took place on Tuesday night, when Lord Elcho put his question about the Commander-in-Chief. The well-known candour of Lord Elcho renders it quite unnecessary to say that the error implied in the form of his question, and pointed out by the Minister, was a mere inadvertence, and Mr. Cardwell is much too upright and experienced an official to condescend to the device of meeting a most important inquiry with an evasive answer. The conversation was undoubtedly quite a bonâ fide affair, but, from an unfortunate misconception, the result of the question and answer is simply to throw dust into the eyes of the public. As this was obviously not intended, both Lord Elcho and Mr. Cardwell will, we are sure, be grateful to us for removing some of this unlucky dust; and we feel the more bound to do so because it would be affectation on our part not to acknowledge that the question pointed at some observations in an article on Mr. Trevelyan and the Duke of Cambridge which appeared in our columns on the 13th instant. The matter will be all the clearer if we first call our readers' attention to the statement which we then made. After pointing out the administrative obstruction caused by the duality which actually exists between the Horse Guards and the War Office, we added some remarks which, as they seem to be impugned by Mr. Cardwell's answer, we are constrained to repeat. The passage runs thus:—

"In point of fact, almost all the difficulties to which we "have referred have been found in past experience to arise "from the anomalous authority given to the office of Com- "mander-in-Chief, and not from the rank of its possessor for "the time being. The vice is not in the appointment of this "or that Commander-in-Chief, but in the studied ambiguity of "the warrant which defines his position." We then pointed out that all matters of command and discipline, and all appointments and promotions, were excepted out of the jurisdiction of the Secretary of State, though a vague general responsibility was reserved, and we concluded thus:—"What wonder "that all is confusion—that instead of a few high administra- "tive offices under the Minister, you have a staff of two or three "great soldiers at the War Office, duplicated by a staff of four "or five more great soldiers at the Horse Guards, always corre- "sponding with and intriguing against each other, and doing less real work than half their number, at a third of the cost, would do if the whole government of the army were placed under a single responsible Minister, with the Commander-in-Chief as his first executive subordinate, to undertake the supervision of matters of discipline, promotion, and the like."

Every word of this, including the words which we have now italicized, is, as we shall presently show, absolutely accurate; and our readers will now be prepared to understand the strange fiasco of Tuesday evening. Lord Elcho put a question to Mr. Gladstone, and we think we cannot be wrong in assuming that the object of it was to ascertain whether such a description as we had given of the relations between the War Office and the Horse Guards was correct or not. Unfortunately Lord Elcho, not having made himself as familiar with the details of the case as we have been obliged to do, put the first part of his question in this shape:— "Whether, under the warrant appointing the Commander-in- "Chief of the Army, any doubt arises as to the relative posi- "tion of the Commander-in-Chief and the Secretary of State "for War?" and then went on to inquire as to the existence and extent of the dual government, and whether steps were in contemplation for the concentration of the War Departments in one building.

It will be observed, on comparing the italicized passages in our statement and in Lord Elcho's question, that what we carefully described as "the warrant which defines [the Com- "mander-in-Chief's] position" is referred to by Lord Elcho as "the warrant appointing the Commander-in-Chief," and that while our criticism was aimed at the anomalous powers of the office, Lord Elcho's question pointed exclusively to its present occupant, the Duke of Cambridge. The Premier thought fit to leave the War Minister to answer the question, and we do not accuse Mr. Cardwell of purposely taking a miserable advantage of Lord Elcho's blunder in confounding an "appointing" warrant with a "defining" warrant. Still, with a simplicity which cannot be too much admired in so experienced a veteran, he replied that there was no warrant "appointing" His Royal Highness, and that his proper technical title (as everybody knows) is not the "Commander-in- "Chief," but the "Field Marshal Commanding in Chief." It never occurred to Mr. Cardwell's mind that the real subject of inquiry was the warrant defining the position of the Commander-in-Chief, and he was therefore entirely silent on the most material point to which we had directed public attention. It never struck him that the relative status of two officers might be defined as well in the warrant appointing the one as in that appointing the other. Oddly enough Lord Elcho did not think it necessary to correct his question and elicit a substantial answer, and the result is that almost every one who heard Mr. Cardwell must have supposed that he was directly contradicting our assertion as to the ambiguous warrant; and yet all the while he was talking of something wholly irrelevant, and was of necessity aware that the position of the Commander-in-Chief for the time being is in effect defined by Royal warrant, and that all such warrants apply, in every particular which we mentioned, to the Duke of Cambridge, although he has only the inferior title. But first, it may be as well to sweep away the little technical cobweb about the designation of His Royal Highness. A "General or Field Marshal Commanding in Chief," such as the Duke of Cambridge, is simply an acting Commander-in-Chief exercising all the powers of the office, with no substantial difference except in dignity and emolument. Mr. Cardwell, in referring to this trivial distinction, fell into exactly the same error which Mr. Trevelyan had in a different way fallen into. He treated a grave question as to the relative position of two great offices, the Ministry for War and the Command in Chief, as if it were a matter purely personal to the present holder of the Chief Command. It is not so; and for this reason we have spoken, and shall continue to speak, of the position assigned to "The Commander-in-Chief" in the abstract, instead of limiting ourselves to the exact title which more accurately describes the rank of the Duke of Cambridge. All that we have urged, and all that we now mean to urge, would apply with equal force whether the Command in Chief was held by a Royal Duke or by a soldier who had risen from the ranks. Now, having disposed of this interpolated quibble, let us come to the substance of the dispute. Has any such warrant as we rather irreverently described ever been framed? This is a simple question of fact, and we know, and Mr. Cardwell knows, what the answer must be.

The next question is, whether any distinction is made by such warrants between the powers of a General or Field Marshal Commanding in Chief and those of a Commander-in-Chief? Mr. Cardwell must have learned very little of the traditions of his office if he cannot answer this question also, and he can answer it only by confirming what we have said.

Lastly, we ask whether the warrants in force from time to time have not in practice been interpreted to mean that in the ordinary course of administration the Commander-in-Chief, whether substantive or acting, shall in matters of command, appointments, promotions, and discipline be independent of the Minister, though the Minister may nevertheless retain an extraordinary reserved power of intervention on questions of extreme importance. This gloss gives a sort of meaning to what would otherwise be absurd and unintelligible, and the meaning is that duality shall be the rule, and the interposition of the Minister the exception, to be called into action only on great emergencies. And so the practice always has been, and is to this day. In the face of this well-known practice, which originated long before the appointment of the Duke of Cambridge, Mr. Cardwell thought it right and candid to say, in his place in Parliament, that "there exists in principle no dual government," when he knew well that the dual government has always been in full force in practice; and that, so far as Royal Warrants say anything, they say that the whole command and discipline, and all appointments and promotions, shall be, as the general rule, excepted out of the Parliamentary jurisdiction. Is it or is it not the fact that not only military appointments, but all the appointments to the administrative staff of the Horse Guards, from the highest to the lowest, are made, and all their duties assigned, by the General for the time being acting as Commander-in-Chief? And if it is so, with what fairness can Mr. Cardwell say that the dual system is not at this moment rampant?

But let us take Mr. Cardwell at his word, and assume that he has, not in name only, but in reality, the supreme effective power which he, like his predecessors, claims in theory, but which neither he nor his predecessors have ever dared to exercise. If he has the power, he cannot shirk the responsibility. Every duplicate office in the Horse Guards and the War Department is, we are now told, a duplicate office maintained, by the authority of the Minister, for the aggrandizement of some petted soldier at the expense of the country. A chief is wanted to supervise the whole department of supply, and what do we find? Why, we have two Generals, Sir HENRY STORKS and General BALFOUR, assigned to this work at the War Office; and a third magnificently paid General called a Quartermaster-General, to do substantially the same work at the Horse Guards. Of these three only one is wanted, and it is well known that the principal duty of the Quartermaster-General is to make routes, and to send requisitions for stores to the twin department which exists at the War Office. Then, again, there is a Military Secretary at the Horse Guards, and his counterpart at the War Office, in the shape of an Under-Secretary of State, developed out of what once was called the Secretary for Military Correspondence. The necessity for these offices is created by the dual system, and one, if not both might be dispensed with if the General wielding the powers of the Commander-in-Chief were placed at the elbow of the Minister as his military adviser. Then, again, we have at the Horse Guards three Adjutant-Generals—that is to say, the Adjutant-General of the Army, who alone is needed, and two Deputy Adjutant-Generals, quite independent of the first, who report direct to the Duke of CAMBRIDGE as the immediate commander of the Engineers and Artillery respectively. Not only are all these needless and costly offices established as a consequence of the dual government, and of the quasi-independence of the Horse Guards, but a very large percentage of the work of the two departments consists of tedious correspondence and wrangling about trifles, between Pall Mall and Whitehall. For all this waste and mischief Mr. CARDWELL says that he alone is responsible, and should he fail to annihilate it at once, his responsibility would be heavy enough if Ministerial responsibility were less of a farce than it is.

At this moment the Government are insisting, not only at the War Office, but in every department, upon the most stringent economy in the pettiest details. The newspapers are beginning to fill with the lamentations of poor clerks reduced to penury by the inexorable virtue of a Cabinet that is resolved at every cost to reduce the Estimates. Neither regard for the efficiency of the services, nor consideration for faithful work, nor compassion for struggling public servants is allowed to stand in the way of Mr. GLADSTONE's thirst for savings. Within fair and reasonable limits this savage economy may be right, except where it puts a veto on important work; but while in the treatment of the inferior officials parsimony is carried to the verge, and sometimes beyond the verge, of cruelty and injustice, the country cannot be expected to look quietly on while the dual government whose existence "in practice," though not "in principle," Mr. CARDWELL admits, is made the means of furnishing duplicate places to those whom the Commander-in-Chief for the time being may delight to favour.

Mr. CARDWELL hints that at some remote epoch he will do something to remedy these evils by bringing the two departments under one roof. That will be a legitimate change in its way if it is ever effected, but it will not come to much until there is one head as well as one roof over the whole army administration, nor until the Minister of War organizes his office without respect of persons or of rank, and applies the same stern rule alike to those whose salaries are counted by thousands as to those who draw a few poor hundreds from the public funds. The late Ministry went on the principle of making things pleasant all round. Mr. GLADSTONE and his colleagues denounce this laxity, and resolve to make things unpleasant all round. Be it so, but let them apply their hard rule fairly, and beware of making things unpleasant all round with an exception in favour of those who enjoy the highest position, draw the maximum salaries, and in too many cases do the minimum of effective work. A real reformer would seek out and encourage those among his subordinates whom he found to be doing the most valuable work. A sham reformer will encourage the costly ornamental chiefs, and cut down without mercy every one who cannot protect himself by rank and position. It is not yet apparent to which of these classes Mr. CARDWELL, or even the omnipotent Mr. GLADSTONE, belongs. It is something, however, to have extracted the admission that, for any continuance of the dualized confusion which has hitherto reigned in the army, the Cabinet and the WAR MINISTER acknowledge their direct responsibility. It will not take long to show how they mean to discharge it, and these are not times when default in such a matter will be tolerated in a Ministry that calls itself Liberal.

After what has now taken place, we trust that, if Lord ELCHO does not repeat his question in a more satisfactory form, some other member will. And perhaps Mr. GLADSTONE will think the subject of sufficient importance to call for an answer from himself.

CONVENTUAL LIFE.

THE Alexandrine trial SAURIN v. STAR has dragged its slow length along before the much enduring Queen's Bench, and we do not need its conclusion to draw the moral of the case. The main issue remains clear and instructive, quite apart from the verdict. That issue is one in which the readers of this journal may be assumed to feel some interest. It has happened to us recently to have been seriously called to task, by a writer in one of the chief Roman Catholic organs, for having denied the principles of the Christian faith, or something like it, because we asked attention to the fact that the three great virtues once considered the very crown and glory of the Gospel—poverty, chastity (or, more properly, the celibate life), and obedience—had ceased to hold their supreme rank or obligation over the conscience. We were told that, if these virtues were not of universal obligation—as they could scarcely be, or it must have been intended by the author of Christianity that the world should come to an end in a single generation—at any rate they were the theological counsels of perfection which formed the ideal of the Christian life. Further, we were reminded that one for whom we have often professed sincere admiration was against us; and Dr. NEWMAN was quoted, when he observed that, "if the truth must be spoken, what are the humble "monk, and the holy nun, and other regulars, as they are "called, but Christians after the very pattern given us in Scripture? . . . Where shall we find the image of St. PAUL . . . . or of MARY the mother of MARK, or of PHILIP's daughters, but in those who, whether they remain in seclusion or are sent over the earth, have calm faces, and sweet plaintive voices, and spare frames, and gentle manners, and hearts "weaned from the world, and wills subdued; and for their "meekness meet with insult, and for their purity with slander, "and for their gravity with suspicion, and for their courage "with cruelty?" Whether this charge was seriously preferred by the Tablet may be doubted; but we answered it argumentatively, and without levity. We shall not repeat our justification; but we refer to the matter only for the sake of showing how our position is illustrated by this most disagreeable trial, in which, be it remembered, those who are bound we suppose to accept this doctrine, that the conventual life presents the standard of New Testament Christianity, have been impleading one another. We, as—what the POPE politely calls us—Non-Catholics, can afford to stand apart and see how not only this ideal and typical life works, but how, after all, it presents itself to human nature and family affection even in its most artificial form—that of a Jesuit father who has accepted the doctrine that the highest duty of the "religious" is to reduce himself to the "cadaverous" condition of humanity divested of the personal will.

When all the lees and sediment of petty and silly details have been strained from the case of SAURIN v. STAR, it cannot but come to this on the most favourable or unfavourable judgment—that the conventual life presents no guarantee against the errors, weaknesses, and sins of the worldly life; and further, the suspicion is raised that, as developed and working among people such as men and women now are—and that they are what they are is a fact which cannot be got rid of by wishing that it were otherwise—this same conventual life presents special opportunities and occasions for the cultivation of certain special errors, weaknesses, and sins. And this is a very important social matter, for one must be dead to every right feeling not to recognise that the intention and object of such an institution as that of Sisters of Mercy, or the Brotherhood of St. VINCENT of PAUL, and similar sodalities male and female, are not only religiously proper, but in some way or other remarkably suitable to large social needs of the present day. There are many excellent people, female and male, who are impelled by the strong desire of benefiting their fellow-creatures, the poor and sick and ignorant, and who are consumed by the burning love of good works, who look to such institutions with a natural instinct as furnishing the best modes by which they can discharge duties which, visionary as they may be to others, are real and practical to them. They think that a common life of common duties, a holy interchange of mutual love and experience, a rule involving submission of the will to those of greater experience and ability, will best secure them from their own wickedness and self-seeking. There is little to be said against this ideal of conventual life. It only just requires prefection; that is to say, it assumes it. But in the case of most of those adopting the conventual life, they wish to use it as a means of acquiring those angelic tempers and that perfection of attainment which the very fact of the life presupposes. Here seems to be the weak point of these institutions; they are sought as a means for acquiring the very conditions which they presuppose. They would act very well, we dare say, were all their members that which on entering this life they suppose, or at least profess, themselves to be. The profession of a nun or monk assumes that all evil dispositions are dead in them; that they have already acquired the exact discipline which their work requires; that they can be as self-denying, obedient, and abundant in every virtue as their vows assume them to be. In practice it comes out that the professed members do not come up to their own description of themselves. It may be that, after all, Sister MARY SCHOLASTICA was only a very commonplace sort of person—rash, impulsive, eager to form great friendships, and equally ready to break them. She seems to have had a fretting sort of mind, apt to take offence, to find her companions disagreeable, and to make herself equally disagreeable. Finding that she was in a false position, and had made a fatal mistake in life, she turned that life into a curse to herself and all that she came into contact with. She was just the sort of person we constantly meet with; and among her sisters or schoolfellows she would have been much as she was in the convent. She developed considerable talents for making herself and everybody about her uncomfortable. This is about the worst which probably could be said about her; and it is not after all so very bad, or, at any rate, it is a character common enough.

To live with a person of this sort must be a trial; but it is a trial which becomes infinitely more severe and exasperating under the peculiar conditions of a nunnery. Women, as a rule, do not get on well together. Their natural weakness and infirmities of temper, for good as for evil, require to be strengthened and elevated by intercourse with the masculine mind. A community of women, or even a woman's party, wants a backbone. Largeness of view, a strong sense of justice, and a severe contempt of paltriness and little miserable details of looks and gestures and suspicions and guesses, these are not to be expected in a woman's set. And, after all, a nunnery is only a woman's set. Where these qualities are met with in the members of an ordinary family there is confusion. The convent reproduces in an unfortunate form the family—the family life with its temptations, but without its safeguards. Such an inmate as Miss SAURIN is admirably calculated to bring out the very worst parts of the tempers of her companions. In this case, assuming the very worst against the Hull nuns, it seems to have been so. Her infirmities and pettinesses were met with infirmities and pettinesses; her disagreeables with harshness, suspicion, and even tyranny. The rules of her order armed the Superior with powers of being at the very least extremely disagreeable, which, it may be, Mrs. STAR availed herself of to the uttermost. A "cantankerous" inmate whom you cannot get rid of, whom you cannot bring down to the required humility and abasement, must sorely try the temper. The Mother Superior, we can quite understand, was sorely tried; the Sisters were sorely tried; Sister SCHOLASTICA was sorely tried. And the result was that the house came in practice to be not the home of every virtue and every grace, but an unpleasant abode of bickering, quarrelling, insubordination on one side, contumely and suspicion, if not oppression, on the other, and—to speak familiarly—nagging, fretting, frowning, and chafing, all round. Childish faults and offences are met with childish reprisals and punishments; and instead of the calm serene life of sacred contemplation and active beneficence, the chief interest of the Hull community was to discover whether one of their Sisters did not appropriate boot-laces, or was not in the habit of surreptitiously appropriating scraps of biscuit, and the school-children's stale crusts. No doubt it is infinitely disgusting to hear of all the little annoyances, and even the ill-treatment, which, according to her own account, was lavished on this unfortunate black sheep. The very recital of them, whether they are to be construed literally or whether they are exaggerated, shows at least this, that a convent is no security against the very worst errors of the worldly life. If Mrs. STAR inflicted these indignities, or if Miss SAURIN invented them, the case as against this sort of life, whichever narrative is true, is equally fatal.

We may go further and say, that in common domestic life, either to have acted as the Mother Superior is said to have acted, or to have made up such a story as Miss SAURIN is said to have made up, is simply and happily impossible. Public opinion, even within the narrow limits of a family circle, would have prevented it. Taking Miss SAURIN's exaggerated and hurried statements as literally true, the only analogous case is that of a ship's crew at sea. There are sometimes deeds of the most horrible cruelty perpetrated under the name of discipline, which is much the same thing as conventual obedience. A despotic captain reproduces an irresponsible Superior in religion. In either case he is the centre and sun of a small system, amenable to no check from public opinion; in a word, practically irresponsible. It is so in a convent. The feminine nature, we fear, is too often essentially cruel; not the less essentially cruel because with women the art of ingeniously tormenting is from circumstances contracted to small opportunities of inflicting corporeal punishment. But the very same temper which in a sea-captain ties his victim to the capstan, would in a Mother-superior be restricted to the small but irritating power of investing her small victim with a dirty duster on her head. This is the worst that can be said against Mrs. STAR; and certainly the worst has been said. On the other hand, it is the system which is responsible for developing all the infirmities of Miss SAURIN's character into that tissue of disobedience, untruthfulness, and grumbling with which she is, truly or falsely, charged. The warning is not without its healthy as well as its painful side. It addresses itself to the young, the susceptible, and the enthusiastic. They had better pause before they take irrevocable vows; they had better think twice, even at the mature age of eighteen—Miss SAURIN's age, we believe, of profession—before they commit themselves to a life which requires precisely those gifts and virtues which it is impossible that pious, ardent, inexperienced, and sentimental girls can possess. This case, whichever view we take of it, shows that to form a certain character the very worst course is to assume that you have it. And, unless our memory fails us, we have heard this sort of thing before. The lady, and she was one who scarcely made her revelations attractive, who wrote some years ago two disagreeable books—Flemish Interiors, and a Glance behind the Grilles of French Religious Houses—tells much the same story. A Miss GOODMAN made somewhat of the same charges against Miss SELLON of the Plymouth sisterhood. In all these cases there was exaggeration. But there was smoke behind the fire; as there is in this case.

BRICK AND MORTAR IN PARIS.

A NEWER excitement, and one of which the scene is laid nearer home, has taken the place of the Belgian railway business in the minds of Paris politicians. Whether the sudden moderation of the semi-official journals was due to the discovery that they had misinterpreted the EMPEROR's wishes or to an intimation that since the fighting had not been taken up by the independent press it had failed to answer its purpose, or to the transfer of the controversy from journalistic to diplomatic ground, is more than can be said with certainty. Happily the French Government has of late shown in a great number of instances that it has thoroughly mastered the art of effecting a retreat. But for this consoling reflection, some natural alarm might have been entertained lest it should feel compelled, in common consistency, to make its acts square with its words. Threatened men, however, live long, and the rule holds good even when the ultimate author of the threats is NAPOLEON III. Belgium is not likely to be a sufferer by reason of the audacity of her Senate in passing a Bill to which the French Government was known to be adverse. The question will probably be let gently down through a descending scale of rumours until it reaches that limbo of groundless alarms to which the Imperial Government has been so generous a contributor. In the face of M. FRERE-ORBAN's speech in the Senate, it would have been hard even for a semi-official journalist to maintain that Belgium had done anything more than her indignant neighbour would have done under similar circumstances. If, said the Minister, the Eastern of France had wished to cede its line to a foreign company, if the French Government had expressed its disapproval of the proposal, and offered itself to buy the line, if the Eastern of France had, without taking any notice of this communication, proceeded to complete the contract—what course would the Government have taken? It is much easier to bluster about distrust, defiance, and ingratitude than to answer a plain question like this, and the portion of the Paris press upon which the duty would have devolved may be thankful that it has been spared the necessity by the signal to cease firing.

The abandonment of the contest has been masked to a great extent by the discussion in the Corps Législatif on the finances of the city of Paris. The storm which has been brewing for years has come at last in the shape of a speech from M. THIERS. Financial arrangements which court concealment could not have a more dangerous foe. The municipal Budget unrolls under his hands in a way which throws the strongest light on exactly those places which the Prefect of the Seine most desires to keep obscure. The question before the Corps Législatif related to a particular loan, but this necessarily brought up the whole history of the financial policy which had led to this loan being required. Certainly the figures, as they stand, are somewhat startling. During the last fifteen years close upon 2,000,000,000 francs have been spent on the "transformation" of Paris. The annual expenditure now amounts to 250,000,000 francs—"just double," says M. THIERS in an aside, "the total expenditure of Belgium "or Bavaria." The Budget in which these figures are presented is modelled on the Budget of the Empire. Its leading principle is to put facts pleasantly at starting, in the hope that people will find them dry reading, and not turn the page. First, therefore, comes the ordinary Budget, showing an income of 156,000,000 francs against an expenditure of only 102,000,000. This is followed by the regular extraordinary Budget amounting to 61,000,000 francs, and this by the special extraordinary Budget amounting to another 60,000,000. And then the supplementary Budget brings up the estimates to the grand total. The last three members of the series deal entirely with expenditure. Even Baron HAUSSMANN's power of conjuring is unable to represent the receipts as anything more than the initial 156,000,000 francs. It is in making provision for this deficit that his financial ingenuity has been exercised during the whole period of his reign. How he has contrived to make two ends meet he is probably himself unable to say; but the inability is unimportant, as the creditors who have found the money may be trusted to keep the account for him. Unhappily debt, like death, knocks, in the end, at every door, and the master of the Hôtel de Ville has not discovered any means of evading the inevitable dun. "My work is at an end," says Baron HAUSSMANN. "No," answers M. THIERS, "your work "is not at an end—but your resources are."

Indeed, however loudly the Prefect of the Seine may protest on this last point, it is obvious from the whole tenor of his administration that nothing is further from his thoughts than bringing his operations to an immediate, or even a speedy, end. While the French workman is kept constantly employed his political tendencies do not often exhibit themselves in action. Good wages, and the knowledge that it is the Government that pays them, exercise a highly conservative influence on all who come within their reach. If the reconstruction of Paris were suspended, and the huge artisan army to whose wants the process ministers were suddenly thrown out of work, there might be considerable danger that the Socialism which is only dormant in its ranks would no longer be limited to theory. The Government and the Opposition disagree of course as to the number of hands who would be affected by a discontinuance of the Prefect's labours. By the Opposition they are variously stated at from 200,000 to 500,000; by the Government the total is reduced to a mere trifle of 91,000. Probably the discrepancy does not go beyond the surface. An official speaker would be sure to reckon none but workmen in the strictest sense of the term, while the Opposition calculation no doubt takes in all the unskilled labourers who practically share the workman's fortunes, because they cannot be employed except in conjunction with him. Even with the omission of this probable correction, 91,000 Frenchmen, all starving, and all cherishing a grievance against the authorities, are a vision from which personages of greater importance than the Prefect of the Seine may be allowed to shrink back in affright. If war were to break out, the conscription might in part dispose of the difficulty; but as long as peace lasts there will probably be means found and excuses devised to enable the Government to retain the position of paymaster. Meantime the prosperity of the artisan involves a constantly increasing tax on the other classes of society. The cost of living in Paris has grown enormously, and even the rise in prices does not make up to the shopkeepers for the yet greater rise in rents. "Thirty years ago," says M. THIERS, "there was not a shop in Paris let at more than 15,000 or "20,000 francs; now there are some which fetch 80,000 "or 90,000 francs." If you want proof, he adds, go and search the registry of bankruptcies.

Baron HAUSSMANN, or the authorities by whom he is inspired, have certainly arranged their operations in the best possible order for their own purposes. If all the obvious improvements had now been effected, and only the less urgent portions of the scheme remained incomplete, it might be difficult to make out a case for going on. Things have been so managed, however, that, with the exception of the Rue de Rivoli and the Boulevard de Sévastopol, which even M. THIERS acknowledges to be real improvements, most of what has yet been achieved affects only the outskirts of Paris. The Boulevard du Prince Eugène runs through a series of gardens, the Boulevard Haussmann does but give loungers another road from the Madeleine to the Arc de l'Étoile. The system on which Paris has been rebuilt could only be paralleled in London by the construction of new streets on the largest scale through St. John's Wood or Tyburnia or Clapham. By this means, if the Prefect is now asked to stop, he can point to many much-needed changes in the centre of Paris, and ask his critics whether they are willing that the real wants of the city should be left uncared for, after so much money has been spent on mere accessories. There is not much chance, however, that the request will as yet be put forward in a way to demand an answer. Financiers and politicians may predict that an evil day is coming, but the general public sees only that Paris has become a more enjoyable place to live in, and that the crowds of strangers which have been thus attracted thither spend a good deal of money during their stay. The people who find the outlay and the people who gain by it are not the same, and at present the Government is more interested in pleasing the latter than in lightening the burdens of the former. Baron HAUSSMANN's gourd will hardly be cut down just yet.

INDEPENDENCE OF THOUGHT.

NONE of Mr. Mill's works is so brilliantly written, none has so much of the prophetic air, none is supported by such a force of genuine and intelligible passion, as his Essay on Liberty. The propositions therein contained are directed, not against some subtle metaphysical hypothesis or politico-economical fallacy, but against that which is the most pervading power in the whole world, which dominates with irresistible force over the uneducated and the unthinking, and is scarcely ever wholly expelled even from the learned and the intelligent—the sense of blind companionship, the laziness which cannot, and the fear which dares not, form any thought for itself, the instinctive clinging for help to another which arises from the want of individual energy of soul. Who can deny the merit of a philosopher who comes forward to attack this temper, and to encourage men to dare, at all costs, to be themselves? Nevertheless we are of opinion that Mr. Mill, in the vehemence of his assault on one error, has forgotten the existence of an opposite error, and has in consequence neglected to gain a full view of that temperament which is the best aid to every man in the discovery of truth. And though the subject is one of the most extensive, yet a few hints towards clearing it up may not be unprofitably given in a short compass.

Men are, as a fact, widely different from each other. Even between those who are nearest in blood, in neighbourhood, and in friendship, the dissimilarities are great; and between men brought up in different spheres, and especially of diverse nationality, the distance in thought, feeling, and opinion becomes so wide as hardly ever to be bridged over in such a manner as to lead to a perfect mutual understanding. Now this far-stretching, deep-seated diversity of men is a fact to be recognised, and yet it is a fact which it needs some courage to recognise. For there is a sense of safety in community of thought and belief; no one likes to be considered an outcast from the general tone of those among whom he lives; and when once some strong mind has impressed a certain habitual disposition on its neighbours, any one who dissents from this is considered strange, unaccountable, and an alien. As sheep keep warm by huddling close together, so the opinions of common men retain their vitality and existence by their affinity and close neighbourhood to each other. And yet beneath this outward appearance of similarity there is in truth a wide dissimilarity; men repeat the same phrases and the same watchwords, while the real moving force of their lives, their deepest faith and most constant desire, may be fundamentally different, and even opposite. And it is an essential condition of veracity, of sincerity, of advance in the knowledge of reality, that men should open their eyes to this diversity, should learn that agreement in words is no sure guarantee of agreement in thought, and should be content to resign the apparent unity which had prevailed among them when they know that it only serves to cloak over an actual disunion. This is the meaning of the advice given to men to "dare to be themselves"; to dare to examine what is their genuine state, what they truly desire, hope, and believe, and not be staggered should they discover that, in their natural selves and of their own spontaneous disposition, they would not express themselves as they have been taught and accustomed to express themselves in imitation of others. This is true liberty of thought; it is the liberation from the bondage of words; and it must of necessity result in the liberation of speech. For no man can be individual in thought without the struggle to express this individuality in the concrete and permanent form of language; if his thought does not advance in strength and durability, it decays and dies. It does not, unfortunately, by any means necessarily follow that when a man has won freedom of thought for himself he should desire it for others also; but others will naturally have a tendency to imitate his example; and after a time it is discovered that this individuality, this breaking of the chain of formal unrealized words, is in all cases an advance towards truth. And thus thinkers who are free themselves do in the end consent, and even rejoice, that others should be free also, in spite of their opinion that this freedom is, in many cases, used to oppose what they themselves regard as most valuable.

So far Mr. Mill, as we understand him, says; and so far we agree with him. But the evils caused by pressing to an extravagant degree this spirit of individuality are not stated by Mr. Mill; as far as appears, they have not been observed by him; and indeed his own works do, unless we are much mistaken, show very clear signs that he has suffered from this non-observance. For, granted that men are to "dare to be themselves"; that they are to recognise and insist upon what they themselves naturally think, and not merge it in any form of words prescribed to them by another; is this recognition of diversity, of our own individual opinion as opposed to that of others, an ultimate state? Certainly not; no man either thinks for himself alone, or by himself alone. The bulk of our knowledge, in all its broader and more general portions, we receive through others; the society in which we dwell has from our earliest years been pouring into our minds opinions, ideas, prejudices, thoughts; what is peculiar to ourselves is for the most part merely the combination and form in which these are held. And, conversely, we cannot hold strongly any belief, in whatever proportion it may owe its origin to the influence of others or to our own energy, without desiring to diffuse that belief back over the whole society from which so many of its main elements must necessarily have been derived. We cannot genuinely believe, without the desire to propagate our belief. It is not the sense of individuality alone, it is the sense of individuality joined with the sense of community in one bond with all mankind, that is the only trustworthy guide in the pursuit of truth.

Thus it is necessary to preach to men, not merely that they ought to be individual, but also that they ought to be social; and our energy in clinging to the one of these doctrines should imply a corresponding energy in clinging to the other. In a certain sense, both of these forms of moral teaching are commonplace; the maxims "Dare to think for yourself," and "Pay respect to what other people think," are each of them some thousands of years old. But there is a vast difference between assenting to the terms of a moral maxim and grasping vividly its meaning in connexion with the particular circumstances of the time. And if men at the present day are less individual than they ought to be, it is not the less true that their social instincts are defective (and we speak more especially of this matter of opinions and beliefs); they do not submit themselves sufficiently to other minds; they do not endeavour with all their power to absorb the elements of good in doctrines which come to them under a forbidding guise; they have not the humility to think that they may possibly be misapprehending those whom they condemn; they have not the generosity to suspend their judgment, however they may profess in words toleration for the obnoxious opinions. The maxims which should guide a true thinker are these:—"Homo sum, nihil humani a me alienum puto"; "The whole creation groaneth and travaileth in pain together until now." These maxims are, indeed, very difficult to hold by practically. When we meet some actual representative of unpalatable beliefs, how can we repress our rising indignation? The conviction almost unavoidably forces itself upon us that his qualities of head and heart are far from what they ought to be, far below the standard at which our own are maintained. And this conviction puts his obstinacy in a still worse light, for he actually rejoices in these bad qualities of his. How tempting it is to put him (if we can do so) into a logical dilemma, and leave him there! But "Nihil humani a me alienum puto" is the only justifiable principle; we cannot sever ourselves from the faults and errors of our neighbour. Whether his desires and principles are in reality better or worse than our own cannot, for the most part, be known till after diligent examination; and in the meanwhile we must do our utmost to identify ourselves with him, and try to discern, under strange forms of words, fears and hopes which are really inherent in ourselves. For it will generally be found, among men of the same generation, that common impulses have prevailed among them, even when the outward appearances are most dissimilar. The same character will re-appear in the statesman, the poet, the philosopher, and the architect; it will be the same fundamental cause that makes one man a fanatical revolutionist, another a bigoted obstructive, a third a sceptic. It is then the task of a man who really wishes to know the truth for himself, and truly to judge his neighbours, to penetrate beneath that outward mask which words throw over thought, and to discern the identity which lies hid below. He must assume, even when appearances seem most to contradict it, that he is not alien from those who most deeply offend him. There is a fundamental rationality in man; and though it is hard, amid the confused skein of words, the premature and tentative efforts at grasping and expressing the whole sum of truth, which have marked every successive generation, to disentangle that which is the clue to the whole—the genuine impulse which was the origin of so much that is obscure and seemingly nonsensical—yet the endeavour must be persistently made. And if we are inclined, as is often the case, to be angry with those who take their opinions by rote, yet such anger should not be extreme. Those who take their opinions by rote do, in effect, as far as in them lies, ally themselves with so much of our common humanity as comes within their reach; they testify to the existence of the common bond between themselves and others; and this should be admitted, even when we blame their indolence or timidity in refraining from the energy of individual thought.

This sympathy with men, which is so valuable, this identification of ourselves with others, and abnegation of our own individuality in favour of the common spirit of mankind, this dexterity in penetrating through the uncouth and unfashioned speech to the real thought of those with whom we have to deal, is not won by logical power, though logical power may be a great aid towards perfecting it. It is far more closely allied to the imagination; and, like all imaginative excellence, it demands as its condition tenderness, delicacy, and the absence of self-sufficiency. Now these are qualities which intellectual men are wont to overlook, and sometimes even to despise; their chief aim is, too often, to be unassailable; so long as they are impregnable in the propositions which they venture to affirm, they do not care how scanty those propositions may be, how inadequate to maintain men even in their present condition of happiness, how little likely to be fruitful of great and important discoveries. The position of such a man as Kepler, nine-tenths of whose works are pure failure and mystical obscurity, but who in the tenth part discovered some of the most pregnant and valuable truths ever laid open by man, is surely far more honourable than the position of Hume, who contented himself with the lucid exhibition of the difficulties and seemingly insoluble contradictions to which the ordinary beliefs of his time, and the theses of its most genuine inquirers, might be brought.

We do not say that the present generation is very conspicuously inferior to preceding generations in the cultivation of the sentiments which we have been recommending. But it ought to be superior; and we think that on the whole, since the beginning of the century, there has been retrogression. The intellectual men of the present time look on themselves as a peculiar people, place themselves in isolation from the thoughts of other ages, survey with contempt all ideas that do not spring from a certain circle of thinkers; which certainly was not the case then. They do indeed think that they justify themselves by claiming to be on the side of the large uneducated or imperfectly educated classes of the community. But it stands to reason that they must in reality be further removed from the sympathies of these than from those of the intervening classes, the middle ranks or the well-educated Conservatives. And it is sheer irrational partisanship to establish an alliance on the single basis of a dislike held by both parties in common, or on anything except a genuine mutual understanding. That cannot be a sincere respect for another which is taken up as a means of exciting prejudice against a third party. For our own part, we desire to express a genuine respect for the working-classes. But we say that, as is the case with all people who have insufficient leisure, their knowledge of language is not sufficient to enable them to express with accuracy their real wants; their knowledge of things is not sufficient to enable them to discern the remedies for those wants. They, in short, are sincere and true in feeling, and it is most important that their voice should be heard; but their language needs interpretation, and this, distinctly, through the defect of intellectual development. And when a public writer discharges accusations of immorality against the ministers of all religions because they use the words that have been taught them by others, he fails to see that this is, in some degree, an inevitable necessity for all men; and that it becomes a still more stringent necessity in proportion to the diminished leisure and opportunities of the class of whom we have been speaking.

We have wandered from Mr. Mill. And, in reference to this point, we are sure that Mr. Mill has always strenuously endeavoured to do justice, to escape from isolation and a narrow individuality, and to enter into the sympathies of men. But his works bear it on their face that this has always been an effort to him; it is not his natural instinct; he has always preferred the combative position. And in truth, with all Mr. Mill's desire for fairness, we do not know any philosopher whose treatment of his opponents is so unintentionally irritating. He never entirely quits the region of words; Plato says one thing, and Cicero says another, and Comte another, and these sayings (remarks Mr. Mill) are fallacies or absurdities; but to put himself in Plato's or Cicero's or Comte's position, to see what they were aiming at, what was the central instinct that made them wander into these (if you like) absurd propositions, he does not inquire. He has seldom been able to cast himself loose from formulated language, and to feel the tentative motions of another's spirit. And hence his conclusion with respect to the vast majority of previous philosophers is that nearly everything which they have put forward is absurd. He praises them for this, and only for this, that they dared to think in a way contrary to that of ordinary men—a merit which, in his eyes, far outweighs the fault of absurdity in the opinions. To us it appears that, if this were the only praise that could be assigned to such philosophers as Descartes and Leibnitz, it would be one of the strongest possible arguments against individuality of thought. If individuality has, in the greater number of its most eminent possessors, led simply to absurdity, is not this an argument against individuality? We assent to Mr. Mill's enthusiasm for individuality; but in order to assent to it, we are obliged to conclude that his treatment of the philosophers most eminent for individuality has been very imperfect indeed.

NATURAL SELECTION AMONGST MANKIND.

IF Mr. Darwin's doctrine is well founded, the human race as at present constituted is the result of a long and exceedingly slow elaboration. It resembles one of the machines advertised as possessing all the newest and best improvements. We, in our collective capacity, are heirs of all the ages from the first dawn of life until now, and, until we are in turn superseded by something better, may flatter ourselves that we combine in the highest degree practicable all reconcilable good qualities. What may be the ultimate value of these speculations is at present, and perhaps is likely long to remain, an open question; but one application of the theory, amongst many others, is of extreme practical interest. We may or may not have descended from the monkeys, and if we have, it must be granted that, in spite of much which might be urged to the contrary, we have on the whole made a distinct advance in morality and intelligence. In spite of wars and pauperism and commercial scandals, we are very superior to the dogheaded baboons. But the question remains, whether the same process is still at work amongst mankind. Is it true that the races which are furthest removed from the animals tend to supplant those of a distinctly lower type? Is it probable that at some distant period the world will be peopled by civilized beings of European descent, and that from them will arise a still nobler race, with larger brains, greater physical capacities, and more highly developed social affections? Without looking to a future so remote that our feeble vision can never expect to penetrate its depths, we may ask whether a progress in that direction is distinctly visible to the naked eye. It might be vain to inquire whether in a few million years there will be a race of beings on the planet capable of looking down upon us as we look down upon naked savages, or even "showing a Newton as we show an ape"; but it is important to know whether on the whole the superior races of mankind are supplanting those just below them in the scale, or whether some of the highest qualities at present developed are likely to be absorbed in a competition with inferior races of men. Certain familiar facts may be quoted in favour of the more cheerful prospect. New Zealanders and Red Indians are on the road to extinction, and the capacity of the negro to survive competition with the white man is still a very doubtful problem. The best hope held out for him is that he may survive, free from the disadvantages of slavery, but still at the best a serviceable and distinctly inferior drudge. If we might confidently apply these results to races divided by less palpable distinctions, we should infer, not only that Europeans are supplanting savages, but that the best races of Europe are likely to supplant those a degree or two below them. In other words, of course, we should look forward to the day when the population of the globe would be of exclusively English descent, which would be inexpressibly cheering.

Two or three difficulties, however, have been raised, which point to causes likely to retard this desirable consummation. Thus it has been said, although statisticians do not seem as yet to have decided the point, that the native American is being absorbed by the foreign immigration, and that expressly because he represents on the whole a superior type of civilization. The educated and intelligent native naturally feels the influence of prudential restraints. He does not marry, unless he has a fair prospect of supporting a family. He tends more and more to approximate to the social condition illustrated in France, where population increases so slowly as to be all but stationary. Meanwhile the immigrant, with a far lower standard of comfort, multiplies at an unprecedented rate, and bids fair in a few generations completely to swamp the higher type of man, and that for the very reason that he is at a lower intellectual stage. In other words, the fact that one part of a population is less capable of foresight and self-restraint gives it a direct advantage in the struggle for existence. It is unnecessary for this purpose to ask whether the facts are correctly stated, or whether there may not be some other explanation at hand. It may be said, for example, that the native American is physically degenerate, and is so far an inferior animal that, from certain climatic influences, or from the social habits of the people, his constitution is not so robust as that of his ancestors. It may be that the race is undergoing a slow process of acclimatization, and that a true interpretation of the facts observed would be somewhat different; the advantage would only be in the first race of emigrants, and ultimately those who had adapted themselves to the new soil through a long process of modification would gain the superiority. This, however, is a speculation for which the proper data have not as yet been accumulated. The difficulty suggested is the simple one that, in certain cases, the absence of that sensibility to prudential restraints which is the product of long-continued civilization gives an advantage to the least civilized part of the community. An argument in some respects similar is urged by alarmists of a different class. In California and Australia, it is said, the man of European origin is being ousted by the Asiatic. The Chinaman is an inferior being, both physically and intellectually, to his competitor. He can do less work, and is less capable of the higher kinds of thought. As, however, he can live upon the bare leavings of an American or English labourer, he succeeds in insinuating himself into the lower branches of labour, and, having abundance of ingenuity, industry, and capacity for imitation, he gradually ousts his more cultivated, but more expensive, rival. He is already the object of bitter jealousy; and, considering his perseverance, his powers of increase, and the enormous population of which he is the representative, he is likely to become even more formidable in future. If the Irishman swamps the American, Irishmen and Americans alike are in danger of being eaten out in course of time by the semi-barbarian races of the East, and the world, instead of being Americanized, will undergo a process for which a similar word should, if possible, be coined from the substantive Chinese. The danger is, of course, remote; but if a population of 300,000,000 once takes to expanding beyond its borders in a rapid geometrical increase, it is hard to assign any limits to its possible future.

A danger of a different kind is suggested by another observer. The agricultural population of the country is, it has been said, physically deteriorating. So far as the decay results from insufficient food and clothing, we may hope that it is a temporary and local result, caused, not by the progress of civilization, but by the fact that civilization has failed to penetrate into certain districts. But it is further argued that the improvements which have come within reach of the poorer classes have failed to benefit them permanently. A great many feeble infants have been preserved, who, under a rougher system, would have died; and, consequently, the average strength of constitution is diminished. The hardships of former times acted usefully by thinning out the population, and the healthier were selected by a spontaneous process to grow up and become the parents of the next generation. How far this can be true as a rule must be a very complicated question. The hardships which kill off the weak must tell more or less prejudicially upon the strong who survive. If we succeed in bringing up many who would have disappeared under a more severe test, it is fair to suppose that we also destroy certain evils which would have brought down the general standard of health. The implied doctrine seems to be that certain trials which injure the sickly tend positively to invigorate the healthy. But the hardening theory is only applicable within very narrow limits, and the more ordinary case would seem to be that anything which is bad for one class tells proportionately upon the other. Certainly the savage tribes upon whom the experiment is tried on the largest scale seem to be of distinctly weaker fibre than the more pampered European; and the soldier who has been luxuriously brought up is said to stand hardships better than his rougher companion who, in the common phrase, has been inured to hardships from his youth. Still we may suppose that, within certain limits, which it is impossible to define, the effect of rearing the sickly part of the population is to produce a race of inferior stamina. If we had not certain awkward moral feelings, we ought to choose out the most promising babies, as we take the best-looking puppies in a litter, and remorselessly drown all who are not strong enough to live.

The general result would therefore be that civilization produces upon the human race an effect analogous to that which racing is alleged to produce upon the breed of horses. We certainly develop some qualities in a very high degree; we get a highly nervous, sensitive, and intellectual race; but they are wanting in the robust physical qualification which is a necessary substratum for their other merits. The first necessity of a population, as for an individual, is that it should live. It may display the finest intelligence, but if it has not vitality enough to carry on an internecine struggle for existence, it will not be able to get a hearing at all in this world. The rough pachydermatous part of the population will expand at the cost of the more refined; the inferior races, which on the whole manage to produce a greater surplus with a given amount of labour, will push on one side the more costly, though more powerful, machine, just as screw-steamers supplant paddle-wheels, not because they are faster or more convenient, but because they burn less coal to produce a given speed. And finally, if we become so tender-hearted as to rear all the weakly constitutions, we shall pay for our humanity by degenerating in average strength, and shall be literally too good for this world; or, if a statement in such terms sounds too improbable, we may say that our goodnature may perhaps be developed out of proportion to our foresight or our severer virtues. So far as there is any truth in this view, it would not be in any way opposed to the doctrine of natural selection; for that doctrine merely asserts that the races will survive which, on the whole, are best adapted to the world in which we live. It would be a partial condemnation of our modern civilization, and would show that, although it has produced a race distinctly better fitted for self-preservation than the Red Indian or the negro, it has yet developed mankind in a very imperfect and one-sided manner. We are trying, according to the proverb, to chop blocks with razors, and have encouraged delicacy at the price of strength. Men, like horses, are becoming "weedy," and require an infusion of some stronger and less highly strung organizations. The excitable American needs to be invigorated by the duller European immigrant; and in some climates at least, the white man will have to be content with supplying commanding officers to use their brains in directing the ruder rank and file of Asiatic races. In short, we should have to regard the development of mankind, not as a continuous process in which the finest race in existence at a given period always tends to multiply at the expense of its neighbours, but rather as a tentative and vacillating advance, where certain races gain for a time exceptional merits at the expense of vitality, and then have to sink back upon the more vigorous breeds of the second rank.

The observations necessary to determine this point would undoubtedly be of the highest interest. We should hardly be philosophical enough to be reconciled to a partial deterioration of the race by the fact that it is in accordance with the law of natural selection. It would be melancholy to believe that the progress upon which we pride ourselves is in part illusory, and that we must start again from a lower platform. We would infinitely rather discover that the alleged indications of decline are merely exceptional. The case of a new country is obviously not quite in point. There is there a special demand for the rougher kinds of labour, and the race which increases most rapidly has an advantage which it does not possess in other countries. What is required is as many millions as possible of rough hard-working pioneers; and the enormous increase of the immigrant population in America has been in fact produced immediately by such a demand. In a country in the normal state, where the limits of population are closer, the more intellectual qualities will give a greater advantage; and it is at least probable that the evils which result from preserving the weakly children will be counterbalanced by removing the causes of general depression. This, however, is an intricate problem, which we must be content for the present simply to note, without attempting to discover a satisfactory solution.

DOLLS.

THE love of dolls is instinctive with children, and a nursery without some of these silent simulacra for the amusement of the little ones is a very lifeless affair. But outside the nursery door they are stupid things enough; and whether improvised of wisped-up bundles of rags, or made of the costliest kind of composition, they are at the best mere pretences for the pastime of babies, not living creatures to be loved, or artistic creations to be admired. Certainly they are pretty in their own way, and some are made to simulate human actions quite cleverly; and one of their charms with children is that they can treat them like sentient beings without a chance of being turned upon. They can scold them for being naughty, and put them to bed in broad daylight for a punishment, and seat them in the corner with their impassive faces turned to the wall, just as they themselves are dealt with; the doll all the time smiling exactly as it smiled before, its round blue beads staring just as they stared before, neither scolding nor cornering making more impression on its sawdust soul than do little missy's sobs and tears when nurse is cross and dolly is her only friend. But the child has had its hour of play and make-believe sentiment of companionship and authority; and so, if the doll can do no good of itself, it can at least be the occasion of pleasantness to others.

Now there are women who are dolls in all but the mere accident of material. The doll proper is a simple structure of wax or wood, "its knees and elbows glued together"; and the human doll is a complex machine of flesh and blood. But, saving such structural differences, these women are as essentially dolls as those in the bazaar which open and shut their eyes at the word of command, enforced by a wire, and squeak when you pinch them in the middle. There are women who seem born into the world only as the playthings and make-believes of human life. As impassive as the waxen creatures in the nursery, no remonstrance touches them and no experience teaches them. Their final cause seems to be to look pretty, to be always in perfect drawing-room order, and to be the occasions by which their friends and companions are taught patience and self-denial. And they perfectly fulfil their destiny; which may be so much carried to their credit. A doll woman is hopelessly useless, and can do nothing with her brains or her hands. In distress or sickness she can only sit by you, and look as sorrowful as her round smooth face will permit, but she has not a helping suggestion to make, not a fraction of practical power to put forth. When a man has married a doll wife he has assigned himself to absolute loneliness or a double burden. He cannot live with his pretty toy in any more reality of sympathy than does a child with her puppet. He can tell her nothing of his affairs, nothing of his troubles or of his thoughts, because she can impart no new idea, even from the woman's point of view. Not from want of heart, but from want of brains to understand another's life. Is she not a doll? and does not the very essence of her dollhood lie in this want of perceptive faculty at all times, both for things and feelings? What are the hot flushes of passion, the bitter tears of grief, the frenzy of despair, to her? She sees them, and she wonders that people can be so silly as to make themselves and her so uncomfortable; but of the depth of the anguish they express she knows no more than does her waxen image when little missy sobs over it in her arms, and confides her sorrows to its deaf ears. Whatever anxieties oppress her husband, he must keep them religiously to himself, he cannot share them with her; and the last shred of his credit, like the last effort of his strength, must be employed in maintaining his toy wife in the fool's paradise where alone she can make her habitation. Many a man's back has broken under the strain of such a burden, and many a ruined fortune might have been held together, and repaired when damaged, had it not been for the exigencies and necessities of the living doll, who had to be spared all want or inconvenience at the cost of everything else. How many men are groaning in spirit at this moment over the infatuation that made them sacrifice the whole worth of life for the sake of a pretty face and a plastic manner!

The doll woman is as helpless practically as she is useless morally. If there is any personal danger about, she either faints or becomes dazed, according to her physiological conditions. Sometimes she is hysterical and frantic, and then she is actively troublesome. In general, however, she is just so much dead weight on hand, to be thought for as well as protected—a living corpse to be carried on the shoulders of those who are struggling for their own lives. She can foresee no possibilities, measure no distances, think of no means of escape. Never quick or ready, there is a total paralysis of such wits as she possesses in a moment of pressure; and it is not from selfishness so much as from pure incapacity to do otherwise that the poor doll falls down in a helpless heap of self-surrender, and lets her very children perish before her eyes without making an effort to protect them. As a mother, indeed, the doll woman is perhaps more unsatisfactory than in any other character. She gives up her nursery into the absolute keeping of her nurse, and does not attempt to control or to interfere. This, again, is not from want of affection, but from want of capacity. In her tepid way she has a heart, if only half-vitalized like the rest of her being; and she is by no means cruel. Indeed, she has not force enough to be cruel or wicked anyhow; her worst offence being a passive kind of selfishness, not from greed, but from inactivity, by which she is made simply useless for the general good. As for her children, she understands neither their moral nature nor their physical wants; and beyond a universal "Oh, naughty!" if the little ones express their lives in the rampant manner proper to young things, or as universal a "Oh, let them have it!" if there is a howl over what is forbidden or unwise, she has no idea of discipline or management. If they teaze her, they are sent away; if they are naughty, they are whipped at her request by papa or nurse; if they are ill, the doctor is summoned, and they have medicine as he directs; but none of the finer and more intimate relations usual between mother and child exist in the home of the doll mother. The children are the property of the nurse only, unless indeed the father happens to be a specially affectionate and a specially domestic man, and then he does the work of the mother—at the best clumsily, but at the worst better than the doll could do it.

Very shocking and revolting are all the more tragic facts of human life to the smooth-skinned easy-going doll. When it comes to her own turn to bear pain, she wonders how a good God can permit her to suffer. Had she brains enough to think, the great mystery of pain would make her atheistical in her angry surprise that she should be so hardly dealt with. As dolls have a constitutional immunity from suffering, her first initiation into even a minor amount of anguish is generally a tremendous affair; and though it may be pain of a quite natural and universal character, she is none the less indignant and astonished at her portion. She invariably thinks herself worse treated than her sisters, and cannot be made to understand that others suffer as much as, and more than, herself. As she has always shrunk from witnessing trouble of any kind, and as what she has seen has passed over her mind without leaving any impression, she comes to her own sorrows totally inexperienced; and one of the most pitiable sights in the world is that of a poor doll woman writhing in the grasp of physical agony, and broken down or rendered insanely impatient by what other women can bear without a murmur. When she is in the presence of the moral tragedies of life, she is as lost and bewildered as she is with the physical. All sin and crime are to her odd and inexplicable. She cannot pity the sinner, because she cannot understand the temptation; and she cannot condemn from any lofty standpoint, because she has not mind enough to see the full meaning of iniquity. It is simply something out of the ordinary run of her life, and the doll naturally dislikes disturbance, whether of habit or of thought. Yet if a noted criminal came and sat down by her, she would probably whisper to her next friend, "How shocking!" but she would simper when he spoke, and perhaps in her heart feel flattered by the attention of even so doubtful a notoriety. If she is a doll with a bias towards naughtiness, the utmost limit to which she can go is a mild kind of curiosity about the outsides of things—the mere husk and rind of the forbidden fruit—such as wondering how such and such people look who have done such dreadful things, and what they felt the next morning, and how could they ever come to think of such horrors. She would be more interested in hearing about the dress and hair and eyes of the female plaintiff or defendant in a famous cause than many other women would be; but she would not give herself the trouble to read the evidence, and she would take all her opinions secondhand. But whether the colour of the lady's gown was brown or blue, and whether she wore her hair wisped or plaited, would be matters in which she would take as intense an interest as is possible to her. The utmost limit to which enthusiasm can be carried with her is in the matter of dress and fashion; and the only subject that thoroughly arouses her is the last new colour, or the latest eccentricity of costume. Talk to her of books, and she will go to sleep; even novels, her sole reading, she forgets half an hour after she has turned the last page; while of any other kind of literature she is as profoundly ignorant as she is of mathematics; but she can discuss the mysteries of fashion with something like animation, these being to her what the wire is to the eyes of the dolls in the bazaar. Else she has no power of conversation. At the head of her own table she sits like a pretty waxen dummy, and can only simper out a few commonplaces, or simper without the commonplaces, satisfied if she is well appointed and looks lovely, and if her husband seems tolerably contented with the dinner. She is more in her element at a ball, where she is only asked to dance and not wanted to talk; but her ball-room days do not last for ever, and when they are over she has no available retreat

If a rich doll woman is a mistake, a poor one who has been rich is about the greatest infliction that can be laid on a suffering household. Not all the teaching of experience can make wax and glue into flesh and blood, and nothing can train the human doll into a dignified or a capable womanhood. She still dresses in faded finery, which she calls keeping up appearances, and still has pretensions, which no "inexorable logic of facts" can destroy. She spends her money on sweets and ribbons, and ignores the family need for meat and calico; and she sits by the fireside dozing over a trashy novel, while her children are in rags, and her house one scene of disorder. But then she has a craze for the word "lady-like," and thinks it synonymous with ignorance and helplessness. She abhors the masculine-minded woman who helps her—sister, cousin, or daughter—so far as she can abhor anything; but she is glad to lean on her strength, despite this abhorrence, and, while grumbling at her masculinity does not disdain to take advantage of her power. She is only negatively disagreeable though; and for all that she carps under her breath, will remain in any position in which she is placed. She will not act, but she will be passive; which is something gained when you have to deal with fools. This quiescence of hers passes with the world for plasticity and amiability; it is neither; it is simply indolence and want of originating force. While she is young, she is nice enough to those who care only for a pretty face and a character founded on negatives; but when a man's pride of life has gone, and he has come into the phase of weakness, or under the harrow of affliction, or into the shadow of the valley of death, then she becomes in sorrowful truth the chain and bullet which make him a galley-slave for the remainder of his days, and which sign him to drudgery and despair.

As an old woman the doll has not a charm. She has learnt no handiness, come to none of that grand maternal power of helping others which should accompany maturity and age; she has still to be thought for and protected, to the exclusion of the younger and naturally more helpless, as when she was young herself, and beautiful and fascinating, and men thought it a privilege to suffer for her sake. Nine times out of ten she has lost her temper as well as her complexion, and has become peevish and unreasonable. She gets fat, and rouges; but she will not consent to get old. She takes to false hair, and dyes, and padded stays, and artful contrivances of every description; but alas! there is no "dolly's hospital" for her as there used to be for her battered old prototype in the nursery lumber-closet; and, whether she likes it or not, she has to succumb to the inevitable decree, and to become faded, worn out, and unlovely, till the final coup de grâce is given, and the poor doll is no more. Poor, weak, frivolous doll! it requires some faith to believe that she is of any good whatsoever in this overladen life of ours; but doubtless she has her final uses, though it would puzzle a Sanhedrim of wise men to discover them; and perhaps in the great readjustment of the future she may have her place and her work assigned to her, when the meaning of her being shall be made manifest.

THE SPANISH EXPERIMENT.

It is not easy to say what the existing form of Government in Spain is, or how far it is even intended to be permanent. But, as far as anything can be made out, things look as if an experiment was being tried which must be of the highest interest to students of political constitutions. A person who is certainly not a King, and who does not appear to be a President, is called upon to name a Cabinet. His relations to the Cortes do not seem to be very clearly defined, but it looks as if they were to be of a kind quite different from anything which has yet been tried in the way of constitution-making. Such a form of Executive as seems to be intended would be quite unlike the Executive of any country now existing, whether kingly or republican. The peculiarity, if we rightly understand the case, would seem to be this, that the Ministry, the actual governing body, is to be named by a chief directly appointed by the Legislature, and, we imagine, liable to be removed at its will. This is something different from the forms usual either in a republic or in a constitutional monarchy, and it would seem to give the Legislature a greater, at all events a more direct, power over the Executive than it possesses in any known kingdom or commonwealth.

Whether such a system lasts or not, and whether this really be what is intended in Spain or not, the question is at least worth discussing as a curious point of political science. The form of Executive which seems to be intended is one which is quite conceivable in idea, though, as far as we know, it has never yet been tried. The power vested in the Legislature would be much the same as that which is practically vested in our House of Commons, but it would be exercised in quite a different way. We should always remember that, in our own system, what we call the Constitution, as distinguished from the law, is something purely conventional. The responsibility of an English Minister includes two quite different things. In law it means that his office gives him no privilege; that if, in the discharge of his office, he commits any illegal act, he is responsible to the same tribunals, and is liable to the same penalties, as any other man. But in the language of the conventional Constitution, Ministerial responsibility means something much more than this. It means that, though all his acts may have been perfectly legal, yet, if the House of Commons advisedly disapproves of him, his measures, and his policy, he is bound to resign office. We have in short a system of what we may call unwritten political law, which no statute has decreed and of which no judge can take any notice, but which practically regulates the relations between the Executive and Legislative branches of the State. And what it comes to in the end is this, that the House of Commons does, in an indirect and very roundabout way, but still practically and effectually, appoint and remove those who have the actual management of affairs. It does not directly name them; it does not directly remove them; but no Minister whom the House wishes to get rid of can remain in office against its will. Now we have always been led to think that this great control exercised by the Legislature over the Executive was practicable only because there was a power beyond and above all, a power which formally appoints, which may even exercise some personal choice in its appointments, but whose choice is still narrowly limited by the clear indication of the will of the House. In short we have always supposed that the House could exercise this power simply because England, and the States which in this respect have copied England, are monarchies and not republics.

For it is plain that in the chief republican States the control of the Legislature over the Executive is far from being so great as that which we have just described. We have heard over and over again that the Executive of a Republic, the President or the Executive Council, must be appointed for a definite time, and, good or bad, must be endured till the end of that time. As all the world knows, the President of the United States cannot be got rid of simply because Congress dislikes his policy, or refuses to pass the measures which he recommends. He may indeed be impeached and deposed, but only on proof of some definite illegal act. It has been said over and over again that a bad President must, with this last exception, be endured till the end of his term, while a good one cannot be continued beyond his term without a formal re-election. We know perfectly well that the President and Congress may be at open war with one another during the whole time of their joint legal existence, without either having any means of getting rid of the other. And this state of things has been over and over again contrasted with the power of the House of Commons to get rid of a bad Minister when it chooses, and to keep a good one as long as it chooses. To be sure this constitutional belief received a certain shock during the last Parliament, through Mr. Disraeli clinging to office when supported only by a manifest minority in the House. His friends, when twitted with this at the late election, used to answer that no vote of want of confidence had been passed against him. They conveniently forgot how many Ministers had resigned office without waiting for any vote of want of confidence, because the House had unmistakeably shown its want of confidence without any formal vote. But their answer showed that, even in the Conservative view, a Minister must give way to a vote of want of confidence. And this is enough to maintain the principle. They admit that a vote of want of confidence, the effect of which is purely conventional, is enough to get rid of a Minister, without waiting for the legal effects of an impeachment or a bill of pains and penalties. And this is quite enough to mark the distinction. No vote of want of confidence can get rid of a President of the United States.

The Swiss Federal Council again, and the Executives of the several Swiss Cantons, stand in essentially the same position. There is every chance of the Federal Legislature and Federal Executive being on good terms, seeing that the Federal Council is elected by the two Houses for their own term of existence. There is therefore not the same fear of their clashing with the Legislature as there is when, as in the United States, the Legislature and the Executive are chosen by distinct acts of the people for different terms of office. How well the Swiss Legislature and Executive do work together is shown by the very small number of cases in which a Federal Councillor has failed to obtain re-election. Still the two Executives are legally in the same position. If the Swiss Legislature happened to disapprove of the acts of the Federal Council, there would be no way of getting rid of them before the end of their term, unless some illegal act could be proved against them.

Now we have always been taught hitherto that this great power on the part of the House of Commons was able to exist only because of the existence of the Crown. We have always held that it was the fact that the law placed the supreme power in hands which were not legally responsible, but which were constitutionally bound to attend to the manifest wish of the Legislature, which enabled the House to get rid of the virtual rulers in this easy and indirect way. The supreme power, we always held, remained untouched through all changes of those who acted in its name; its existence hindered the necessity of any interregnum, and even of any formal transfer of power. The real powers of government might pass from one set of hands to another without any disturbance of the common routine of things, without so much as any kind of formal election. The necessity of keeping on a bad ruler, the necessity of parting with a good ruler, were both of them avoided, and that because, beyond the actual ruler, there was the supreme sovereign, unchangeable and irresponsible. Whatever might be the other advantages of a commonwealth, it could not, we always argued, change its rulers at will or keep them on at pleasure, without revolution or disturbance of any kind.

The Spanish experiment, if its nature be rightly represented, is a bold attempt to grapple with this last difficulty. It is an attempt to do, directly and openly, what the English House of Commons does indirectly and covertly. It is an attempt to have a Ministry without a King. Hitherto a Ministry, in our sense of the word, has implied a King, and a constitutional King. We say this, because it is clear that the Ministers either of a President or of a despot hold quite a different position from the Ministers of an English King, and a very inferior position. They are in fact Ministers, but not a Ministry. But in Spain it seems that we are—at least until the form of Government is finally settled—to have a real Ministry, but a Ministry without a King. They are, it seems, to be appointed by a person whom it is to be presumed the Cortes can appoint and remove. How, in such a state of things, are all these delicate points to be settled, which in England depend on no written law, but on a series of precedents applied to the circumstances of the case? In England we know instinctively when a Ministry ought to resign, but we have always thought that it would be impossible to define beforehand by statute when they ought to resign. It clearly is not a majority against them on any conceivable point which binds a Ministry to retire. Yet who could define beforehand what sort of a majority it is to which a Ministry is bound to yield? Who could undertake to set forth anything of the kind in legal form? But if the Spanish Cortes is really attempting, even for a season, to have a Ministry without a King, one would think that it must either attempt this very delicate piece of legislation, or else enter on a practical career of equal delicacy. A struggle between a President and a Congress is a great evil; but each party knows its own ground; each knows that the controversy must soon be decided by the legal death of one or other of the disputants. The nation, in its next election, Presidential or Congressional, will settle the matter one way or the other. So in England a frequent change of Ministries is a great evil; still the evil is much lessened by the quiet and almost underhand way in which the actual Government may be sent to the rightabout. But a Ministry without a King would seem almost to invite constant attack. Its position is theoretically quite intelligible; but one is inclined to doubt whether such a system could work at all—whether a Legislature formally vested with the power of changing the Executive at pleasure would not be always employed in discussing proposals for a change of the Executive, to the exclusion of all other matters of debate. The political student might like to see the experiment tried, as a chemical student might wish to see a chemical experiment tried, but the practical politician might be inclined to shake his head. Kings, Presidents, Councils, have all been tried; we know something of the working of all three; we know something of the good and the bad side of all three. But here is something wholly new. One doubts whether it can work even as a provisional system till a King is chosen, or till some other form of Government is agreed upon. As itself the permanent form of Government for a large country, it does seem a hazardous experiment indeed.

CONVOCATION ON THE IRISH CHURCH.

THAT the Lower House of Convocation should be a good deal excited on the subject of the Irish Church is natural enough. Not only are we disposed to make allowance for strong language, which is the legitimate expression of strong feeling, but in a certain sense the English Clergy in the person of their representatives were called upon to speak out. In their way, perhaps a small way, the Proctors to the Lower House were elected, by the suffrages of their constituents, to meet a direct issue, and to express the will and conscientious convictions of those constituents. Just as the House of Commons was elected with a view to the Irish Church question, so those members of the Lower House of Convocation who compose its representative element owe their seats at Westminster to a definite intention and purpose clearly enough expressed. In the case of the House of Commons and the people of England, the verdict was against the Irish Church; in the case of the House of Convocation and the Clergy of England, the verdict was against disestablishment and disendowment. On either side great men were rejected simply on this issue. Mr. Roebuck and Mr. Horsman lost their seats in Parliament because they were not sufficiently Gladstonian; Mr. Brainston and Dr. Vaughan have been summarily ejected from Convocation, because they were not able to pronounce strongly and distinctively against Mr. Gladstone. Under these circumstances, therefore, it is right and reasonable that the Convocation elected under such conditions of the clerical mind should pronounce as strongly what they were sent to the Jerusalem Chamber to pronounce, as that the Parliament men should say and do in St. Stephen's what they were expressly elected to say and do. It is idle, therefore, to find fault with the Lower House for being all but unanimous against Mr. Gladstone's policy.

But in saying this—and it is only fair to say it when such nonsense is talked about the ingratitude of the clergy in not meeting Mr. Gladstone's private courtesies and humilities to them with instant submission to his Irish Church policy—we may be permitted, while we have not a word to say against the honesty and openness, to canvass the mode and form of expression by which the representatives of her clergy are discharging a duty which we are frank to say they could not decline. That the Irish Church question could be or ought to be shirked by Convocation has not been argued. The Upper House of course felt this. In their Address to the Crown the Bishops trod gingerly on the subject. They felt that the least said the soonest mended. That their utterances were characterised by that exceeding caution which bordered very nearly on cowardice is not to be denied. Such a course as they adopted has its justification. At any rate the Address of the Bishops was very carefully and skilfully drawn. The paragraph may stand for a model of discretion; and we subjoin it, if for nothing else, as remarkable for its literary merits:—

> We look forward with deep anxiety to the measures which may be proposed to Parliament respecting the Irish branch of the United Church; and we trust that the interests of true religion may not be lost sight of amid the conflicts of political parties; and we pray that, whatever course may finally receive the sanction of the Legislature, it may tend to that which all loyal hearts desire, the peace, the enlightenment, and the good government of Ireland.

This Address of the Upper House, sent down to the inferior clergy for their adoption, was drafted by the Archbishop, proposed by the Bishop of London, and seconded by the Bishop of Oxford—each and all of them pledged and declared against Mr. Gladstone's policy—and carried nem. con. and without discussion. At any rate this indirect suggestion of moderation and caution, to which so prominent a person as the Bishop of Oxford was a party, ought not to have been thrown away on the Lower House, which we are told "met in much larger numbers than usual, the Jerusalem Chamber being uncomfortably crowded." How it was met we shall see. Canon Selwyn, scarcely able to restrain himself from "proposing, as he had intended, a separate Address," contented himself with moving an addition to the Bishops' Address in these terms:—

> We humbly and dutifully pray your Majesty not to assent to any measure for repealing, with respect to any portion of the United Kingdom, those parts of the great charter, of the 1st William and Mary, c. 6, and other statutes of the realm, which recognise the Christian Church as incorporated with the Constitution of this country, and which secure the rights and privileges of the Church. We also humbly pray your Majesty not to assent to any measure for alienating to secular purposes any portion of the property or revenues which have been dedicated to the maintenance of the worship of Almighty God, and the support of His ministers.

In explanation of one part of this proposed addition, Canon Selwyn read the words of the oath prescribed by the 1st of William and Mary, c. 6:—

> "Will you, to the utmost of your power, maintain the laws of God, the true profession of the Gospel, and the Protestant Reformed religion established by law? And will you preserve unto the Bishops and clergy of this realm, and to the Churches committed to their charge, all such rights and privileges as by law do or shall appertain unto them, or any of them?"
> King and Queen.—"All this I promise to do." King and Queen lay hand on the Holy Gospels, saying, "So help me, God."

After considerable discussion, this addition was carried by 36 against 15 votes; but, as we are told by the same authority which gives those numbers that more than a hundred members were present, it seems that one half of the Venerable House used the discretion of not voting. Many of them perhaps on the ground, openly avowed afterwards, that Canon Selwyn's addition was not sufficiently forcible. In the course of the debate some strong things were said. It was a strong, not to say a perilous, thing in Archdeacon Selwyn to quote the Coronation Oath—which, if we view its language as simply reciting and repeating the pre-Reformation formula, only means a pledge on the part of the House to guarantee to the spiritualty such temporal possessions "as by law shall appertain to them"—and in which sense the term "Churches" only means the fabrics and estates; or, if we construe this word "Churches" in its Revolution sense, it must mean, what Dean Stanley would argue, the Presbyterian as well as Episcopal community, the Kirk as well as the Church. And it was a strong thing in Canon Selwyn to recommend the Queen not to assent to the Government measure if passed by Parliament. Still stronger was it in Archdeacon Denison to regret that Canon Selwyn's strong language was not strong enough, and to require that Church disestablishment should be treated as a sin and a robbery—a sentiment which the charity of Dr. Jebb made more heavy by craving permission, while "alluding to the sin," to "speak somewhat of the sinner." If even a Liberal such as Canon Blakesley, who himself "extremely regretted" Mr. Gladstone's policy, recommended in the interests of the Irish Establishment caution, and suggested that premature and violent language on the part of Convocation would certainly defeat their object; if the Dean of Ely, who went so far as to characterize the Bishops' Address as "singularly weak," had still so much common sense as to remark that "to ask the Queen to put herself into collision with both Houses of Parliament might possibly jeopardize her crown"—these wise counsels were met with a remarkable retort from Archdeacon Moore:—"Better jeopardize the Crown than destroy the Church." Again, if Archdeacon Grant suggested that the country at large had expressed itself most unmistakeably on the question, and that the Bishops from their Parliamentary experience might perhaps know better than the country clergy what language was not only most suitable, but most expedient, to address to the Crown, he was met by a rejoinder from Canon Selwyn himself, in which he openly declared that "they, the Lower House, were as much Her Majesty's advisers, and as constitutional as were her Ministers." With these feelings rampant in the Jerusalem Chamber, as we have said, Canon Selwyn's addition to the Bishops' Address was carried, as was another proposed by Archdeacon Denison, who "could not vote for the last motion" (Mr. Selwyn's), because it was too weak and hesitating, and seconded by Dr. Jebb on the express and avowed principle that "the Queen had a personal right in the matter, as the ultimate authority in matters of law, and that this was an occasion when she was bound to execute the dictates of her own conscience, irrespective of any constitutional advisers whatever"; which, if with Dr. Selwyn we admit Convocation to be one of her constitutional advisers, we believe and trust that Her Majesty will do. Archdeacon Denison, it is true, grounded his addition to the Address on the principle that the disestablishment of the Irish Church could not be effected "without repudiation of the necessity and value of the Reformation." But the value of this concession to popular feeling or prejudice—which, in fact, is, in this form, only a decorous way of shouting "No Popery"—is very much impaired when we find the same speaker in this very curious debate adopting the monstrous historical figment that in the sixteenth century "the nation solemnly adopted the Reformed Church as expressing the pure truth of God, as distinct from all aberrations on the one hand in the direction of Puritanism, and on the other in the direction of the inventions and corruptions of the Church of Rome."

We should much like to see this solemn rejection of Puritanism before it existed voted by the nation, and this authoritative protest on the part of the nation against Roman, or any other, corruption. We have heard of a Comic History of England, but the most comical chapter in it is not so comical as this popular and archidiaconal view of the Reformation as an act solemn, complete, single, accessible, definite, and well-considered. The Reformation never existed as a single act, nor can time or place or occasion be assigned to this solemn determination on the part of either Church or State to do anything more definite than from time to time to accept—sometimes with, but much oftener without, any formalities or legalities—the hesitating and fluctuating and inconsistent policy of Tudor sovereigns and statesmen.

It is sufficiently disheartening to find amongst a body of educated and influential men the prevalence of such dangerous fallacies as these views announced in the Jerusalem Chamber of the binding force, as well as of the meaning, of the Coronation Oath, and of the constitutional right or duty of the Sovereign to refuse the royal assent to the decisions of Parliament. In the face of such mischievous absurdities we can afford to smile at the puerile, if popular, view of the Reformation announced by Archdeacon Denison, which may perhaps be attributed, as the theatrical reporters say, to the novelty of his first appearance in the new character of a champion of the sixteenth-century worthies. But perhaps it is as well for the Church to have had it all out. The worst that can come of Tuesday's outbreak is the unseemly collision between the two Houses of Convocation, which has occurred, and probably was intended; and it is quite certain that the Bishops cannot give way. The best of it is, that the clergy generally will have opportunities of seeing what the convictions which, conscientiously, as we believe, they entertain come to when brought into the field of action; and, above all, in perusing the report of this debate they will have the opportunity of pondering over the wise and sagacious advice of such men as Archdeacon Grant, Canon Blakesley, and the Dean of Ely, who, while declared enemies of disestablishment, have not taken leave either of common sense or common prudence.

HALFPENNY CONSERVATISM.

THE heroic and invigorating spectacle of good men battling against insuperable odds has this week been exhibited in Scotland. It might indeed have been on view six weeks earlier, for the "Second Annual Meeting of the Scottish National Constitutional Association" was held as far back as the 6th of January. But Scottish Conservatives are modest as well as brave. They shun the glaring publicity so dear to a vulgar democracy, and the report of the proceedings has only just ventured forth from the congenial shade of a committee-room. Now that it has come, it has an undoubted claim on our notice. The speeches it records are honourably distinguished among similar productions by the frankness with which they recognise facts, and the unanimity with which they suggest a remedy. There is no attempt to disguise the low estate of Conservatism in Scotland; it is admitted to be in a very bad way indeed. "We in this country," said the chairman, Lord Dalkeith, "are in the unfortunate position of having been beaten almost everywhere. We have been thoroughly beaten this time, and it is almost human nature to feel a little downcast after such a defeat." But the heir of bold Buccleugh could rise above human nature; nay, he did not despair of making his audience rise with him. The advice which he gave to the meeting showed how firmly this noble confidence held possession of his soul. He calls upon the Conservatives of Scotland "to organize," but it is no prospect of mere tangible success that he holds out as the motive for their doing so. They are to organize merely to show their courage. Indeed, with Scotland in its present terrible state, it would be of little use to organize for any other reason. The Scottish people, as described by one of the speakers, "are wholly given up to Radicalism and Dissenterism." The Electors have a prejudice against Mr. Disraeli which is "more than can be naturally accounted for by the merits or demerits of the subject." A certain amount of prejudice against him Lord Dalkeith seems to think reasonable. It is, we presume, "accounted for by the demerits of the subject." But the prejudice which exists is out of all proportion to the occasion. The Scottish Conservatives are consequently to organize simply as a sort of moral gymnastic. Their associations are to hold in civil life the place which that fine Conservative force, the Yeomanry Cavalry, holds in military life. If the latter were ever wanted for real service, the first thing it would have to do would be to forget the notions of drill and discipline it has contracted during the periods when it has been called out for practice; and, in like manner, whenever Conservatism means business, its trumpets will sound a very different note from that which is now popular at "constitutional" meetings. Till then, both modes of employing time are harmless, and the latter has the advantage of not forming an item in the Estimates.

It is fair to say, however, that all the speakers at the meeting concurred in one practical recommendation. The political disease of the country must be treated homœopathically; the only cure that can be trusted to work on a Scottish elector is a hair of the dog that bit him. It is a newspaper that has made him a Radical; it is only a newspaper that can make him a Conservative. The secret, it seems, of the deplorable errors which pervade all parts of Scotland is that everybody reads the Scotsman. It is to be found "in every house, at every railway station, in every village." "People have unfortunately got accustomed to taking in the Scotsman." Lord Garlies, from whom we borrow this last wail, attributes the habit to the "general appetite for virulence and abuse"; but, whatever may have been its origin, there is no doubt that it has been thoroughly formed. The problem of the hour, therefore, is how to supersede the Scotsman. Unfortunately, to state the problem and to solve it are by no means the same thing. To begin with, there is a difficulty in the fact that Conservatism has already a representative in the Scottish press. What are the precise shortcomings of this journal does not appear, but we gather from the speeches at the meeting that it is not considered to be quite up to the mark. Of course this was not admitted by any one; on the contrary, every reference to it was couched in highly complimentary terms. It is "able and well conducted," says Lord Dalkeith. "We have been very much indebted to it," says Lord Garlies. But somehow these praises all end with the suggestion that a new Conservative paper had better be started without loss of time. There is an attempt, indeed, to take the sting out of this conclusion by laying great stress on the necessity for a weekly paper. Obviously, however, this is a very transparent expedient. It is the weekly issue of the daily Scotsman that has done all the mischief, and we presume that it would not be difficult to arrange for a weekly issue of the daily Courant if hebdomadal publication were the only element wanting to success. Even Lord Garlies, however, who constituted himself the especial advocate of the existing organ, thinks that it would be well to supplement it by a new weekly paper. He considers that if the Conservatives of Scotland "could start a really good organ not confining it to politics alone, but containing general news, and giving opinions on all subjects," they might do great good to the constitutional cause. To contain general news, and to give opinions on all subjects, are apparently such uncommon features in newspapers, that the mere fact that a new journal exhibited them would be sufficient to ensure its triumph. Perhaps, if Lord Garlies would extend his reading, he would find that the idea has been anticipated.

Sir Thomas Gladstone took a different view of the situation. He founded his hopes on the known preference of his countrymen for "spending a halfpenny instead of a penny." In his opinion, the only way to banish Radicalism from Scotland is to undersell it. The road to success lies in lowering the price of the Conservative journal "below that of the ordinary newspaper." The Scotsman exacts a penny from every purchaser. The Conservative organ that would supplant it must offer itself for a halfpenny.) One obvious merit possessed by this scheme was pointed out by a subsequent speaker. The political depravity of the Scottish constituencies may be such that they will rather pay their penny for a paper they like than their halfpenny for a paper they do not like. But if the outlay even of the halfpenny can be spared, then they may be led to see a new beauty in the principles they at present reject. The last hope of Conservatism lies in a gratuitous circulation, and as this is a costly process, there is more chance of its being carried out on the necessary scale if two papers can be bought for distribution at what is now the price of one. Sir Graham Montgomery told a touching story of an elector—living too, "in a not very out-of-the-way part of the world"—who wrote to him the other day to say that, as he never saw a Conservative paper, it would be a great kindness to send him one. Evidently this man goes with the multitude and buys his weekly Scotsman, but he also feels that if he can screw a second paper out of his representative, it will be so much clear gain. In this way we dare say a good many copies of the proposed halfpennyworth may be got rid of. A frugal race may be trusted not to refuse so much paper and print when it is offered in this generous spirit.

One not unimportant consideration the meeting seems hardly to have taken proper account of. It is a pity there was nobody to remind them of the proverbial contrast between the ease with which a horse is brought to the water and the difficulty with which he is made to drink. Perhaps the idea did cross the mind of Dr. Andrew Wood. At all events, he warned his hearers that "it is utterly impossible to cram Conservative principles down the throats of Radicals." Conservative papers may be distributed by hundreds of thousands—that is only a matter of money—but will that ensure Conservative articles being read? Dr. Wood evidently has his doubts. Advertising agents—who, as a class, may be trusted to know their own business pretty well—have a theory, we believe, that it is practically useless to advertise in journals for which there is no genuine demand, inasmuch as the people to whom they are sent rarely take the trouble to untie them. Even if this amount of labour should be incurred, it may be surmised that the principles which cost the recipient so much hard cash will be dearer to him than those which the postman brings him for nothing. Men value that most for which they have made most sacrifices. When the members of the Association have thrown away a sufficient number of halfpence, it will perhaps occur to them that no organ, however able or however cheap, could have averted their recent defeat. They need look no further than the speech of Lord Garlies for an explanation of its real meaning. "Of all the unfortunate questions," he said, "that could have cropped up, none could have been more so for the Conservative party than that of the Irish Church Establishment." As regards the Conservative party in Scotland, this is no doubt strictly true. The annual report of this Association speaks of its own indefatigable labours "to strengthen the attachment to the National Church, and to prevent the disestablishment of the Church in Ireland." But what identity is there in Scotland between these two objects? The National Church is pledged by its doctrines and history to regard Prelacy and Popery with a common abhorrence. The two are but different forms of the same enemy. The prelatical form may be much the more innocent of the two, but to ask the Presbyterian peasant to exert himself to keep it established is to ask him to choose the lesser of two evils, when he is as yet entirely unconvinced that there is any need for him to choose either. The multitude has none of that zeal for the principle of establishments which glows in the breasts of a few educated Erastians. It may struggle to keep its own Church established, and so far it may be, as in England at this moment, an appreciable element in the calculation. But it will never struggle to keep a Church which it dislikes established, merely for the love of an abstract theory. Supposing Presbyterianism, instead of Anglicanism, had been the established religion of Ireland, the present policy of the Government would evoke but a languid resistance among those Conservative Churchmen who are now so ready to see the Crown itself jeopardized rather than an acre of ecclesiastical property diverted to national uses. It will take a good many numbers of the halfpenny print in which Scottish Conservatism proposes to embark its fortunes to make Scotchmen more zealous in defence of Episcopacy than Englishmen would be in defence of Presbyterianism.

PROFESSORS AND TUTORS.

THE enthusiastic admirers of the new Oxford Statute about unattached students anticipate, as its ultimate result, something little short of an academic revolution. We have already explained why we distrust the accuracy of their calculations. The relief to men of narrow incomes will not be nearly so great as is commonly assumed, though the University has now reduced its pecuniary demands to the lowest possible standard. The late prolongation of the educational course, during which money is being spent instead of being made, will still keep away from the University poor students who are not going to take orders. And the relief, such as it is, will be purchased at the cost of those social advantages which many regard as the main inducement for going there. Travelling expenses, again, will necessarily be a serious item to those who live at a distance from Oxford; and they cannot cut the knot of the difficulty, as was very commonly done in the middle ages, by staying up all the year round. Nor is this all. The difference between Oxford and Cambridge, and the foreign Universities, which has led the latter to designate them somewhat contemptuously as hauts lycées, are too many, and too deeply rooted in national peculiarities and traditions, to be obliterated, or even seriously affected, by a relaxation of the rule of college residence. Our Universities, like our Public Schools and other kindred institutions, have become what they are through the slow growth of centuries, and the concurrent operation of various influential elements of English life and thought, which it would take us too long to examine or even to enumerate in detail here, and they can as little be transmuted into something else by a stroke of the pen as they could be reproduced to order on an alien soil. In the crisis of a great political cataclysm like the first French Revolution it may be possible to break altogether with the past, and start fresh with a paper Constitution based on the most abstract conception of the rights of man. But ordinarily it is not possible to re-mould a long-established institution on ideal principles, however admirable, and it is least of all possible in England. Historical institutions have a spirit and continuous life of their own, which is not indeed impervious to change—for change is a condition of all healthy life—but which will assert its substantial identity under all successive modifications of form. To import some hundreds of unattached undergraduates into the University—supposing, for argument's sake, that the expected hundreds come—will no more make Oxford into a second Heidelberg or Glasgow than the artistic energies of Louis I. of Bavaria could make Munich into a second Athens. And it seems very unlikely that a large number will come. Still it would be rash to hazard any confident prediction as to how many may avail themselves of the new opening offered them. And the presence of even a small minority of matriculated students who are not members of a college cannot fail, in the long run, to exercise some influence on the intellectual life of the place. It is worth inquiring what kind of influence this is likely to be, and how far it will tend to remedy or to intensify the admitted faults of the existing system. We have on a former occasion expressed our belief that it will act, to some extent, in both directions.

There are, broadly speaking, two theories of the proper function of a university, which may be distinguished as the English and the German, though it must not be imagined that either view is maintained or acted upon to the entire exclusion of the other. And the name universitas is variously explained by the advocates of the rival theories as referring to the universality of the studies to be prosecuted or of the students to be taught. According to the former—or, as many Englishmen would be disposed to call it, the practical—view of the matter, universities are schools of the higher education, and their main, if not their sole, object is to train youths during the interval between leaving school and entering on the duties of active life. Their duty towards knowledge, of whatever kind, is not to extend but to diffuse it. We are not to look to them for fresh advances in scientific discovery, but for imparting to their alumni its ascertained results. Tested by this criterion, it may be admitted that Oxford and Cambridge have on the whole discharged their duty fairly in the education of the upper classes of English society, who will certainly bear comparison with the corresponding classes of any other European country in general cultivation and attainments. On the other hand, few standard works in any branch of literature have emanated of late from either University. Logic and history have long been specialities at Oxford, but Grote and Mill are not University men, though their works are text-books in the schools. A university seems the natural home for metaphysical speculation, and perhaps Dean Mansel's name may be pleaded in evidence of it; but then it must be remembered how much he is indebted to Sir William Hamilton, who did not write on the banks of the Isis or the Cam. Even in theology, which is far the most richly endowed of all the special Faculties both at Oxford and Cambridge, and which has alone among them retained any active life, owing to the close connexion between the Universities and the Church, there is very little to show. It is not long since the Regius Professor of Divinity at Oxford contented himself with delivering every term the same twelve lectures, and a similar practice still prevails at Cambridge. It is true that the great religious movement of thirty years ago originated at Oxford; but though in the University, it was not of it. Dr. Newman held no academical office, though the possession of a fellowship gave him leisure for theological studies which many others equally enjoyed but did not care to use. If, from the English, we turn to the foreign idea of a university, we find it is exactly the reverse. The German Professor quoted by Dr. Pattison, who said that a professorial chair would be a very pleasant position if it were not for the interruption of having to deliver lectures, rather emphasized the idea than caricatured it. According to this view the main function of a university is to prosecute scientific research; and professorships are founded, primarily at least, with the object, sometimes theoretically ascribed to canonries, of providing capable men with learned leisure for the task. And, as a matter of fact, all the principal German works in scholarship, history, science, and theology for the last half century have emanated from the Universities. That they have been equally successful in discharging the (as they regard it) subordinate function of teaching, we do not believe; and candid writers among themselves, like Dr. Döllinger, while considering universities almost a creation of Germany, do not hesitate to acknowledge that in this matter they have something to learn from us. He especially expresses his regret that the collegiate system, which survives at Oxford and Cambridge, has been lost in Germany. Considered, however, as corporations devoted to scientific investigation and literary activity, the German Universities have undoubtedly attained a splendid success. Whether, considering the marked distinctions of national character, it would be possible to get the same results out of our own Universities, and whether, if it were possible, the benefit would not be too dearly purchased, are questions too wide to be more than glanced at here. But we may say at once, what no reasonable man will be disposed to deny, that one object of endowed Faculties is to promote the study, as well as the teaching, of the special science to which they belong, and that this aspect of the professoriate has, with some rare and honourable exceptions, which will occur at once to every one, been all but wholly lost sight of at our two great Universities. Professors have not generally been required to reside, except when required to teach, and, before the reform of 1851, few besides the theological professors at Oxford delivered any lectures. Dr. Gaisford, almost the only English scholar of his day who had a European reputation, never lectured at all. The real work of the place was done by the college tutors, and is mainly done by them still; and if they discharge their educational duties with average conscientiousness—we need not say that many of them do a great deal more—they can have little time left for independent study. In one way the result of the University Commission has been to make matters worse in this respect. The abolition of the clerical restrictions on some two-thirds of the fellowships has at once made the circulation much more rapid and multiplied non-residents. Scarcely any fellow who is not actively engaged in college work stays up after his year of probation, and even lay tutors having no livings to wait for are naturally unwilling to let the best years of life slip by before commencing the duties of their profession elsewhere.

It becomes, then, a question of some interest whether the introduction of a new element into academic life, in the shape of unattached students, will have any tendency to remedy this defect. Those who are most sanguine in maintaining the affirmative insist on the fact that it will undermine the tutorial system, and thus give a fresh impulse to the professoriate, which will have to be largely extended. But this is very far from being certain. There has for some years past been a sort of inter-communion established between several of the leading colleges at Oxford, so that undergraduates at one can attend tutorial lectures at another; and it would not be difficult to extend this system so as to include unattached undergraduates, if indeed it has not been already done. Every student in lodgings is obliged by the new statute to choose some Master of Arts as a tutor, whose business it would be to make some such provision for his instruction. Moreover, unless these students appear in much greater numbers than there seems any reason to anticipate, it is obvious that no important change in the existing system will be produced by their presence. But, if we admit the extremest hypothesis of writers like Mr. Bonamy Price, and assume that the tutorial will become merged in the professorial system, does it at all follow that this would promote the end in question? If the work of education is to be effectually carried on at all, it must consist of something more than simply delivering lectures to a silent auditory, whose bodily attendance alone is secured, and who may listen or lounge as they please; in other words, if tutors eo nomine were superseded, the new professors would have to discharge tutorial functions. Certainly they would not have to lecture de omni scibili, but would be confined to their own special subject; but this division of labour has been to a great extent carried out in several colleges already, and still it does not leave the tutor much leisure for private study. Professor Jowett is known to be one of the few college tutors who, without neglecting their educational duties, are also engaged in serious literary work; and there was a story current in Balliol not long ago, of his appointing a pupil to come to him with his composition from twelve to one o'clock at night, that being the only open hour he could command. It has indeed been suggested that a large staff of sub-professors should be appointed for the drudgery of the ordinary routine work, leaving the chiefs of each Faculty comparatively free for following their learned avocations. But it can hardly be intended that they should give no lectures at all, and we should thus come back to something very like the old system, under a new nomenclature—the head professors occupying much the same position as now, and the sub-professors stepping into the place of college tutors. Some sinecure fellowships might perhaps, as we have previously observed, be converted into sub-professorships, but that would be about the extent of the change. We do not feel sanguine, therefore, as to any appreciable influence on Oxford, as a place of study for adults and a home for scientific investigation, from such a change of tutorial into professorial lectures as has been anticipated from the matriculation of lodger students. Nor do we think they will be numerous enough to bring about such a change as the result of their appearance. At the same time, the fact of their being there at all will serve to bring into prominence the academic as distinguished from the purely collegiate idea, and this may act as a reminder that a University has other functions besides those of a college. We have, however, to set against this consideration the fact that an increase in the number of students will involve increased demands on the teaching powers of the place.

There is another point of view, however, in which it is not inconceivable that the new comers may exert a certain reflex action for good on the University, in its scientific as well as its educational capacity. Putting aside those who come simply to qualify themselves for ordination, and who, as we cannot help suspecting, will be the majority, we may fairly presume that their motives for seeking admission will be of a more distinctly intellectual nature than can be predicated of full two-thirds of those who occupy the existing colleges. And the infusion of fresh blood of this kind, even in very small proportions, cannot fail to act beneficially on the system. Every little that tends to strengthen the studious as opposed to the luxurious or purely athletic element in the University is a gain. If it helps to raise the minimum standard of pass examinations, and to shame a larger moiety than at present out of sinking below that minimum, some good will be done. But, moreover, a further effect may be produced if men of a really intellectual stamp and with a keen thirst for knowledge are brought up to the University. Professors will not like to find in their classes "a chiel taking notes" of the deficiency of their attainments in their own subject-matter, or instituting disagreeable comparisons between what he learns from their lectures and what he has learnt from men or books elsewhere. The number of active-minded men, with a genuine love for learning, who will devote their lives to scientific study and investigation purely for its own sake, is much smaller than most theorists are willing to believe. The law of demand and supply holds good here quite as much as anywhere else. Men do not, as a rule, spend years in investigating the deeper problems of theology, or metaphysics, or mathematics, from abstract devotion to the subject, any more than, they enter on the study of law or medicine, however they may be drawn to it by their own mental tastes, without the expectation of tangible results. To choose a suitable man for a chair, endow him richly, and relieve him from the pressure of active duties, will not secure his leading the life of a Newton or a Faraday. Some outward stimulus is required; and one main stimulus, both for good and for evil, in the present day, is the charm of notoriety. Few persons in public positions are so unambitious as to have no regard for fame, and fewer still are so callous as to be indifferent to the reproach of feebleness or mediocrity. The productive energy of Oxford and Cambridge professors will not rise to the standard of their German brethren until unproductiveness is felt to be a discredit. If the introduction of a new class of students to our ancient seats of learning should contribute towards the general recognition of such an estimate of professorial obligations, they will be entitled to the gratitude both of the University and the country.

METROPOLITAN RATING.

THE Poor-law furnishes an eminent example of our national genius for muddling. The complications of other portions of our law are ascribed, more or less reasonably, to its antiquity; but no part of the Poor-law is older than the time of Queen Elizabeth, and by far the greater part of it belongs to the last and present centuries. The existing confusion prevails alike in the department of fact and in that of words, and Parliament has failed equally in forming a distinct purpose and in expressing it intelligibly.

The President of the Poor-Law Board has undertaken to reduce to order that region of chaos in which rates are levied upon the inhabitants of the metropolis. A measure was prepared and carried two years ago, by Mr. Gathorne Hardy, for placing certain charges which had hitherto been borne by individual parishes, or unions, upon a common fund. Mr. Hardy showed convincingly the expediency of this arrangement, to which, indeed, there can be no possible objection except this, that means do not exist for raising a common fund equitably. If we consider how a rate is to be imposed, we shall find ourselves called upon to settle, first, what kinds of property shall be rated, and secondly, what values shall be placed upon them. So long as each parish managed its own affairs and bore its own burdens, both these questions might be answered in almost any manner that could be suggested by accident or caprice. To the first question, however, the same answer was pretty generally given in all parishes; but to the second question the variety of answers was inexhaustible. Taking, for example, the commonest description of rateable property—namely, a house—you might argue without end as to the principle upon which its rateable value was to be ascertained. The lower you fixed the value, the higher you must make the rate; but while the parish continued independent of all other parishes it mattered not, speaking generally, whether you fixed the value of its houses low or high, provided you fixed the value of all of them upon the same principle. But as soon as it is arranged that two or more parishes shall contribute to a common fund, it becomes necessary that they should agree as to the principle of imposing the rates by which this fund is to be raised. Now in the metropolis this has not been done, and we are told that it would take five years to do it. In order to arrive at the rateable value of a house, you must determine what you will take as its gross annual value, and what deductions you will allow from that value. Mr. Goschen states that in the metropolis at present not only is there the greatest variety with regard to the deductions allowed, but also with regard to the manner in which the "gross estimated rental" is arrived at. One parish or union may complain against another, and even within a parish one class of occupiers may complain that its rental is estimated too highly as compared with others. We will not, however, at present concern ourselves with controversies which arise within particular parishes, but will keep to the consideration of Mr. Goschen's proposal for adjusting among the parishes and unions the burden of the common fund. We shall probably not be wrong in assuming that in future years the charges to be imposed upon this fund are likely to increase, and it is therefore highly important to provide that the burden of contributing to it should, if possible, be equitably adjusted. To make this adjustment completely and satisfactorily it would be necessary to take a fresh valuation of all the rateable property in the metropolis, and this would occupy five years, and would cost a sum of money which we are not told, but can perhaps imagine. The amount of the charges on the common fund compared with the total charge for the metropolitan poor is at present so small that it could not be worth while to undertake the troublesome and costly process of a fresh valuation in order to adjust this burden. But if the process were undertaken and completed, the tendency to place fresh charges on this common fund, of which the burden had been thus carefully adjusted, would be irresistible; and thus considerable progress would be made towards the result which is aimed at by those who demand equalization of poor-rates. Mr. Goschen's Bill, however, only provides that the adjustment shall be made roughly and imperfectly; and, indeed, it would hardly be unfair to say that he imposes on his own Board a duty which resembles that of making bricks without straw. It is unnecessary to remind householders in the metropolis that they pay other rates besides poor-rates. All these rates, however, are levied upon the basis either of the poor-rate or of the county-rate. There are, therefore, these two bases, and only these, available for the adjustment of the burden of the common fund, and it appears from Mr. Goschen's statement that one of them would be as unsatisfactory as the other. But when the Central Assessment Board which is to be constituted under this Bill proceeds to perform its duties, it must either adhere to the poor-rate valuation, which is employed at present, or adopt the county-rate valuation, or proceed by some arbitrary method which will hardly content those who suffer by its application. In the parish of Poplar the amount of the existing valuation for poor-rate is 417,000*l.*, while for county-rate it is 344,000*l.* That parish, therefore, either pays too much towards the common fund for poor relief, or it pays too little towards the expenses of the Metropolitan Board of Works, which are levied upon the basis of the county-rate. We can hardly suppose that the Assessment Board for a Poor-law purpose would resort to the basis of the county-rate; and if it did, the difficulty of its task would hardly be diminished, because the metropolis extends into four counties—namely, Middlesex, Kent, Surrey, and the City of London; and in these different jurisdictions the county-rate is made by different bodies, and on different principles.

In each of the Metropolitan Unions there is now an Assessment Committee. It is proposed that a similar committee should be established in each of the parishes not comprised in any union. Representatives from all these committees will constitute the Central Assessment Board, and this Board will fix the amount of the valuation upon which each parish and union is to be assessed to the common fund. Every parish and union will have a right of appeal against the assessment made upon every other parish and union, and a paid assessor of the Board is to be appointed to decide these appeals. How he will decide them heaven knows. We will suppose the probable case of an appeal by an East-end parish against the assessment of St. George's, Hanover Square. In East-end parishes it has been found necessary to screw up the valuations in order to obtain the largest possible produce from the rates. In West-end parishes there has been no occasion to raise the valuations, and some supposed advantage in keeping them down. It may probably be true that the valuation of St. George's, Hanover Square, is low compared with the valuations of East-end parishes, and that for the equitable imposition of a rate to meet the charges on the common fund the valuation of St. George's, Hanover Square, ought to be raised. Anybody might say as much as this, but the paid assessor will have to say by how much the valuation of St. George's ought to be raised. It may be that, for the purpose of comparison between, we will say, Poplar and St. George's, Hanover Square, the county-rate would afford a guide, because we may suppose that the same principle of valuing property was followed throughout the county of Middlesex, whatever that principle may have been. But, if we attempt to compare Lambeth with St. George's, the county-rate fails us as a guide, because we have no reason to suppose that the same principle of valuation was followed in Surrey as in Middlesex, and indeed Mr. Goschen tells us that the principle was different. It seems to us, therefore, that the proceedings of this Central Assessment Board under its paid assessor will be left very much to the good pleasure of the gods; but we are far from meaning to urge the probable imperfection of the Board's work as a reason why it should not work at all. The paid assessor will decide that the total valuation of a particular parish or union must be raised by a certain sum. It will then be the duty of the Assessment Committee of that parish or union to raise proportionally the valuations of all the properties comprised in it. We do not know whether those which we will call individual valuations, having been thus raised for the purpose of assessing the rate for the common fund, will be kept at the higher figure for the purpose of assessing ordinary poor-rate; but we should suppose they would be, for otherwise we might have a house bearing one value for the ordinary poor-rate, another for the rate for the common fund, a third for the county-rate, and perhaps a fourth for the house duty. Mr. Goschen seems to suppose that the individual, or as he calls them, tenement valuations, will become the basis of rating for all purposes, and he forgets that these valuations, for which he is thus disposed to claim authority, will only have been arrived at by a process for which we shall take the liberty to coin the word "backwardation."

The Central Assessment Board determines, we will say, that the total valuation of a particular parish shall be raised in the proportion of three to two. Hereupon it will be the duty of the Assessment Committee of this parish to raise in the same proportion every individual or tenement valuation in the parish. If the Committee must do this as a matter of course, it is idle to inquire upon what principle they do it; and, therefore, that part of Mr. Goschen's Bill which lays down a principle for individual valuation appears to be inapplicable to his present purpose. The Bill contains a schedule of deductions which may be allowed from the gross estimated rental of a tenement in order to arrive at its rateable value. If a new valuation of all the rateable property of the metropolis is to be made, this schedule of deductions will be most important; but Mr. Goschen says that a new valuation is not to be made, because it will take a long time to make, and cost a great deal of money. It is odd that Mr. Goschen should expect a valuation arrived at in the happy-go-lucky sort of way which he proposes to supersede the county-rate valuation for the purposes to which that valuation is now applicable. However, we entirely agree with Mr. Goschen that there ought to be one uniform valuation for all purposes of rating, and if we remark that his Bill does not promise this result, he may answer that this was not its primary intention. He undertook to make a more equitable adjustment of the burden of the common fund, and in this he has succeeded.

OUR PROSPECTS FOR GOOD FRIDAY.

WE are promised a revival of what some people may consider the principle of Good Friday. The Reform League intends that here in London we shall spend it as a day of most unquestionable humiliation, in every sense of the word. Just as from the Vatican, or other centres of ecclesiastical authority, emanates an authorized pastoral as to the proper observance of a day of fasting, so from the Nag's Head, Leather Lane, it has been—so the announcement runs—"definitely settled that the demonstration in honour of the late Ernest Jones should take place in Trafalgar Square on Good Friday, at five o'clock." A sketch of the details of the demonstration has been put out. It is at once cosmopolitan and authoritative, and has a certain æsthetic and almost religious propriety. The taste for pomp and ceremony has penetrated Leather Lane, derived perhaps from St. Alban's Church, which is, we believe, close by the Nag's Head. "Processions headed by bands of music," and tailed, we fear, by all the scum and ruffianry of London, "are to start from different parts of London and march to Trafalgar Square. The International Branch, the Labour Branch, and a Greek Branch would attend with banners, and a band of the members of the International Branch would sing in chorus in the procession." At present the sacred hymns to be sung have not been announced. The mention of a Greek Branch might suggest that the celebrated scholium reciting the heroic deeds of Harmodius and Aristogeiton would be revived for the occasion. The precedent of the obsequies of the Manchester murderers—we mean martyrs—celebrated by Mr. Finlan in Hyde Park, might give promise of a solemn dirge and sacred requiem for the repose of poor Mr. Ernest Jones' soul, were it not that the vocal powers of a London mob are more likely to subside into "Not for Joseph," or the roaring chorus, whatever it may be, which at the moment happens to be popular in Whitechapel and Wapping. But, whatever the details of the rites, there can be no mistake about the general effect which the demonstration ordered by the Reform League contemplates. The Congregation of Public Rites, or the Provisional Government—for it is well to speak of them in either capacity, and recognise at once both their political and ecclesiastical authority—have decided that the capital city of the British Empire is to celebrate Good Friday next as they shall direct. They intend to occupy in force the very centre and heart of our civilization—Trafalgar Square. They propose, as far as in them lies, to make, on the most sacred hours of the Christian year, the main streets of London hideous with a grimy tag-rag and bobtail composed of most of the fools and all the rogues who on that particular day choose to find nothing else to do than run the chance of assisting in a general disturbance. The dictators of the Nag's Head are prepared to insult all right feeling by a wretched caricature of a religious observance, and to stun us with brass bands and brutal chorusses. All this on Good Friday; and, as though to provide every certainty of general annoyance, and possibly of public danger, they have fixed upon the hour of five o'clock—which of course will be six, that is, the fading twilight of early spring—on the 26th of March, for their demonstration.

And what is that they are going to demonstrate? In a stupid sort of way, there was some kind of meaning in the Beales and Potter demonstrations; and even in the contemptible failure of the Funeral March in honour of the Manchester murderers there was at least a venomous and mischievous sympathy with actual miscreants. But poor Mr. Ernest Jones—what had he ever done that his memory, or the feelings of his family, should be outraged by this silly, though mischievous, violation of all decency? Mr. Jones was a fanatic, but not altogether of the vulgar sort. Born and bred a gentleman, he could have no sympathy with Finlan and Lucraft, the president of the Leather Lane Leaguers. If Mr. Jones ever consented to a mob-meeting in Trafalgar Square, it was for objects very different from this. But to say all this is rather to waste words. Time, place, and purpose—matter and manner—all are so contemptible that there is not the least likelihood that the demonstration will take place. As on a previous occasion, the police will, it may be presumed, not suffer a crowd to collect or a procession to be formed; and were it to be arranged, as in the case of the mock obsequies of the Manchester murderers, a few hundreds of dirty boys and fanatics would be all that would really feel any interest in the avowed object of the procession.

It is perhaps as well that the attempted revival of these London processions should take a form which, while it provokes the disgust of all decent people, at the same time can only be met with ridicule and contempt, and perhaps indignation, from the better sections of the League itself. Mr. Beales will be wanting in that sort of dignity which he has more than once affected, or perhaps really felt, if he does not denounce the wicked folly contemplated by his tail. But something remains to be said. That such a puerile display should even be announced shows that there is something wrong. A day or two ago a numerous deputation of Strand tradesmen groaned in dismal strains of lamentation before Colonel Henderson. Since the conventional wailing of the chorus at the end of a Greek tragedy, we do not remember anything so monotonously and tediously mournful as the sorrows of the Strand. The trade of the Strand had collapsed; the Strand by day was occupied in force by hordes of newsboys plying their vocations of dispensing halfpenny newspapers and tossing for the receipts, and by sturdy troops of more adult gamesters watching the odds at the windows of the Sporting Press. If we are to believe these much-suffering shopkeepers, the Strand is all day long rendered hideous by gaming, and all night by prostitution. But, says Colonel Henderson, what am I to do? A nuisance may be annoying, as the etymology seems to suggest, but quite legal. The street trade in newspapers is especially protected by Act of Parliament; the street trade in harlotry is, if not especially protected by statute, condoned by the great principle of the liberty of the subject. As to placards and walking advertisements and handbills, they are not to be prohibited unless immoral; and the Anatomical Museums and the Revelations of a Nunnery are not pronounced, by the police, to be immodest or offensive to decency. Shouting is not illegal; begging is very hard to prove; a crowd causing an obstruction is difficult to define; magistrates differ; the courts of Police and Sessions, as in the instance of the night-houses near the Haymarket, are in direct conflict. Altogether Colonel Henderson says but little to assuage the woes of the melancholy men of the Strand.

They rejoin that the state of things from which they suffer is a disgrace to civilization and to the first street of the first capital in Europe. Well; we have heard all this before, and all the capitals in Europe seem to suffer under what is always their special and particular disgrace. But to say this is not quite equivalent to doing nothing. At the present moment we are doing something. Every day we confiscate—so the police reports tell—at least a dozen of "indecent valentines," sold chiefly in the suburbs. As we never happened to see an indecent valentine, we cannot perhaps appreciate the full importance of the present activity of the police, or the extent of the social evil which they are so vigorously and rigorously suppressing. Judging from the trifling nuisances which they do not deal with, we can quite understand the extent of the moral evil with which they are so successfully contending. Seeing that Holywell Street is the Holywell Street which it has always been—a trifle not worth mentioning—the indecent valentines at Mile End and the Hackney Road must be very bad indeed. But whether the particular nuisance against which authority is at the moment displaying its and the law's terrors is or is not so very abominable is less important than the fact that where there is a will in these matters there is a way. Apply this to such an incident as the threatened Ernest Jones demonstration. If indecent valentines are a public nuisance, à fortiori—nay, à fortissimo—is this demonstration from the Nag's Head. If the little scamps tossing for coppers in the Strand are a disgrace to our civilization, what force of language is left for us to condemn this grotesque Good Friday indecency? If public morals are injured, and private interests ruined, by the present state of the Strand, what about the projected and intended, planned and concerted, raid of ruffianism on all London next Good Friday? Mr. Bruce and Colonel Henderson have a great future before them—will they use their opportunities? We shall see; and this Good Friday affair may perhaps test them. We have all of us had enough of these street demonstrations in London. Even under Beales and Potter they became contemptible; but the fact that a thing is contemptible is no reason why it should exist. The immoral valentines may be thought to be contemptible; but the law in this case disregards the motto Aquila non captat muscas. And we have no objection to the eagle catching flies, so that he slaughters superior vermin also. By all means burn the valentines, but at the same time let decent folk have Good Friday to themselves, at least in peace and quietness, if not in religious retirement and rest. The short petticoats at the ballet might reasonably be lengthened; but if we do not like the public exhibition of young women's legs on the stage we may stay at home. But the Nag's Head Leaguers will not let us be quiet. The Trafalgar Square people deprive us whenever they please only just of all our streets. As often as they like they may sweep up into one grand body all the villany and crime-producing strength of three millions of people. At present not much harm has come of these monster meetings, except the little matter of the Park railings, and that other trifle which followed from it—the knowledge imparted to the criminal classes of London, both of their own strength and their impunity. Lord Kimberley has undertaken to edify the Lords—panting for opportunities to serve their country—with the disgraceful details of the increase of London crime, and is also ready with some attempt at a remedy. Among known evils, and prominent among these causes of the increase and the enlarged audacity of London crime, we take leave to call his Lordship's attention—or, if not that, the attention of his brother peers—to the consideration how far the criminal classes are emboldened by the edifying spectacle of London, or at any rate of its chief streets and central sites, surrendered, if not to brute force, at least to the most dangerous elements of society, as often as it pleases such people as Finlan, or the patriots of the Nag's Head, Leather Lane.

TWO-YEAR-OLD RACING.

THE question of two-year-old racing, as connected with the alleged degeneration of the British thoroughbred, has been nibbled at more or less for some time past, but has never till now been formally submitted to the judgment of the highest racing tribunal. Sir Joseph Hawley, about the most successful breeder and owner of race-horses on record, sounded the alarm by giving notice of a motion to the effect that no two-year-olds shall run before the first of July; and the challenge thus thrown down has already been taken up, amongst others, by Admiral Rous, confessedly one of the first living authorities on matters connected with the Turf, and by Dr. Shorthouse, a gentleman who, not willing that his light should be hidden under a bushel, describes himself as having spent far more time in investigating questions relating to the breeding, training, and running of race-horses "than any one else, living or dead." We have said that the question of two-year-old racing must be discussed in connexion with the alleged degeneration of the race-horse, because nothing but a belief in such degeneration can justify the attempt to make so startling an alteration in the arrangements of the racing year as is contemplated. The onus probandi therefore rests on those who are dissatisfied with the existing order of things. They must prove, first, that the modern race-horse not only is unequal to maintain the form displayed by his predecessors fifty or a hundred years ago, but also has materially degenerated from that form; and, secondly, that such degeneration is owing to the system of two-year-old races. And we submit that they will have considerable difficulty in proving either of these points. Undoubtedly, Sir Joseph Hawley has individually derived considerable benefit from the practice of reserving his two-year-olds till an advanced period of the season, and he may be laudably desirous that other owners should for the future share the advantages which he has thus enjoyed; but other causes have also combined to produce his success—his great judgment and experience, for instance, as a breeder, and his prudence in not overtaxing the strength of his stallions. Nor should it be forgotten that he has himself not unfrequently deviated from the rule which he now seeks to lay down. Blue Gown was brought out as a two-year-old at an early part of the season, and did three times as much work in 1867 as either Rosicrucian or Green Sleeve. He was evidently intended to pick up what he could in the way of two-year-old prizes, while the great three-year-old triumphs were reserved for his more indulged stable companions. Yet what was the result? Rosicrucian, who only ran once in 1867 before the autumn, and Green Sleeve, who never appeared at all before October, were both useless in 1868; while Blue Gown not only won the Derby and the Ascot Cup, but kept on running throughout the year, and astonished the world by his extraordinary performance in the Cambridgeshire. Clearly two-year-old running and training caused him no harm; nor, so far as we are aware, have the labours of the last two years so overtaxed his energies as to render him unfit for renewed exertions during the present season.

But, leaving exceptional instances, which can of course be quoted on one side as on the other, let us ask whether the opponents of two-year-old racing have made out their case about the degeneration of the race-horse. They have two standing arguments—first, an immense number of horses break down and have to be put out of training at a comparatively early period of their career; secondly, there are no races now worth speaking of over the Beacon Course. Granting both these facts, they are susceptible of explanations that involve no acknowledgment of that degeneracy which is inferred from them. To take the second argument first, there are no races now over the Beacon Course, or generally over any course much exceeding two miles in length, because there is no demand for them, and consequently there is no demand for horses so bred and trained as to accomplish them. Half the pleasure of modern racing consists in seeing the race all through, from end to end, and in watching the conduct and movements of the competitors in the various stages of the contest; and there can be little satisfaction when the horses are started in an adjoining parish, and have to traverse three miles and a-half before they become distinctly visible. Our grandfathers might have enjoyed such a pastime and called it racing, just as they pottered about in a big wood from morning to night, and enjoyed that, and called it hunting; but our tastes have altered, and the instruments and aids to our pleasures have been correspondingly altered also. If a revulsion of taste should occur, and an intense longing should suddenly arise for four-mile races, we fully believe that within a few years we should be able to provide ourselves with a sufficient number of horses well able to perform the duty required of them. But to argue that because we do not want a thing, therefore we cannot get it, seems to us to be begging the question. It is true that a few long races still figure here and there in the programmes of meetings; in every institution of any age there are relics of the past. But Queen's Plates are a most utter farce. The horses walk and trot and canter just as they please for three-fourths of the distance, and there is a little show of a race just at the finish. The sooner they are abolished the better. The Alexandra Plate at Ascot we also consider a mistake. It is an attempt to force public opinion in a direction to which it is resolutely opposed; it is an attempt to make horses bred and trained for one purpose accomplish another totally different.

In regard to the number of horses that break down and are turned out of training at the end of their second or third year, we shall have more difficulty perhaps in rebutting the detractors of the modern race-horse. It is perfectly true that an immense number of horses do break down, and have to terminate their racing careers just when the promise of them is brightest. But these breakdowns are generally local, not constitutional—the results of accidents which cannot be avoided, not of weakness arising from degeneracy. Dundee broke down, but we scarcely think any one would say that he was a degenerate horse; and his son, Marksman, after being most severely injured on the leg at Tattenham Corner, only lost the Derby by a neck. It was a toss up whether Gladiateur would tumble down as he descended the Swinley hill, or whether he would win the Ascot Cup by a quarter of a mile; but the largest breeder of the day does not perceive, in the local infirmity which abridged his career of triumph, any bar to his being a successful sire. Both Dundee and Gladiateur remained what critics profess to consider a short time on the Turf; yet Gladiateur was never half trained as a two-year-old, while Dundee kept on running and winning as Mr. Merry's two-year-olds do run and win. There is obviously no panacea against accidents. Different owners have different objects, and follow different plans. Some work their horses, others spare them; the result is, not that the British race-horse is rendered more or less degenerate, but that the British owner of horses finds himself with a larger or smaller balance at his banker's. Mr. Percy Wyndham and those who agree with him appear to think that every injury inflicted on a particular horse is an injury inflicted on the breed of horses also. This is a great confusion of ideas. As to the injury suffered by two-year-olds that are unduly overworked from the beginning to the end of the season, we are quite of the same belief as Mr. Wyndham, nor do we think there is anybody who would entertain a contrary opinion; but we deny that those injuries incapacitate the sufferers from duly fulfilling their duties at the stud, or are calculated to deteriorate their progeny. "Several two-year-olds, in 1868," says Admiral Rous, "ran three times as many races as the celebrated horses in the last century performed during the whole course of their career. The natural consequence is, nine-tenths will be stumped up at five years old, but that will not affect the breed." The wonder is not that Achievement and Lady Elizabeth did not do more than they did, but that they were able to do half what they did. The curiosity is not whether "the celebrated horses in the last century" would have stood a year of such work, but whether they would have stood three months of it. The proposed legislation might very likely lighten the labours of a good many two-year-olds (though, if required, they could still be hurried through a long list of engagements from July to November), but we doubt whether it would in the slightest degree alter, for better or for worse, the character of the race-horse. By degrees, at considerable inconvenience and at considerable loss, horses might do the bulk of their work at three years instead of two; and, they would probably break down then just as they do now, only a year later. For it is not the particular year in which the work is done, but the amount of work crowded into the particular year, that tells upon a horse. What our horses are set to do, bred to do, and trained to do, we believe they do as well as their predecessors, if not better; and we are fortified in this belief by the opinion of Dr. Shorthouse, which, though somewhat dogmatically conveyed, is deserving of the highest regard. He says, "The conclusion that I have arrived at is, that the horses of the present day are immeasurably superior both in speed and bottom to their predecessors of a century or half a century ago."

The real truth is—and even careful observers sometimes draw wrong inferences from it—not that we have fewer good horses than our grandfathers, but that we have more bad ones. The number of worthless horses kept in training for a time is legion; but we do not attribute this fact to the degeneracy of the breed, but in the majority of cases to the ignorance and avarice of the breeder. Carelessness in the selection of sires and dams, and greediness in filling the pockets with heavy fees at the expense of the strength and vigour of young and promising stallions—these are the reasons why there is so much useless blood-stock in the country, and these are the causes that will, if continued, do more damage to the breed than any amount of two-year-old training and two-year-old running.

We have not noticed the remainder of Sir Joseph Hawley's motions, because they refer more to matters of detail which can be discussed at another time. Nor have we touched on two-year-old running as it affects the morality of the Turf, or raised the question, much pressed in many quarters, of the obligation laid on the Jockey Club to protect and watch over the Turf's moral interests. For we are decidedly of opinion that the Jockey Club is about as able, either by its own example or by zealous exhortation, to advance Turf or any other morality, as to revise the Book of Common Prayer, or prepare the Budget for the present year.

REVIEWS.

LONGMAN'S EDWARD III.*

(Second Notice.)

THE issue of his first war with France had left Edward a beggar, his Scotch conquests lost, his military efforts the derision of Europe. The victory of Cressy, the utter prostration of the French power at Poictiers, made him at one bound the first prince in Christendom. Chivalry sought its glory in the two great battles which did more than all else to sweep chivalry away. It found its historic representative in a King whom, with a truer instinct, his French rival termed "the wool-merchant." It is amusing to see how completely throughout his life Edward assumed the position of "the king chivalrous," a king of tourneys and adventure, of feasts and lady-loves, and how completely the facts of his reign belied the assumption. Mr. Longman sees in a dim way the contrast as it etches itself out in the character of Edward:—

The character of the times in which he lived deeply impressed itself on that of the King himself, and is strikingly manifested in the purposeless character of much of his war with France. It was the venturesomeness of war, its stirring strife and magnificent pomp, that delighted him, as it has delighted barbarians in all times. Possessed of a fine person, "having a god-like face," as an old chronicler says, he loved, like his prototype Alexander, to display himself surrounded by a gorgeous array of thousands of splendidly-attired followers at the Court of the Emperor, or of the King of France; or clad in singular but magnificent apparel, at feasts and festivities such as those which followed the establishment of the Order of the Garter. Courage he possessed in an eminent degree, combined, however, with no small amount of chivalrous rashness. . . . Of his personal character in other respects but few traces remain, and some of them are not such as to excite much admiration. Conjugal fidelity at that time was not considered a necessary virtue in sovereigns, and certainly was not practised by Edward the Third. In this matter it is but fair to judge him by the habits of the times, but his disgraceful subjection in his old age to a worthless woman was the natural sequel to a licentious life, and deeply stains the conclusion of his reign. That he was unscrupulously despotic is clear enough from the facts mentioned in the course of this history, and that he was cruel and revengeful is far from doubtful when his conduct to the burgesses of Calais is considered. . . . Manly courage and personal energy are the chief noble qualities that can be assigned to him. He had besides the questionable virtue of indomitable will. The commercial prosperity of the nation during his reign was great, and he deserves credit for laying the foundations of English manufacturing industry by his encouragement of Flemish weavers; but the progress made must be attributed to causes arising, unintentionally on his part, from the advantages of increased foreign intercourse, and from the concessions he was compelled to make to his subjects in order to obtain the means of gratifying his warlike passions and his love for inordinate splendour, rather than to a wise foresight directing the policy of his reign.

Policy Edward had none. Throughout his reign he was driven along by social forces of whose very existence he had no conception, and over whose development he exercised no control. At its opening he is the first baron of the English baronage, the chief of chivalry, the mere brilliant leader of a brilliant, worthless aristocracy. At its close he is, as Philip called him, the "wool-merchant," the king of the trader The failures of the earlier campaigns, the exhaustion of the nobility, the breakdown of chivalry as a fighting power, had consummated the great revolution which for a century past had been raising the merchant class into an element of the State. As English history is written nowadays, we suppose we must not blame Mr. Longman that, in writing the history of Edward the Third, he has left unnoticed the great cardinal fact of his reign. But the truth is, that the whole history of England during the fourteenth century is summed up in the elevation of the merchant class. Evesham was the victory of the burgher as it was the victory of the baronage—a victory, in the case of the first, over democracy and the "minor populus" of the towns. In the greater political struggles of the Barons' war the communal struggles of English towns have been, very naturally, passed over; but in each the party of De Montfort was the party of revolution, claiming for the whole people a share in the commune, freedom of government, freedom, above all, of trade. In each the "majores," the greater folk, the landed proprietor of the soke or aldermanry, the wealthy member of the merchant guild, jealous of power, greedy of gain, are for the Crown. The triumph of Edward and feudalism over democracy and De Montfort was, above all, their triumph. In London, in every town, a merciless reaction followed on the momentary revolution. The leaders of the "minor populus" were killed, pillaged, exiled. All municipal power—the very right, now first becoming important, of electing members to Parliament—was concentrated in the burgher body. The guild-system, imprisoning trade within the same narrow limits, took an immense development. Steadily through the three Edwards the merchant class seize and strangle the old communal liberties of the towns. The great Rebellion of Bristol, under Edward II., represents the last desperate struggle of English democracy against the bourgeoisie. For good as for evil the new power leaves a deeper and deeper stamp on the new national legislation. The Mortmain Act, the greater facilities afforded for investments in real property, the improvements in police and judicature, the law of debt, witness to the advance of its influence. Under Edward I. a commercial spirit begins to tell upon public policy, to draw tighter the Flemish alliance, to dictate the sack of such a rival merchant-centre as Berwick. It is amusing to see those great heroes of chivalry doing the work of blood simply to satisfy the greed of the trader. Against his will the trading class forced Edward I. into his struggle with France; the Cinque Ports declared war and waged war for themselves, bearding the King and his Council with insolent defiance; "if wrong or grievance be done them, they will go seek through the seas where they shall think to make their profit." Edward gave in to the trader as he gave in to the noble; and the trader went on to wrest from him the expulsion of the Jews. The Jew was the King's purse, the one chattel absolutely at his disposal, the one financial resource of the Crown. But commercial jealousy was too strong for such a King as Edward. The traders are the new power of their day, jostling roughly with the older powers of the State. "We will sooner go to hell than be taxed," was the famous reply of the Dunstable burgesses to the menaces of the Church; and when noble marauders plunder Boston fair they are hung, noble as they are, imploring pity of the burgesses standing round.

This gradual advance of the merchant class under the first two Edwards brought it fairly to the front under their successor. It was a new day for England when a merchant vintner could entertain the King in his house by St. Martin's, or when (we do not notice the fact in Mr. Longman's account) in a tournament at London Edward figured as its Mayor, his two eldest sons as the Sheriffs, his lords as City Aldermen. Partly no doubt this sudden revolution was owing to the great development of commerce, as we see it in the regulations of the Liber Albus, and to the new energy given to English manufactures by the emigration from Flanders. But it was still more owing to the utter collapse of feudalism. Every day made it clearer to the keen cynical trader that the great governing class, whose whole claim to govern rested on their fighting power, could not fight. Bannockburn was the first great revelation of their military incompetence; Crécy was the second. But the whole French war, its empty skirmishes, its pompous marches, its harrying and plunder, its merciless bloodshed, its utter want of purpose or aim or success, lingered on year after year as if to show the hollowness of the whole system. Charles V. only represents the universal sneer of the world in his famous instructions to the French forces not to engage with their opponents:—"Let them go. By burnings they will not come to your heritage: it will weary them, and they will all go to destruction. Although a storm or a tempest rage over a land, they go away and disperse of themselves. So will it be with these English." Such a fool's death as that of Chandos, such a massacre as that of Limoges, such an old age as that of Edward, showed the helplessness, the infamy of chivalry. But the collapse of Lancaster's expedition in 1373 was its deathblow. Never had knighthood started in a more imposing guise. The mightiest army England could pour out had simply marched across France without a blow, and without a blow it was turned by a few simple marches into such a horde as Napoleon brought back from Russia:—

> Winter was now approaching and the country they began to traverse was bleak and barren. The Limousin, Rouergue, and the Agenois did not supply them so well with food as the rich country they had left; and they were sometimes nearly a week without bread. In the sterile mountains of Auvergne they fared worse; for they could get food for neither man nor horse, and their relentless pursuers had increased from one to three thousand. Their horses died in vast numbers; more than 30,000 are said to have marched from Calais, but it was a mere fraction of that number that reached the journey's end alive; the army was utterly starving, and, as Walsingham says, it was a miserable sight to see "famous and noble soldiers, once delicate and rich in England, without their men or their horses, begging their bread from door to door, nor was there any who would give it them." At last, about Christmas, after a march of six hundred miles through France, they reached Bourdeaux a horde of miserable fugitives.

But while the ruin of the war fell on the noble, its gain and its glory were reserved for the trader. The expedition which ended in Crécy was the result of his commercial jealousy of the flourishing Norman towns. Caen surpassed every English city save London. The drapers of Louviers looked down on the infant manufactures of our southern and eastern coasts. The sack of Louviers and of Caen, the three hundred rich citizens, the four thousand bales of cloth which the victors sent home as the spoil of the latter city (why does Mr. Longman omit such a fact as this?) consoled the burghers of Norwich or of Winchelsea. The world-famous siege of Calais was really a commercial act. It was the will of the English trader which fired the chivalry of England for twelve weary months beneath its stubborn walls. Edward was the mere mouthpiece of his good subjects of London in his expression of hatred against its citizens for "the damage they had done on the sea in times past." Calais gave the English merchant the mastery of the Straits, so needful for the Flemish trade. At home he reaped the spoil of the war, while knight and baron reaped hard blows abroad. "There was no woman who had not got garments, pins, feather-beds and utensils, from the spoils of Calais and other foreign cities," while the good wives of London "began to glorify themselves in the dresses of the matrons of Celtic Gaul." Capital had indeed a yet fiercer struggle to wage at home than even feudalism abroad, and one even more destructive to the welfare of England. From the time of Edward begins, as Mr. Longman has well pointed out, the great war between employer and employed, which still rages, though not with its old intensity, in our own. It began in the greed of the capitalist. Within the towns the merchant guilds stripped grade of all freedom, and built a gigantic system of monopoly on the ruins of the communal liberties. No theory is more ridiculous than the theory which looks on guilds as the bulwarks of commerce against the violence of feudalism. The very date of their power might suffice to prove that all danger from feudalism was past. The real danger was the danger of the people, of the small employer, of the independent workman, elbowed into serfdom by the narrowing influence of capital. The whole legislation of Edward's reign is directed to the artificial building up of a wealthy merchant aristocracy, to the ruin of the free trader. The class of little retailers, the middle-men of commerce, were attacked in the statutes against forestalling and regrating; the concentration of trade within the favoured staple cities was a fatal blow at the industry of smaller towns. But it was the guild system within these towns itself which most effectually destroyed the small trader. No man throughout Norfolk might buy nets, hooks, or other fishing instruments, except "owners of ships that use the mystery of fishing." Had Mr. Longman passed from Acts of Parliament to the records of London, he might have multiplied his instances of the oppressive inner legislation of the towns. But, great as their oppression was, it was as nothing compared to the oppression exercised by employers of labour without their walls. The Statute of Labourers remains the one great legislative act in modern history by which a governing oligarchy ever ventured to reduce a whole population to slavery. In the midst of Froissart's tales of glory or war, the reader hardly pauses to notice the ravages of the Black Death; but the mark of the Black Death remains on English society to this day. In a few years one half of the population of the land had been swept away. "The sheep and cattle strayed through the fields and corn, and there was none who could drive them." Labour rose naturally in the market, and with the rise in the price of labour came the terrible Statute of Labourers. "The employers," as Mr. Longman fairly puts it, "combined to keep down wages by the terrors of legislation." A scale of wages was fixed. All aid, all charity, to those who refused it was made illegal. All secret hirings and contracts were forbidden. An oath to observe these ordinances was imposed on the whole of the labouring classes. They were imprisoned within their own county and restrained from seeking work elsewhere. By a Fugitive Slave Act, of unexampled atrocity, the whole rural population found itself reduced to prædial bondage, bound to the soil. "If any of the said servants, labourers, or artificers do flee from one county to another because of this ordinance, the sheriffs of the county where such fugitive persons shall be found, shall do them to be taken at the commandment of the justices of the counties from whence they shall flee, and shall bring them to the chief gaol of the said county, there to abide till the next sessions of the same justices." When the gaol failed, the Parliament tried branding. The escaped bondsman might be "burnt in the forehead with an iron formed and made to this letter F in token of falsity." It was to this that the rule of the triple oligarchy of the baron, the burgher, and the priest had brought England after a century of their sway. It is this which forms the terrible reverse of the history of Crécy and Poitiers. It was to escape from this that the great socialist risings under Edward's grandsons shook England to its foundation. It was the pressure of this that forced men to questions like Ball's, "When Adam delved and Eve span, who was then the gentleman?"—to Wyclif's inquiry whether a mere brute force like this was any legal power at all, whether dominion were not founded in grace, in something really worthy of the allegiance of man? Pauperism is one legacy which feudalism has left us; it was the Statute of Labourers, and not the dissolution of the monasteries, that forced on England the Act of Elizabeth. The bitter strife between employer and employed is the other. To every artisan, to every ploughman in the land, the one memorial of Edward's reign is not the thought of Crécy or the proud keep of Windsor, but something infinitely simpler and deeper—the gentle means of persuasion which the Parliament ordered to be made "in every township betwixt this and the Feast of Pentecost," the first sign of the warfare between labour and capital—the village stocks.

VESUVIUS.*

It was in the second year of the present century that the trenchant and quick-sighted Forsyth, in recording his impressions of Herculaneum, ventured to deal thus summarily with the destroyer of that entombed city:—"Vesuvius is now an exhausted subject. Its fire and smoke, its glory and terrors, are vanished for the present. Ladies, as I read in the Hermit's Album, go down to the bottom of the crater. Naturalists, on comparing its latter eruptions, have pronounced the volcano to be now in its old age." And in a similar way, above nineteen hundred years ago, when the daring Spartacus encamped his gladiators in the extinct crater of the same mountain, its volcanic forces were deemed to be exhausted, although the barren summit bore obvious marks of igneous action in ancient times. But these intervals of rest, albeit in the former case extending over a strangely long series of years, were in each instance soon succeeded by violent outbursts, and in the more recent period by an almost unceasing activity, which has been continued down to within the last few weeks.

If we wish to speculate on the springs and links of connexion of these wondrous throes of the buried Titans, no other volcano in the world offers to the inquirer so ready an opportunity of observation or so detailed a chronicle of events. The proximity of the most startling effects of natural forces to a large and luxurious city, the graceful and picturesque form of the mountain relieved by the distant Apennines, its softly outlined base gliding as it were into the blue waters of the Bay of Naples, the contrast between the luxuriant vineyards upon its flank and the chaos of steaming ruin which crowns its heights, with the unique remains of antiquity which were buried by the first great eruption recorded in history—all combine to attract to this region, not only crowds of mere sightseers, but accurate observers drafted from all the civilized nations of the earth. Among these some have been occupied simply with examination of the actual phenomena, whilst others have attempted by comparison and generalisation to reason upon the meaning of volcanic action generally, and to hazard conclusions as to the reasons of its varying intensity, and on the problematical approach to that decrease of energy which must in all likelihood some day or other reduce the Neapolitan volcano to the condition of its extinct brethren of Apulia, the Eifel, and Auvergne. Professor Phillips has after this wise been tempted to exchange the banks of Isis for the shores of the Tyrrhene Sea, to admire all that was offered to view in the early part of 1868; and thereupon—moved, we doubt not, by the farcical and inaccurate accounts supplied, for the benefit of newspaper readers, by "Own Correspondents" and by romantic school-girls—has printed the result of his studies, the first book, we believe, with the exception of Mr. Lobley's brief sketch published last year, which for 120 years past has been produced in this country on the special subject of Vesuvius.

The name of the Oxford Professor is a guarantee for a readable work, a mellifluous flow of language, and a philosophical adjustment of opposing arguments on moot points. In these respects we are not disappointed; and, if hardly complete enough for a scientific monograph, the bright little volume, with its abundant woodcuts, may be commended to the attention of those for whom the somewhat dry though excellent pages of Murray are insufficient pabulum, but to whom the voluminous foreign Vesuvian literature is unknown or unfamiliar. The earlier chapters, on the history of the district and of its eruptions, contain a well-written version of the usual narratives, but we confess to being unable satisfactorily to follow the series of events without a better map than that which faces the title-page. It is true that Professor Phillips gives us there a clear but flat representation, in colours, of the areas overspread by the lava streams of the seventeenth, eighteenth, and nineteenth centuries respectively; yet since the publication of the large-scale maps of the National Survey, and of M. Le Hon, we had hoped for such a plan of the mountain in an English dress as should enable the reader to follow out the details of the chief flows of lava at the more important crises, and to recognise all the localities, especially those mentioned in the text, which interest the investigator. Among the characteristic phenomena of eruptions, the author insists on the plentiful evidence which shows them to be commonly preceded by earthquakes, often of great frequency, and sometimes recurring at short intervals for years together. The general sinking of the water in the wells around the foot of the mountain is also one of the immediate forerunners of violent action; and the curious retirement of the sea from the shore, succeeded by its sudden return, is often observed over a moderate extent, although a doubt may be expressed as to the sufficiency of the explanation afforded for it:—

> If any one will have the courage to admit an opening made suddenly through the sea-bed, occasioned primarily by the production of fissures as already described, he may understand how this might, in a limited space of the sea-coast, occasion both the withdrawal of the water and its return. The opening may have been an old one concealed or impeded in the course of time, and merely reopened or cleared, or made to communicate with a new underground fissure.

There ought not to be omitted the opposing and exceptional fact, stated in a letter of Palmieri's in the Comptes Rendus, that when the first disturbing movements of 1861 were forcing up the rocky foundations of poor thrice-ruined Torre del Greco, the water in the wells and public fountain rose higher than usual, and new springs broke out by the sea-side. On the commencement of actual eruption enormous volumes of transparent steam are vomited forth in rapidly succeeding globose puffs, which condense in the upper air into cumulated cloud, occasionally towering up to a height of twice or even four times that of the entire mountain. In the lower part of the column may then be seen at night the fuoco of the guides, in reality the reflection of the incandescent lava below; and here the author gently breaks it to the unlearned that the smoke and flame so liberally brandished before us in popular descriptions are but creatures of misapprehension, the so-called "smoke" being either the vapour of water or the showers of detrital lava, the ashes and dust often carried up with it to a vast elevation, whilst anything like real flame is of very unusual if not doubtful occurrence, and has been noticed in a few rare instances, and on a small scale, by only two or three competent observers. We could wish that, in this descriptive part of his work, the author had dismissed some of his exceeding caution and smoothness, and had manfully tackled the views of M. Charles Deville on the successive phases of volcanic action, for they are too important to pass without a far more distinct comment. Can it be confirmed that the eruptions take place along lines of fissure tending approximately to cut through the centre of the mountain? If so—and from Ætna as well as Vesuvius strong favourable evidence may be had—it is a capital fact to assist us in tracing back the action of the pressure which gives rise to the outbreak, in settling the origin of the dykes, still disputed by a select few, and in discussing the character of upheavals. And again, how far may we trust to the definite announcement of the French chemist, supported on a series of visits extending over many years, that the various sublimed products of the craters afford a sure test and scale of the distance, either in time or place, from the acme of intensity of eruption? Before and along with the outflow of the lava rise the hot stifling vapours laden with hydrochloric and sulphurous acid, and bearing up to the light of day the chlorides of sundry metals—lead, copper, and iron—which, with common salt, form incrustations in the chinks and rents, and in the cooling surfaces of the orifice. But when past the time or the focus of chief intensity, and when the red heat is no longer visible, the chlorides diminish whilst the sulphur increases; and further away towards the base of the slopes, and even out at sea opposite Torre del Greco, as also in regions from which intense activity has long died out, emanations of carbonic acid gas and the inflammable carbonetted hydrogen are the last products which reach the surface, and tell therefore either of remoteness from the centre of excitement or of the phase of comparative inactivity.

On another point of research, open in great part to settlement by the aid of documentary evidence, Professor Phillips expresses himself with more decision. He has constructed tables showing for every century since the sixth before the commencement of our era, in parallel columns, the frequency of eruptions from Ætna, from Vesuvius, and from the Phlegræan fields, and concludes that from it we may infer a "general reciprocity of eruptions and some evidence of a common underground connexion." For ourselves, we own to remaining unconvinced by his tabular statements. The connexion can only be taken in a very secondary and modified sense, for although the whole South Italian region, from the Latian hills down through Sicily and away to Pantellaria, doubtless owes its various outbursts of volcanic force to one deep-seated source, we cannot believe in any direct communication between their fluid lavas when the great difference between their ejected products is borne in mind. Neither the newer nor the older lavas of Vesuvius and Somma, on the one hand, will be confounded by the practised observer with those of Ætna and the cliffs of the Val di Bove on the other; and this in spite of the strong family likeness which unites by one bond the mineral products of all modern volcanoes, from Hecla to the Pacific. We grant that it is very seductive to the eye of fancy to trace out that a line drawn northward from the crater of Ætna through the western parts of the old eruptive islands of Volcano and Lipari in succession will strike the cone of Vesuvius, and that another carried from the same origin through the ever fire-breathing Stromboli will land us on the great extinct crater of Mount Vultur near Melfi; but the tendency to theorize will be somewhat checked on comparison of the ejected materials, and on recollection of the paradoxical independence of the main and subsidiary cones of one and the same volcano. Thus, if we look up from Vesuvius to the far grander scale of Ætna, we find the lavas at one time ejected from vents six or seven thousand feet higher than at another; and Mauna Loa affords a still more puzzling example, pouring liquid lavas from its summit, whilst in apparent defiance of hydrostatical laws the great crater of Kilanea, only sixteen miles away, and ten thousand feet lower, remains a quietly seething lake of molten rock.

We had also expected from so experienced a geological writer a bolder grappling with the vexed question of Elevation Craters supported by Von Buch, Daubeny, and Abich, and vigorously opposed by Lyell and Poulett Scrope. No one, we suppose, gifted with common powers of observation is likely to ascribe to the main cones of eruption any other mode of origination and growth than that of successive ejections, as maintained by the last-mentioned authors; but in contemplating the inner structure of Vesuvius it appears to us that our author has ignored one of the most telling phenomena—namely, the occurrence, in the Fosso Grande and the Val di Leone, of masses of marl and limestone charged with fossil shells—Cardium, Turritella, Pecten, Ostrea, &c. —of species which still live in the adjoining sea. It is true that these calcareous rocks are met with among the so-called "ejected masses" of Somma; but it may fairly be asked, is not this term often a misnomer, and must not these fossil-bearing fragments, cropping out at so great a height above the sea level, belong to beds once forming the floor of the Mediterranean, which were gradually raised from their original position into a mound of considerable elevation, either prior to, or contemporaneously with, the first discharges of volcanic material?

The concluding "views leading to a general theory of volcanic excitement" comprise a temperate and careful vindication of the doctrine of the dependence of igneous action on a state of internal fusion and on the gradual contraction of the globe; but this chapter is altogether apart from any results of the author's late tour. It is on this latter point, in the lack of a close personal investigation of the mountain, that we find the book defective, and it may be hoped that in a future edition more vigour may be imparted by an extension of experience. We believe, too, that a Professor has yet to arrive at a due sense of the dignity of his grand subject who tells us apologetically in his preface that so stupendous a department of nature "has been honoured (sic) by the special researches of" such and such authors, "and has interested" such and such others! Nor would it be amiss to submit his proof-sheets to the eye of the Professor of Modern Languages, that the mis-spelling of such words as cipollino, Gaeta, abbate, and bocche may no longer act excruciatingly on the optic nerve of the reader.

THE STEPPING-STONE SERIES OF SCHOOL-BOOKS.*

ON more grounds than one we are glad to welcome this little book. In spite of the objections which may be urged against the form of question and answer into which it has been thrown, and although the arrangement of the matter might in some respects be improved, it is a good book in itself. So far as it goes, it will give the learner a real knowledge of his subject, while it will enable him to test the theories put forth on the growth of successive styles of architecture by facts which are plainly stated. In short, we have here a book which makes no attempt to hide ignorance under a veil of big words, or to throw dust in our eyes by repeating nonsensical axioms, or unblushingly laying down the law in the teeth of all evidence. This little work is therefore a real boon for the class of schools for which especially it has been written.

Over this class of schools there still hangs an air of mystery. So far as we can judge, the great movement for competitive examinations has not yet had any effect upon them. Our National Schools are more or less under the control of inspectors who are really educated men; and of the so-called "private schools" a certain proportion come under the influence of University local examinations, and must therefore do something more than merely drill boys to give answers which have either no meaning or else a wrong one. But the schools of which we now speak flourish apart in some charmed region, and stagnate in serene content with a literature of their own. Of these books the happier boys who are sent to Rugby or Harrow or Marlborough probably know not even the existence; but they have nevertheless the stubborn reality of facts. They furnish the food, if it deserves the name, which is to feed the minds of a far larger number of Englishmen than make up the whole body of the learned professions; and a glance at the contents of a few of them is enough to give us some notion of its utterly indigestible nature. The mere sight of these pages is a weariness to the flesh and to the spirit even of those who may take them up as curiosities with which they have no personal concern; but it is impossible that they can realize the miseries of a boy who is crammed with such stuff, if he has mind and power of thought, or the deadly lethargy into which it must plunge him if he has none. The feeling of pity for these victims of our own flesh and blood is natural; but our interest runs in the same path with our humanity. We cannot allow these schools to go on undisturbed a moment longer than is unavoidable; and, however hopeless the task may appear, we shall return from time to time to the assault, till the walls of Jericho fall down. The publication of Mr. Mitchell's Stepping-Stone to Architecture gives some ground for thinking that our labour will not in the end be fruitless. Any book which is honestly meant to impart real knowledge, and the means of attaining more, will, if introduced into a school where the books used are bad, be like the putting of a new cloth on an old garment. The rent will be made worse; and the teachers will find that either they must return to their old rags and steadily refuse to give them up, or they must dress themselves in new and sound raiment.

We are sanguine enough to look for the former of these results in the case of the series of manuals or catechisms to which the Stepping-Stone to Architecture belongs in appearance, but with which it has nothing in common beyond its wrapper. We even dare to hope that it may lead to the expulsion of certain greater offenders from a field which they have long choked with tares. How hard it is to drive them out, few know. The demand for Mr. Butter's wonderful Spelling-book, on which we disburdened our consciences some years ago, is, we believe, very little abated. Mr. Hunter's Art of Paraphrasing still teaches boys and girls the delightful art of spoiling everything they touch. Under his guidance, the farewell of Adam to Eden—

> Fit haunts of Gods, where I had hoped to spend,
> Quiet, though sad, the respite of that day
> That must be mortal to us both—

may still be transmuted in the Latinizing cauldron into an adieu to "localities worthy to be frequented by celestial beings, and amidst which I had cherished the soothing expectation of spending in quietness, though mournfully, the allowed remainder of that day in which, by divine decree, we both must die." But, wretched as it is to find boys led to fancy that they understand Cowper's line, "How fleet is a glance of the mind," better by saying, "How rapid is the transition of thought," much more serious mischief is done by a much more successful book—the Historical and Miscellaneous Questions of Richmal Mangnall. There can be little doubt that the whole plan of this book is wrong from beginning to end. Greek, Roman, and English History, Geography, Astronomy, are large subjects, and it is impossible to travel over them to any good purpose within the scant measure allotted to each in that volume. Nor is it of the slightest use to fill a child's head with names which for him can only be mere sounds. If asked to "name the chief Grecian poets," he may answer, as Mangnall makes him answer, "Homer, Hesiod, Archilochus, Tyrtæus, Alcæus, Sappho, Simonides, Æschylus, Euripides, Sophocles, Aristophanes, Anacreon, Pindar, and Menander"; but this teaches him nothing, and it is much better that he should not know the names until he can attach to them some facts or some ideas. It is not here, however, that the greatest harm is done. The worst is that the boy or girl takes down, in a dogmatic form, a mass of statements which are either absurd or false, and they go away from their work, if they remember it at all, with the firm conviction that "the Egyptians communicated the knowledge of their discoveries in the useful and elegant arts to the Greeks, who afterwards made them known to the Romans," and that "Athens was founded by Cecrops, who, having landed here about 1,600 years B.C. with an Egyptian colony, introduced order among the original inhabitants." Naturally enough, they will talk glibly of Sesostris as "the successor of that Amenophis who was drowned in the Red Sea," although Egyptologists say that only his army was drowned, and the Pentateuch bears out their words. That Lycurgus enforced an equal division of lands among all Spartan citizens, that the laws of Draco were much more cruel than any passed before or since, they have no doubt whatever. Are not these things noted in the pages of their printed catechism, and must not the catechist know all about it? If he has any misgivings, will not these at once give way before the motto from Thomson which, prefixed to the Questions, tells him that, as he follows his guide, he is "conducted by Historic Truth"?

The confusion of ideas and falsification of facts can scarcely be carried further than in Hort's Pantheon, or Catechism of Mythology, which maintains its ground in spite of Dr. Smith and Mr. Cox. But as we have already* culled some choice absurdities from this book, we will not inflict on our readers any further extracts a volume which tells us "that Orpheus, Pythagoras, Thales, and other founders of Grecian philosophy and mythology studied in Egypt." Nothing can be done to improve such a book as this; the stable of Augeas can be cleansed only by turning a river through it, and sweeping away all its contents. It is true that in this particular matter the Encyclopædia Britannica is quite as absurd as Hort's Pantheon, but then all its articles are not like its article on Mythology. Unfortunately almost all the information conveyed by the Stepping-Stone series for which Mr. Mitchell has drawn up his manual, is practically of this kind. Of these the least harmful is the Stepping-Stone to Geography, because it does not pretend to do more than deal with the map of to-day; and in the absence of monstrous mistakes and blunders we may pardon the man who thinks that he is doing a child good by getting him to answer "roast beef and plum-pudding" to the question which asks him—"What is the favourite and famous national fare of the English?" or by making him repeat a page and a half about the present circuits of the Judges. But it is doing a child a serious mischief to tell him that "the State of the Trinobantes consisted of Essex and Middlesex"—a way of talking which may well make him think that Julius Cæsar came to England. In the same muddling fashion the Stepping-Stone to English History speaks of "the Saxons dividing that part of Great Britain called England into seven kingdoms." The juxtaposition of the following questions and answers is perhaps even a more serious offence:—

> Q. In what year did Egbert begin to reign as King of England?
> A. In the year 828.
> Q. What great system was introduced into England about this time, which has been the chief source of the civilization, peace, and happiness of the country?
> A. Christianity.

After the same style the child is told that Alfred divided England into counties, while under William the Conqueror, so called of course because he won in the fight at Hastings, we have the following portentous query:—

> Q. Who invented musical notes in this reign?
> A. A Frenchman.

The old Greek poet is more merciful when, speaking of the invention of the lyre, he at least tells us that it was made by Hermes.

The Stepping-Stone to Grecian History shows some improvement on others in the series, but the bald way in which everything is treated makes the latent scepticism of some of the questions rather mischievous than useful to the learner. The answer "No" is to be returned to the question which asks whether we can "look on Cecrops as an historical person." The next query is, "Who is said to have increased the power and wealth of Athens by his wise regulations?" the answer being "Theseus." Now the child, having been told that Cecrops is mythical, may very possibly lay a stress on the phrase, Theseus is said to have made Athens great; but is it of any use thus to be led into doubt, unless he can also give some reason for doubting the fact—in other words, until he can form some idea of the class of beings to which Theseus, Minos, Romulus, and others belong? The subject of the Draconic legislation is treated much as in Mangnall, and the child will of course go away with the impression that before the age of Draco there were no laws at Athens at all.

The Stepping-Stone to Roman History is more absurd, as we might expect when we consider the bogs and pitfalls among which an uncritical writer has to move through several centuries of the narrative. There is no lack of mere mistakes. The daughter of Servius is Tullias; the people betrayed by Sextus Tarquinius are "the Gabii." The conduct of Brutus in having his sons executed is not to be admired, because "it was most cruel and unchristian." Of course the whole story down to the Punic wars is quite true, and there is no doubt about the chronology; but by way of acquitting herself of the heresy which draws a sharp line between ancient and modern history, the writer begins with some questions on modern Rome, and the information given is sufficiently strange. To a question about the healthiness of Rome the child replies that "from July to October the foreigner is exposed to dangerous fevers"; and to another on the supposed malignant character of consumption in Rome, he answers that "the disease there communicates itself to the healthy by means of articles of clothing and furniture." Having duly spoken of Rome as "the capital of the States of the Church, the residence of the Pope, and for centuries the capital of Christendom," he is next asked, "What is it now the capital of?" and answers, "Italy, and the world of arts." Whatever they may think of the world of arts, Baron Ricasoli doubtless would heartily agree with Garibaldi in wishing that he could thus with a stroke of the pen convert into a fact a consummation devoutly to be desired.

We have said enough to show of what sort of stuff these Stepping-Stones are made. A glance at almost any portion of Mr. Mitchell's manual will show that his little book is of quite another kind. Whether he is right or wrong in particular cases, he has grasped the essential distinctions between the styles which he treats, and sees that the development of styles is no mere arbitrary and irregular process, but a growth which may be traced with scientific strictness and minuteness. He has not contented himself, like Mr. Fergusson, with a chronological classification of styles generally, and more particularly of the Romanesque and Teutonic styles; and thus he has furnished to the learner a method which may enable him to find his way without much difficulty through the most intricate questions relating to Gothic architecture. In speaking thus, we are not committing ourselves to an opinion in favour of the catechetical form of this manual. On the whole, we are inclined to doubt whether long answers to short questions, or short answers to long questions, can be turned to much practical use. But there is no sort of doubt that the pupil will not be merely threshing chaff as he works out the following questions:—

* Saturday Review, February 16, 1867.

Q. What distinction can you make between Greek and Roman architecture?

A. The architecture of the Greeks was that of the column and entablature. The genuine architecture of the Romans was that of the round arch, though, when they conquered the Greeks, they grafted Greek forms on their own style, and so made the latter exhibit a combination of both.

Q. What is the principle of the styles known as Gothic?

A. The Gothic styles may be classified in two broad divisions, the first of which, comprising the styles generally known as the Early English or Lancet, and the Geometrical (or First and Second Pointed) styles, exhibits throughout the principle of subordination, or unity of separately existing parts; while the second division, comprising the Curvilinear Decorated, or Continuous, and the Rectilinear or Perpendicular styles, tended more and more to blend and fuse the separate parts. The Romanesque styles which preceded the Gothic may be described as more or less a return to the genuine arched construction of ancient Rome.

The same praise may be given to the following among other questions on tracery:—

Q. How many kinds of tracery are there?

A. Two; plate tracery and bar tracery.

Q. What is plate tracery?

A. Plate tracery is the very earliest form of tracery, and belongs to the later periods of the First Pointed or Early English style. It consists simply of apertures cut in the flat surface of the stonework between the tops of the narrow windows.

Q. Is this, properly speaking, tracery?

A. No; the complete idea of Gothic tracery requires not only that the lights and figure (or figures) above them should be combined by label and arch, with mullions instead of portions of wall, but that the spandrils in the window-head shall be pierced.

It is clear that such a manual as this, well illustrated as it is, cannot be useless. From it the reader will at the least learn something of the real results of the architectural science of the present century; and having worked through this manual he will not find himself in hopeless antagonism with such writers as Whewell, Willis, Petit, Sharpe, Paley, Freeman, Scott, Pugin, and others who are likely to know something about a subject on which they have bestowed the honest labour of years. The worst point in nine out of ten of these stepping-stones and manuals is that they seem deliberately to ignore the labours of such workers and their results, unless indeed they are written by people who do not know that the matters with which they profess to deal have ever been made subjects of careful toil and thought. Hence their books are unspeakably repulsive; and the sooner they follow the example set by Mr. Mitchell the better, if not for their own interests, yet assuredly for the welfare of the poor boys and girls who are now tormented with masses of unmeaning talk or pretentious verbiage. Instead of being more difficult, it is really easier to write a book in accordance with facts than one which twists and falsifies them; but then it must be written by some one who really knows the subject. It may perhaps be better to abandon the form of catechisms; but, whatever may be the decision on this point, it will be a happy thing for the youth of England if competent writers can be found to prepare a series of manuals which shall not be stepping-stones to ignorance and conceit, in all cases in which the learner is not driven away in disgust or despair.

ORVAL, OR THE FOOL OF TIME.*

IN his former writings Mr. Lytton has given abundant proof that he possesses many of the qualifications necessary to produce good imitations, paraphrases, and translations. However opinions may vary as to his right to be considered a genuine poet, most critics will allow him cleverness, perseverance, a love of rhythm, a keen appreciation and retentive memory of much of the best modern English poetry, resulting in the ability to write light, elegant, and harmonious verse, where in one stanza we get a glimpse of Tennyson en déshabille, in the next a flavour of Shelley diluted, succeeded by the unwonted spectacle of Browning and conventionality side by side, and alternating most curiously with a faint occasional suspicion of a pleasant individuality of tone, which, if it had only been kept separate and carefully cultivated, might have won him before this a very fair position among the really original minor poets of the day. Rather, however, than drop into the rear among these, Mr. Lytton has of late years apparently aimed at becoming the first imitator of his time. In the present volume he has dedicated his powers, which are undoubtedly considerable in this direction, to an attempt to popularize among English readers a dramatic poem, the Infernal Comedy, written by Count Sigismund Krasinski, the Anonymous Poet of Poland.

It is rather difficult to discover from its preface the exact relation which Orval, the Fool of Time, is intended to bear to the drama which it represents. Its author tells us that he came by chance across a prose translation of the poem in an old number of the Revue des Deux Mondes, and was much struck with its beauties. "While the effect of it was still fresh upon my mind, the following paraphrase of it was written with a rapidity which is perhaps the best guarantee of its fidelity." And he invariably speaks of it as a paraphrase; though from a passage in another part of the book it would almost seem to be something else. "There is a merit," he says, "which belongs to accurate translation, and there is a merit which belongs to spirited paraphrase. I presume to think, however, that there is also another kind of merit, belonging neither to the one nor the other, in the vividness with which a writer may succeed in imparting to the minds of his readers sensations added to the stock of his own individuality by contact with a literature embodying the thoughts and fancies of an experience unfamiliar to himself and his countrymen." Putting this and that together, and having no knowledge of the original work, we are left to form our opinion from internal evidence in the poem, whether it is to be regarded as a spirited paraphrase, or an attempt to bring before us vividly the sensations added to the stock of Mr. Lytton's individuality by contact with the French translation; in other words, whether it resembles the Infernal Comedy as Pope's translation does the Iliad, or whether the merit in it is of the kind that would belong to a novel, let us say, written at top speed by an enthusiastic Frenchman, in imitation of the Pickwick Papers, with which he had lately become acquainted through the medium of a German translation. A perusal of the poem as it stands, combined with the light thrown upon it by its preface, seems to suggest that while it is in some parts a paraphrase, it is in others, not to use the word in an invidious sense, a tolerably unscrupulous adaptation. Some passages certainly read like translations, but the general absence of any definite traces of the nationality of its author—a Polish poet, as we are particularly told, writing for a Polish people—leads us to suspect that in many places Mr. Lytton has availed himself pretty freely of the liberty of departing not only from the letter, but also from the spirit, of the original. To remove any such traces was necessarily to remove one chief element of interest, and possibly to destroy altogether the perspicuity of the poem. In the absence of accurate information on the subject, all that can be done is to review the drama in its present form, without holding Count Krasinski responsible for its defects, or accrediting Mr. Lytton with the originality of the plot.

There seem to be two main objects aimed at in the poem—one to poetize the French revolution after an abstract fashion, the scene being laid in a totally imaginary country, and the characters of none of the historical actors being preserved; the other, to show that the man who is heartless and incapable of human sympathy is mischievous to society and damnable; or, as the chorus of Evil Spirits sing it, an hour or two before his death—

> Because thou hast never loved aught, or ever > Hast aught adored, but thine own self, O soul, > Therefore shalt thou the face of God see never.
> Evil thy course, Damnation be thy goal!

Orval, whose future prospects are thus distinctly revealed to us, is the typical aristocrat, with liberal tendencies, but impelled by ambition to take the lead of the nobility against the revolutionists. When his last fortress is taken, he commits suicide by leaping from the ramparts into an abyss beneath. He is throughout a very tremendous and awe-inspiring personage, with a most inexhaustible flow of windy declamation, holding communion with a multiplicity of spirits, evil and good—a guardian angel and an infernal eagle—who chants his choral passages with the best of his associates. Mr. Lytton tells us that the only language natural to such a character is rant, and if a due allowance of bombast was all that was wanted to make him natural, his hero is certainly a great deal more natural than bearable. We draw a sigh of relief as he goes over the castle wall with a sensational header, emitting his last furious gush of what bade fair to be an eternal flood of wordy melodramatic verse:—

> Earth, take back whate'er of thine
> Held for awhile this yet unconquer'd Spirit,
> Which now goes hence. All mine eternity
> I see before me—black and terrible,
> And, in the midst, God, like a sun that burns
> For ever, lighting nothing. Farewell, world!
> Receive me, thou, my native element,
> Into whose vast and sombre depths, thus, thus,
> With outstretcht arms and open'd spirit, I plunge!

(He leaps from the wall, and disappears into the abyss beneath.)

Panurge, the commander of the revolutionists, is a no less imaginative and typical being—a great ruling mind, unscrupulous and inscrutable, an atheist up to the last few moments of his life, purposing to achieve by his victory some vague ultimate amelioration of the human race, but, like Orval, dying just as the new era is about to begin. He is a more shadowy creation than his companion, and gains in effectiveness by being so; for these great abstract heroic Frankensteins, with all the humanity and national characteristics taken out of them, have a woeful tendency to become wooden when brought boldly into the foreground to point some clearly enunciated moral. With his death the poem ends as follows. He is sitting with his follower Brutus on the conquered wall:—

PANURGE.

> A sign! a sign!
> I know it. I have seen it in bad dreams.

BRUTUS.

> Lean upon me. Thy face is white as death.

* Orval, or the Fool of Time; and other Imitations and Paraphrases. By Robert Lytton. London: Chapman & Hall. 1869.

PANURGE.

Millions of men obey me. Multitudes, Nations in arms. Where is my People?

BRUTUS.

Hark!
Their cry is yet upon the air beneath us.
Thy People call thee. In their name, and mine,
Pluck those changed eyes from yonder reddening rock!

PANURGE.

He stands there, still! Pierced with three nails, which are Three stars. His arms are stretch'd across the world.
We cannot pass them.

BRUTUS.

Master, I see nothing.
Away! away!

PANURGE.

Vicisti, Galilee!

(He dies.)

We have purposely chosen the two most elaborated and thrilling bits of the tremendous in the poem. The force of the melodrama can no further go. Both ranters being dead, one of them in the most unexpected and inexplicable manner, we are left to wonder how the revolution will get on without its leading spirit, and what great moral truth is indicated by his fearfully sudden death. For the whole drama, it seems, bristles with second and third meanings. Nothing is to be taken in its simple sense. Everything is an allegory. We are to feel that it is an allegory, but we are not to be given the key to it. Now surely this is a mistake. Surely an allegory ought to be decently intelligible, or else be readable without any reference to second meanings. At any rate ought not the translator of an allegory to take especial care that his translation shall at least be as intelligible as the original? That it is not so, we infer from the following passage amongst others in his preface. Speaking of the Infernal Comedy, he says:—"Count Krasinski's entire conception of the revolutionary drama is profoundly sad. It closes with the picture of a universal failure, without a hope beyond." Now Orval closes with nothing of the kind. Panurge is certainly dead, but the revolution is entirely successful. It has taken the last fortress of the aristocracy, and that is all we know about it. The great social regeneration aimed at is certainly yet to come, but then the curtain falls just as the new system is about to be put upon its trial. In this there is much that is vague, but very little that is sad. Either the close of the Infernal Comedy must be something very different from the close of Orval, or the comment upon it seems rather farfetched and questionable.

In dealing with abstract puppets and ideas, Mr. Lytton seems to have missed his vocation. He is like an active lightweight who excels in leaping and running, but fails when he tries to win distinction by putting the weight and throwing the hammer. Whenever any opening comes—and even in such a terrific poem as Orval there are openings for the display of gentle sentiment and the tender emotions—he gets over the ground lightly and nimbly enough. Directly the deep speculations begin, we get laboured grandiloquence and empty long-drawn elegance in place of the rude strength of an unconsciously original writer. Whenever an unusual expression occurs, it seems to have been chosen because it was unusual, and not because it was the only one in which the writer could make his meaning clear. The situations of the piece are many of them fresh, and the plot is ingenious, but the element of greatness is nowhere visible, though the strainings after it are everywhere conspicuous enough. But poets are a stiffnecked race, and when one of them has persuaded himself that his forte lies in the magnificent, it is the hardest thing in the world to persuade him to come down from his stilts. In many respects Mr. Lytton resembles Propertius. He should take to heart the advice given to that poet by Apollo:—

Non hic ulla tibi speranda est fama, Properti.
Mollia sunt parvis prata terenda rotis.

It is a relief to turn to the minor pieces in the volume, most of which are eminently readable. The greater number of them are imitations of Servian ballads, which have been published and reviewed before. There is a very pleasing paraphrase in blank verse of the episode of Aristæus, from the Fourth Georgic, where the easy melody, clearness, careful choice of words, and general faithfulness of the English leave little to be desired. Mr. Lytton seems also to have found a congenial author in Ronsard, whom he paraphrases simply and unaffectedly. But the prettiest things in the book are two imitations from the Danish, a comparison of which with any average bits out of Orval shows distinctly enough the directions in which the author's strength and weakness lie. The second is too long to be judged by quotations; the first suffers by being mutilated, but its merits will be partially apparent from a stanza or two:—

Stretching the tired limbs over the ground,
Laying the head o'er the Elfin Mound,
Seem'd I, or dream'd I, to hear and to see
Two milk-white maidens come lightly to me,
So lightly to me?
I saw them but once: I shall see them no more.
Dreaming is o'er.

And a marvellous music in air was heard,
And voices neither of breeze nor bird:
And the torrent, that never before stood still,
Stopp'd all at once of his own wild will
On the windy hill.
I saw them but once: I shall see them no more.
Dreaming is o'er.

"And wilt thou be of us? and wilt thou be ours?
We will play thee strange music, and ply thee strange powers:
Dance thee sweet dances, and sing thee sweet tunes:
And teach thee to read and to write the great runes
That charm stars and moons."
I saw them but once: I shall see them no more.
Dreaming is o'er.

SOME years ago we had occasion to review a well-meant, but not very successful, attempt to turn Master Wace into English verse, but we did not enlarge so specially as we might have done on Wace himself and his merits. To supply that lack is a good work at any time, and may be as well done at this time as at any other. But before we begin to say anything about Wace's merits, let us say a word about his mere name and description. Is not Wace the first man who ever called himself, or was called, by his surname only without his Christian name? It is certainly a strange thing that there should be a man of the twelfth century of whom we know the surname while his Christian name is doubtful. At the very close of his work he describes himself as "Maistre Wace" without any Christian name, and the name Robert, by which his French editor calls him, seems to be only a guess, though not an unlikely one. In one place in his history he indeed calls the famous Walter Giffard by his surname only, but then the Christian name had been used such a very little time before that the liberty taken was not a very frightful one. To speak of himself in a formal way as "Maistre Wace," as we now talk of Mr. Smith, is decidedly a step further, and it seems likely enough to be the first instance of the modern usage.

Master Wace certainly fills a very important place both in the history and the literature of his age. He and his contemporaries give us the earliest extant example of any long composition in the French language. And though there are doubtless earlier compositions in the Southern forms of Romance, it would be hard to find any of the same historical value. It is not wonderful that French literature should be a plant of later growth than the literature of the languages, both Romance and Teutonic, which surround it. The Teutonic languages naturally developed their literature earlier than the Romance languages, because the man who was speaking or writing High-Dutch or Danish or English must always have known what he was speaking or writing, and could never have fancied that he was speaking or writing Latin. But it was only gradually that the Romance languages came to be recognised as distinct languages, capable of being made the vehicles of sustained composition. For a long time a Romance-speaking man would doubtless have flattered himself that he both spoke and wrote Latin, though he would doubtless have allowed that the Latin which he spoke was much less pure than the Latin which he wrote. That France should lag behind Provence in the formation of a native literature was only natural. We must never forget that Northern Gaul remained, deep into the tenth century, subject, so far as it could be said to be subject, to a German-speaking sovereign. It was no doubt at the Court of the Dukes, afterwards the Kings of Paris that the French language grew up into anything like a regular form. But the great position which that language was destined to take among the languages of Europe came from another quarter. It was the Normans who, by becoming French, finally determined that Northern Gaul should be French, and not German. And, of the tongue which they then made their own, the Lingua Romana, now become a recognised national speech as Lingua Gallica, they became the most diligent cultivators at home and the most diligent propagators abroad. It was the conquests of the Normans which spread the French tongue from Scotland to Sicily, and the Normans had no small share in at least the first stage of that latter crusading movement which planted the French tongue at the Courts of Jerusalem, Cyprus, and Constantinople. The second stage in the development of the French language, the writing of prose history, is due, if not to France Proper in the very strictest sense, yet at least to Champagne, the country of Villehardouin and Joinville. But the earliest stage, the stage represented by Wace, the stage of historical composition in metre, is beyond doubt primarily Norman.

Wace's work is a noble one; it is one which improves on acquaintance, and which shows its author to have been possessed of no small share of the best qualifications of an historian. Its title of "Roman," and the fact of its being written in verse, should not lead any one astray. The work of the good Canon of Bayeux is a history, and a history which places its writer very high among the historians of his own age. He wrote in verse, because the first efforts at sustained composition in any language are sure to be in verse. It is most curious to watch in our own Chronicles how prose supplants verse as the vehicle of the higher sort of composition. The writers of the earlier parts clearly had no idea of elevated prose. When they came to a part of their story which plainly called for a higher treatment than usual, all they could do was to throw their thoughts into verse. Gradually the art of prose-writing advanced, till we come to those wonderful pieces of natural eloquence which set forth the character of William and the horrors of the reign of Stephen. But poetical entries of the Chronicle are just as trustworthy as the entries. The style of expression of of course is different, but is nothing about them savouring of what is called poetic licence with regard to the facts. So with the Song of Maldon. There can be no doubt that it gives a thoroughly trustworthy account of the battle. So with Wace, his work is none the less a history because it is in verse; he wrote in verse simply because in his day it was as natural to use verse for the purpose as it now is to use prose. In fact we trust Wace's French verse a great deal more than if he had written in rhetorical Latin. We suspect that most men will be more truthful in their own tongue, which they write naturally, than in a foreign tongue, where there is always a temptation to display, and, with display, a danger of exaggeration.

The book, then, is in fact a history of Normandy from the first beginnings of the Duchy to the death of William the Conqueror. In the earlier part he does little more than versify the narratives of Dudo of Saint Quintin and William of Jumièges; in fact there was little else to be done. His narrative therefore is neither more nor less trustworthy than the earlier narratives on which it is founded. But this is really saying a great deal, if we compare Wace with the crowd of writers, in verse and prose, in Latin and in the vernacular, who were not satisfied to follow the best materials within their reach, but made it their business to trick everything out with exaggerated or legendary improvements. But as Wace draws nearer to his own time, he rises to a much higher position than that of a mere versifier of what others had written before him. His narrative of the Conquest of England must be looked on as an independent authority, and an authority of a very high order. His narrative is not indeed a contemporary authority, like William of Poitiers or the Bayeux Tapestry. But Wace comes just within the limits which Sir George Lewis fixes for credible testimony. Born quite early in the twelfth century, he might easily have talked in his youth with old men who had been in the great battle. His work was written, or at least finished, late in life, in the reign of Henry the Second, and we may suspect that a great part of his life had been spent in collecting materials. If we compare him with a strictly contemporary writer like William of Poitiers, we shall at once see the advantages and disadvantages of his position. The Archdeacon of Lisieux wrote from his own knowledge, or from perfectly fresh information; the Canon of Bayeux wrote many years after the fact, from such information as he could get. But then Wace wrote to record the truth, while William of Poitiers wrote simply to magnify his patron. Nothing strikes us so much in Wace as his thorough honesty of purpose. He evidently took the utmost pains to get at trustworthy accounts of everything. When he is mistaken—and he sometimes is mistaken—we are sure it is always the fault of his informants and not his own. He is one of that small class of writers who, when they do not know a thing, have honesty enough to say that they do not know it. A great deal of what he tells us he must have picked up from local and family traditions, and we know how apt local and family traditions are to be inaccurate and exaggerated. But there is no sign of exaggeration or conscious myth-making on the part of the writer himself. We must take many of his stories for what they are worth; but, whether we believe them or not, we are certain that Master Wace simply told the tale as 'twas told to him. Between conflicting statements, as in the different accounts of the numbers of the ships and the armies, Wace always inclines to the most moderate and probable version. Moderation in short runs through his whole work. He is not a furious partisan like William of Poitiers. He is a Norman, a Norman of the Normans. A native of Jersey, a Canon of Bayeux, he belonged by birth and residence to the true Norman lands, and his local sympathies are often strongly shown. He loves to dwell on anything which concerns either his own city of Bayeux, or his native island and the noble peninsula to which that island was an appendage. But he has none of that savage hatred toward Harold or towards England which is shown by other Norman writers, by William of Poitiers above all. We judge of his statements of fact according to our light, but his tone is always fair, moderate, and sensible. He does thorough justice to the great qualities of the English King and to the enduring valour of the English soldiers. To this last indeed ample testimony is borne, even by such frantic libellers as William of Poitiers and Guy of Amiens. And one Englishman Wace seems to have chosen as his special hero. Gyrth seems somehow to have been a favourite with all the Norman writers, except with William of Poitiers, who of course could not stoop to admire any Englishman. But though Gyrth stands out boldly in the accounts both of William of Jumièges and of Orderic, it is only in Wace that he approaches to anything like the position of hero of the piece. For in Wace he does something very like it. He is of course second to William, but he is second to William only; he distinctly stands out before any other man, Norman or English. This part of the poem is all but a Gyrthiad. The hero is brought in on every conceivable opportunity, and he is always represented as displaying the most remarkable union of wisdom and valour. And his story is worked up with a good deal of epic skill, till we reach the final point where he dies, the last man at the Standard, by the hand of the Conqueror himself. It is not easy to see how this Norman tradition of Gyrth arose. Possibly there may have been a feeling that the great man of their own side needed to be matched against a worthy adversary, while it would not do to show too much honour to the perjured Harold. But even to Harold, as we have said, Wace is wonderfully fair, compared with other Norman writers; still Gyrth is decidedly his favourite on the English side.

The Roman de Rou is by no means the only work of Wace, but it is the one on which his fame rests. And it is one which ought to set his fame very high, both strictly as an historical authority and as one of the founders of a literature such as that of France. Thoroughly to appreciate Wace, he ought to be compared with other writers of his own class, especially with his younger contemporary and rival, Benoit de Sainte-More. In Benoit there is a distinct romantic element, an element of exaggeration and decking out of facts, which stands in marked contrast to the honest sobriety of Master Wace. That honest sobriety, combined as it was with a diligent and inquiring spirit, sets Wace very high in his class. It is not often among mediæval writers that we find one who wrote so long after the events which he records who can throw so much real and, in the best sense, original light upon them.

GHEEL.*

THIS is a book of which we may confidently say that it was worth writing, and that, with certain slight drawbacks, it is very well written. Its exterior is rather deceptive. It blazes out upon the world in the most brilliant of all possible yellows, and produces the impression that it means to compete with those shilling novels which seek to attract our eye on railway bookstalls. The startling picture of a terrible catastrophe ornaments its sides, and the name of Gheel will probably leave most readers in profound ignorance. What, or who, is or was Gheel? will be their natural inquiry; is it an Indian city, or an article of commerce, or the name of a Highland hero? Not to leave them in suspense, we will inform them at once that Gheel is a village about thirty miles from Antwerp, and that a Flemish writer asks indignantly, who is there that has never heard of Gheel? In Belgium the question would probably be met by the intended reply; but in England it is necessary to explain further, that Gheel is the site of the oldest lunatic asylum in the world; and that the system there adopted is in certain respects entirely peculiar and well deserving of attention. The insane and idiotic have been received at Gheel for, it is said, twelve hundred years, and the legend which accounts for this singular speciality is as follows:—An Irish princess who was converted to Christianity was persecuted by an extremely objectionable old Pagan father. She ran away to the most remote corner of the globe then discoverable, which happened to be Gheel. Her retreat was discovered by her indignant father, owing to her folly in paying her bills with Irish currency of the period, thus exciting remark amongst the intelligent inhabitants of Antwerp. The father solaced his wounded feelings by cutting off his daughter's head, and her body, being left on the ground, became the cause of innumerable and startling miracles. The natural result was a great concourse of devotees, who, as was equally natural, were composed chiefly of the insane and idiotic. The inhabitants took charge of these poor creatures, and in this way started the peculiar industry which for twelve centuries has been practised at Gheel. The author does not pledge herself to the authenticity of this remarkable legend; but the facts which she investigated on the spot are equally remarkable, whatever may have been their original cause. The only fault that we have to find with the account given of them is, that the writer, from a laudable anxiety to be amusing, has adopted a style approaching a little too closely to the orthodox manner of fictitious writers. She reports conversations so dramatically that we rather lose faith in their strict accuracy. However, perhaps this is hypercritical; and at any rate she gives a very clear and intelligent account of the main peculiarities of the place.

The most distinctive circumstance about Gheel is that the lunatics, instead of being collected in a large building, are scattered about amongst the different families. They become domesticated in different houses, where each patient may have conveniences according to the means of his relations. Those who are comparatively healthy, or who have long lucid intervals, work at their trades, and frequently earn as good wages as the sane persons with whom they board. Others of course require more careful supervision, and are subject to more or less restraint; but the great principle which prevails at Gheel is that which has been adopted in all rationally managed asylums, of reducing coercive measures to the smallest practicable amount, and trusting as much as possible to the gradual influence of simple and regular life and healthy diet. The circumstances of Gheel enable this system to be carried out with a completeness elsewhere unknown. It might indeed be supposed at first sight that lunatics living in the families of farmers or artisans would frequently be subject to harsh, or at best to unintelligent, treatment; and the author says that in former times abuses were known, if they were not frequent. Now, however, a great reform has been made. The Belgian Government has established a central asylum at Gheel, under the supervision of a distinguished physician, Dr. Bulckens, to which all patients are sent in the first instance. They remain there for a time, until each case has been properly observed and the appropriate treatment determined. If special medical care is required, they may remain permanently; but as a rule they are sent to board in different houses of the district. For this purpose, Gheel and the neighbouring villages, including a population of about 11,000 souls, is divided into six districts, to each of which a special class of patients is assigned. It is not very easy to understand the classification as given by the author; but it appears that the harmless cases are allowed to live in the central village, and that the most violent are sent to the more remote districts, where they can live in certain farmhouses scattered widely over a large heath. There is a careful system of supervision by appropriate officers, so that the condition of every patient is reported each night to the physician in authority. There are it seems at present 620 nourriciers, or persons authorized to take charge of lunatics, and about 800 patients. The management of the patients thus devolves principally upon the families with whom they board, and who have acquired a kind of traditional aptitude for it, whilst the classification and supervision are left to the central authorities. Some of the results appear to be very remarkable, especially as regards the relation of the patients and the nourriciers. The arrival of a boarder is generally celebrated, it is said, as a little family festivity. The guest is treated to the best of everything, and gradually learns to take an interest in all the affairs of the house. He sometimes is cured by the gradual "resuscitation of moral vigour" which results from friendly and familiar treatment. The people have learnt a peculiar practical skill in dealing with the objects of their singular hospitality. Thus, for example, a mischievous person is allowed to break everything he pleases, and it is declared that the annoyance of the owners has a better effect on the patient than any direct restriction, and frequently induces him to make a moral effort which leads to his recovery from the habit. Thus a young Englishman—the only one of our countrymen at Gheel—had imported, amongst other "expensive and unattractive habits," a peculiar love of breaking windows. Certainly the passion, taken by itself, would not be a sufficient proof of lunacy, and we fear that the method of cure adopted at Gheel would hardly be found effective at an English University town. On the first day of his arrival this young gentleman broke twenty-eight windows; no notice whatever was taken of his exploit, and next day he confined himself to smashing fourteen. He was again mortified by the complete indifference of the villagers, and since that time has completely abandoned this delightful pastime. The result, if satisfactory in its way, illustrates the extreme difficulty of introducing the Gheel system elsewhere. It would certainly take something like twelve centuries of training to induce the inhabitants of an English village to allow undergraduates to live amongst them and break as many windows as they pleased without remonstrance. A still more remarkable case is mentioned in illustration of the skilful treatment of the violent lunatics. One who was subject to occasional fits of frenzy had exhibited symptoms of an approaching crisis, and the doctor had warned the woman in whose house he was living to watch him closely. The madman objected to this vigilance, and whilst the nourricière was sitting in front of the door with her infant in her lap, he took up a large pair of tailor's shears and threatened to split her skull. She walked towards him holding up her infant as a shield and made him back into a low chair at the further end of the room. She then threw the child into his arms, and running out of the room locked the door upon the pair. The baby screamed violently, to the extreme surprise of the maniac. The mother fainted away from excitement, but on recovering sent for the doctor; and on his arrival half an hour afterwards the door was opened and the maniac was found calmly nursing the child, which he had restored to good humour at the same time with himself. The method was certainly original, and perhaps it would take even longer to train mothers to this use of their infants than to teach the ordinary mind to submit to window-smashing. It is indeed remarked as a curious result, that the affection entertained by the lunatics for children, and the reciprocal veneration which the children entertain for the infirmity of their guests, is frequently touching and of almost incredible intensity. A patient seized with an attack of raving mania is frequently restored to composure, it is asserted, simply by the presence of a little child. In spite of the extreme liberty allowed to the patients, and the familiar terms on which they live with the inhabitants, it is said that cases of personal injury are unknown, nor have the Gheelians themselves suffered any evil consequences from their long and close association with lunatics. The patients liable to attacks of temporary violence frequently leave the houses of their own accord and wander off into the fields and woods, where they can give way to their impulses without injury to their neighbours.

The author gives various descriptions of individual cases, and of the strange, half ludicrous, half melancholy incidents resulting from the delusions of the patients, in which, however, there is little that is new. The most purely ludicrous story, which we fancy that we have heard before, is the answer of a lunatic to a visitor who said to him, "You now tell me that you are the Archangel Gabriel, but last time I was here didn't you tell me that you were Lucifer?" "So I am," replied the lunatic, "but it's by different mothers." There is another good anecdote of the madman whose release had been procured by Balzac, who had convinced himself and the authorities after a long investigation that the un-[illegible]te man was the victim of a conspiracy to keep him out of [illegible] Balzac was delighted with his success, and begged [illegible]lebrate his release by coming to breakfast with him. "No," said the man, "but I will come if you make it a supper." "Certainly," said Balzac, "if you prefer it, but why should you not come to breakfast?" "Because," was the reply, "you will see, as a sensible man, that I cannot allow myself to be seen except at night, as I am the moon." Balzac decided to be more careful another time. The story, true or false, may be paralleled by the anecdote mentioned by Erskine, in his speech on Hadfield's case, of the lunatic who almost succeeded in an action for obtaining his release, till he accidentally admitted that he believed himself to be Jesus Christ. On a subsequent occasion the same man was so conscious that this answer had led to his continued confinement that he refused to commit himself again, and his former reply had to be given in evidence.

These stories, however, are a divergence from the main purpose of the book, which is to recommend Gheel to the attention of qualified observers. It is, indeed, sufficiently plain that it would be almost impossible to transplant the system which has there been gradually developed. We cannot expect that any population of sufficient size would be induced to take in lunatics on a large scale as boarders; and it would be still more difficult to train such a population in the necessary medical knowledge, and to make them practise proper forbearance and self-restraint. Yet it is probable that many hints may be derived, as to the general principles of treatment, from the singularly rational and humane methods adopted at Gheel. The author seems only to have made a passing visit, but a more careful and prolonged inspection would probably well repay the trouble. She has done good service in calling attention to the facts.

CALENDAR OF STATE PAPERS—DOMESTIC SERIES.*

[I]N our review † of Mr. Brewer's Letters and Papers of the reign of Henry VIII., we said that we supposed "Mr. Lemon's successor would enlarge the accounts of the documents which she has to epitomize, so as to bring the concluding years of the Domestic Papers of Elizabeth into something more like harmony with the corresponding period of Foreign Papers." Mrs. Green's volume was completed before these words were written, and it may be thought she has done exactly what was suggested. Forsaking the method followed by her predecessor for the Calendar of the first thirty-three years of Elizabeth, and adopted by herself for the twenty-two years of the reign of James I., she has given us a fair analysis of the Domestic Papers of the years 1591–1594 inclusive, and promises us two more volumes before she can complete the series of Domestic Papers for this reign. And it may be said that we ought to be satisfied. Nevertheless we are not satisfied. We have several faults to find. The accounts of the State Papers are in many instances too meagre. We believe we are correct in saying that there is not a single footnote in the volume explaining any historical difficulty. There is no allusion anywhere throughout these papers to any copies of them which exist either in MS. or in print. Those are serious faults in such a Calendar, and we fancy they are attributable to one and the same cause. Mrs. Green is by no means deficient in skill, or in knowledge of her subject. She has been accustomed to the reading of manuscripts and to historical investigations for more than twenty years, and her Letters of Royal and Illustrious Ladies, which were published as long ago as the year 1846, bear ample testimony to her historical and critical powers, and her intimate [a]cquaintance both with printed books and the repositories of manuscripts. The most probable account of the deficiencies of this volume then is, that the editor has been hurried through her work. We are not aware whether she is subjected to the rule of producing a volume every year, which presses so hardly upon some [o]f the editors on the staff of the Master of the Rolls. But if this be so, it will account for Mrs. Green's not having produced a volume as valuable as she might have done, and as we believe she would have done if she had not been fettered by unwise restrictions.

And, whilst we are on the subject of unwise restrictions, we will venture to repeat our opinion, though we may be told that it is crambe decies repetita, that the Master of the Rolls has made a great mistake in his order which cuts down the prefaces to these volumes, and confines them to an explanation of the papers contained in them. This order, whilst in some cases, as in that of Mr. Brewer, it has been wholly inoperative, seems to have frightened other editors, and perhaps amongst them Mrs. Green, [i]nto an almost entire silence; whilst in the few words with which [t]he volume is introduced to the public the editor has made a very unwise defence of the want of uniformity in the series, part of [illegible] judges had been asked, before this series was commenced, whether an index to the State Papers or a description of them was wanted, the verdict would have been nearly unanimous in favour of the latter—in favour, that is, of a system which should in almost all cases preclude the necessity of consulting the originals.

Now, if Mrs. Green had enlarged her epitomes to this extent, one ground of complaint against this volume would have been removed. It is because we have so often been disappointed in this respect that we consider this the principal defect in the volume. For instance, it would be absurd to suppose that the description of the report of the conspiracy of Dr. Lopez, which is compressed into nine lines, would satisfy any one who wished to investigate the history of this attempt to destroy the Queen, and who knows that the original is extended to more than twenty-two pages. It is indeed possible that nothing more can be gleaned from the original than appears in the other documents in this volume, which extend over more than thirty pages, from p. 430 to p. 460; but, if so, this should have been stated in a note. Either the information contained in this paper is not sufficient, or, if it is, this should have been distinctly stated. As it is, the historian who wants to be sure that he has omitted no available source of information for this plot against the Queen's life must have recourse to the original of this paper, where—if we may hazard a conjecture as to the true state of the case—he will probably find no additional information to that which he can gather from the documents calendared in this part of the volume. But, if this be so, it is much to be regretted that there should not be afforded to the reader the same information that is appended to a subsequent document of March the 9th, 1594. This paper, which also in the original occupies above six pages, consists of a brief declaration of Dr. Lopez's treasons. But, as it is to the same effect as those already calendared, the editor has perhaps exercised a wise economy of space in omitting to describe it more minutely.

This is far from being a solitary instance of the fault with which we are charging the editor of this volume. The most vexatious of the omissions are those of the names of Popish recusants. And though the reader will find in the Index, under the head of Recusants, the sub-titles names of, lists of, wives of, &c., he will in vain search the body of the work for the names, there being in general nothing more definite than the following:—

> Names of students and English seminaries at Rheims, and 4 in the English College at Rome, known to Robert Weston; also of 21 recusants and favourers of the Church of Rome remaining in and about London; in Hertfordshire, 4; Bedfordshire, 4; Northamptonshire, 5; Leicestershire, 2; Staffordshire, 1; &c.

Mrs. Green must be quite aware of the extreme difficulty of getting at the truth as regards the religious belief of the nation at large, and of separate counties and county families in particular. And in this relation we cannot but think that every distinct name occurring in any of these documents ought to have been reproduced. The Church history of that period has never yet been written by any one possessed of an intimate acquaintance with its records. And we want the means of testing what has been written of it by Roman Catholic or by Puritan authors, and, above all, we want a fuller account of the recusants themselves than is to be met with in Dodd's Church History, or in any other account of them that has yet been printed. This is the weak point of Mrs. Green's Calendar, which in other respects, and as far as we can judge without comparing her epitomes with the actual originals, we believe to have been conscientiously and faithfully executed.

Much the largest part of the book is occupied by one subject; and if any one hitherto has been apt to suspect that Queen Elizabeth had a quiet and secure life after she had got rid of the obnoxious Queen of Scots, and after the signal discomfiture of the Spanish Armada, a glance at these pages will suffice to undeceive him. Scarcely a page can be opened which does not contain something about real or supposed plots of Papists against the Government or the Queen's life. The volume does not throw as much light as we could have wished either on the reality of the plots or on the extent to which the King of Spain was implicated in them. We must wait for further revelations from the Simancas Records, and we fear that we shall have to wait for many years before we know much about the real connexion of English conspirators with the Court of Spain; or, again, how far suspicions were entertained at Madrid that Elizabeth was conspiring against Philip's life. The boast contained in one of the State Paper documents, that Elizabeth was not concerting measures against the Spanish King, at least shows that some such suspicion was afloat, and that it was not thought very unnatural that she should be undertaking some such measures by way of reprisal and retaliation.

Perhaps the most striking feature in the volume, to a reader of the present day, is the separation of the Roman Catholic gentry into two classes, which will bear some comparison with the Ultramontane and the more liberal views entertained by Archbishop Manning and Dr. Newman respectively. The analogy must not be pressed too closely. But there was then, as there is now, amongst the Roman Catholic gentry and clergy, a party with a strongly developed English feeling. Such persons are the representatives of the view which must have been in Gardiner's and Bonner's minds; and, had the Church been left as Henry VIII. meant to leave it—the old doctrines remaining for the most part untouched, but the Pope's supremacy got rid of—many of these would have belonged to the National Church. No such alternative, however, was now presented to them, and they were content to remain loyal subjects of the Queen provided only they were unmolested in the exercise of their religion. This class of people had little or no sympathy with the violent measures adopted by some of their co-religionists, whose object was to secure the throne, after the death of the Queen, for any one in communion with the Church of Rome who might seem to have some hereditary claim, or who might be strong enough to hold it if once placed in it. With many there was a rooted hostility to any foreign rule, and this consideration seemed to render the chances of Philip of Spain and the Duke of Parma but slight; but a claim might be made for a son of the latter if a match could be brought about between him and Lady Arabella Stuart. Lord Strange, who was lineally descended from Henry VII., was another possible candidate. The Queen's long reign, and the discovery and defeat of all the plots and machinations against her life, disappointed all their hopes. It is useless now to speculate upon what might have been the eventual effect of a declaration, on the Queen's part, who was to be her successor. She must have known, as well as her courtiers did, how much strength such a declaration would have given to her Government. Yet, with a perversity the chief ingredient of which perhaps was personal vanity, she persistently refused to name any one. Of the quiet accession of James VI. of Scotland to the throne of England, in 1603, we shall perhaps have more to say on the publication of the last volume of the Calendar of Domestic Papers of this reign.

The last remark we have to make on this volume is on the striking absence of many incidents of domestic history from its contents. It is so full of indictments of Roman Catholics, and hunting down Papists and Jesuits, that it seems as if the severe measures adopted by the Government against Anabaptists and other sectarians who began to multiply at that time had been overlooked. That is of course owing to no fault in the editor, but to a deficiency in the documents. Even where the arraignment of a Nonconformist minister is noticed, as in the case of Penry, there is not nearly enough given to check the ordinary histories of the time. We have here only two documents referring to him, one containing a very brief account of his indictment, and the other merely stating that he had been hanged; whilst of his predecessors in the same line—Arthington, Coppinger, and Hacket—the names are just mentioned in an anonymous draft, and we have to look elsewhere for their trial and the account of their death. A similar remark applies to the arraignment of Sir John Perrot, in April, 1592. In this case, it is true, there are several documents in which his name occurs. We have many papers which refer to the accusations made against him, but there is no account either of his trial or the execution of the sentence. The real reason of this is, that the originals from which this information is to be derived have found their way into other collections, whether private or public. The arraignment of Perrot may be found in the Cotton Collection in the British Museum, which, we take the opportunity of observing, is more deficient in domestic papers of Eliz. an. 33–37 than we had expected to find it. But we must add that, if the Cotton Collection is deficient, the Lansdowne most remarkably supplies the gap. Not to say anything of other papers dispersed through this Collection, there are at least twelve consecutive volumes of this library which would have furnished 1,200 documents illustrative of this history; enough, that is, to supply materials for another volume nearly as large as that which we are reviewing.

Thus, whilst the historian of the first half of the sixteenth century will have easy access to all the information that can be gathered from the volumes of Mr. Brewer and the accounts transmitted from Venice and Simancas, the unfortunate writer who shall undertake the reign of Elizabeth will have to hunt for himself for documents which he may or may not be able to find, but which most certainly ought to have appeared in this series of publications. It would not be too much to say that the whole of the Domestic Papers, from the beginning of the reign of Edward VI. to the end of Elizabeth, will some day have to be done again.

THE EPICURE'S YEAR-BOOK FOR 1869.*

ON the appearance of the first volume of this English aspirant to the fame of the Almanach de Table, La Gazette des Comestibles, and other ancient Continental annuals for the use of Monsieur L'Appétit, we ventured to point out an anomaly or two in its form and substance—for example, its mixing up the question of "food for the million" with dainties "for the upper ten," and one or two such affectations as the omission of the pheasant from the menus of October and November, whilst he figures prominently and prematurely in those of September. For these hints a dyspeptic author or editor might have done what an amusing Greek word in the Wasps of Aristophanes would have suggested to a scholar-gourmand—namely, "put us in his pot," and made stock of us for his second volume. "Fin-Bec" has not only not done this, but by his forbearance, and his omission of the features objected to, has proved that he is one with whom good living does not disagree, and that he recognises the wholesome truth that good books and good dishes can never be the worse for full and free discussion. His editorial difficulties, it would seem from his present preface, do not lie so much in adverse or lukewarm criticism as in the pange of having to reject "good" volunteer "material." "Inventors of new dishes and new condiments; importers of unknown vintages; creators of new provision trades; gastronomic authorities on the table arts, besiege him, bespeaking his attention." Amidst which graphic vision of the proverbial "too many cooks," suggestive of the difficulty which Fin-Bec must find in keeping his palate uncorrupt and his criticism just and candid, arises the central figure and master mind of M. Jules Gouffé (a veritable "flower, safety, plucked out of the nettle, danger") to impart an air of sound wisdom and discretion, of practical experience, and the true simplicity of genius, to the too often extravagant flights of gastronomic enthusiasm. The epicure, gaping for a new appetitive sensation, will con the menus for the four seasons which this great authority has contributed to this "Year-Book," and find perchance what he yearns for in the saddle of reindeer (selle de renne rôtie, purée de céleri), which is now brought from Archangel to Paris and London, and from which, "cooked à point, the gourmet cannot take off his eyes" (p. 57). Such choice winter flesh, however, cannot be accessible cuivis homini, any more than the gelinotte (or "hazel-hen,") among fowl, which comes in a week from Russia, packed in oats, contained in wicker baskets, to relieve in March the chickens and the pigeons; or the asparagus from Provence among vegetables, each head costing 4*l.*, and measuring three inches round, which figured at the Turkish Ambassador's dinner last April (cf. p. 110). Yet plain mortals, fit only, as a Frenchman would say, to discuss poultry and butcher's meat, may appreciate and profit by Fin-Bec's maxim, in accord with M. Gouffé's, as to marketing, "that when anything is so scarce as to have an extravagant price upon it, it is generally not only scarce, but of bad quality" (cf. pp. 53, 104), or by the remarks which that artist made to the editor of the Year-Book on fat meat and fat poultry shows. "The fat meat," he said, "represents so much food wasted in making diseased animals—in creating expensive, unwholesome fat. As regards poultry it is monstrous; the yellow fat with which it is covered is detestable. I see a turkey marked 6*l.*, geese at 4*l.* each, fowls at 1*l.*, and pigeons at 3*s.* 6*d.* a head. They are all unhealthy monsters, coarse and gastronomically bad. The restaurants buy them; but who that knows how to eat would order one?" The idea of M. Gouffé, which follows in the text, of offering handsome prizes, not for this production of montrosities, but "for the supply of the best breeds in the best condition to the market all the year round," is one which marks him a far-sighted and reflecting connoisseur as to the victualling department, and justifies Fin-Bec in accepting him as his "magnus Apollo."

In the "Gastronomic Calendar," and the corresponding "Seasons and Season Menus" (pp. 15–56), the reader will find "things old and new" to satisfy the most exacting appetite. The gourmet, cujus animus est in patinis, may have heard of the Poachard or Dun Bird on the 27th of January this year elsewhere than on the Misley Hall Estate, Essex; indeed, according to the eminent naturalist Mr. F. O. Morris, it arrives in England in November, and does not migrate northward until March, being abundant meanwhile in the southern and fenny counties. The simnel cakes, which one associates with reminiscences of Shrewsbury and Ludlow, are commemorated on the 10th of April, and under the head of "Good Friday" we find a note and comments on the origin of "hot-cross-buns," worthy of the pages of Notes and Queries. We are afraid that the advocates of a Christian original for these are out of court altogether. There can be no question that they are traceable to the Roman "quadra," which Ovid refers to in his Fasti (iv. 745–6), in the words "dapibusque resectis." Fin-Bec is right therefore in saying that their origin is "respectable"—classical, though not Christian. We are taught to connect St. Swithin with other ideas than fair or foul weather, when we read that on the 15th of July one "should go to Plymouth to eat 'dories,' and to the coast of Cornwall for mullets"; and henceforth an appropriate meditation for "St. Vincent's Day" (Jan. 22) will be found in the chapter upon "Our Cellar," or perhaps in the "History of the Origin of the famous French Vintages," in M. Nicolardot's Histoire de la Table. In Fin-Bec's urgent pleading for more attention to the production of winter salads in England it is impossible not to concur; and we may say the same of his glorification, in common with M. Dubois, of the "veritable English rhubarb pie, with the brown sugar"—only he has forgotten the cream!

Among the discoveries of the last year, he notes that of a rival to the foie-gras pâté in "hare-liver pie" (p. 20); but if Deyer—whose "idea of associating the fat liver of the goose with the gastronomic diamonds of Perigord" was the death of Clare, the Strasbourg inventor and purveyor of the original foie-gras—still survives, he may take heart, and not follow suit, when he learns the judgment of Fin-Bec in p. 165, that the distance between goose-liver and hare-liver is as wide as that which separates "truffles from galls."

The editor's remarks at p. 20 on the subject of the "rouge-gorge en salmis," or spitted, fail to convince us that we took a wrong view of the taste of Englishmen with reference to this Continental delicacy. Much as is due to France in matters of the table, we have confidence that on this point our naturalists would carry the day against our epicures, even if the latter should ever consent, gulæ causâ, to the destruction of "red-breasts," "red-starts," "black-caps," and such small birds, which in this country enliven our hedges, whilst abroad they are slaughtered promiscuously, twenty-four to a dish. Nor, although we have some sense of the seductiveness of a lark-pudding, and can believe that "a little pyramid of larks is delightful," can we altogether join in the lamentation of Fin-Bec, that "they have been neglected" (i.e., allowed to soar unmolested) of late years, and no longer hold the proud place they had when Cambacérès governed the dinner-tables of the First Empire" (p. 20); or in that at p. 40, where he says that there is "in July a sad lack of birds!" Where? it occurs to us to ask. In the shrubberies, the gardens, or in the open country? No! upon the club-tables, where, though he is difficult to get, a "Corsican Blackbird" may sometimes figure in a July menu. So long as he is procured from across the seas, well and good; the damage to our sensibilities is infinitesimal. But let us be content to wait for the game that comes in with August, and runs on till past the arrival of the restorative "snipe," and of the wild-duck "that repairs wasted frames," rather than furnish our menus with the blackbird which fattens right under our country windows; and the thrush, more precious to us surely as a many-noted songster than as a table delicacy, even when his orgies on the grape have enhanced his flavour, and justified the proverb, "Soûl comme une grive."

On the best mode of remedying our national scantiness of table-fruit through the winter we more cordially approve of Fin-Bec's inquiries and researches. Why should not we share with New York the advantages in this way of Mr. Nyce's fruit-preserving houses? "His theory is that by keeping fruit in a very cold and even temperature, employing certain disinfectants and appliances to absorb all moisture, and admitting no ray of light, he can arrest the process of ripening, and keep the life of the fruit, so to speak, in absolute suspense." Or why not adopt another hint from our neighbours across the Channel, to whom we owe so many, and naturalize the process of preserving cut grapes in water, which is set forth in that most suggestive volume, Mr. Robinson's Gleanings from French Gardens (pp. 196–203), a process which we commend to Fin-Bec and to our readers generally? It is practised in the gardens of Ferrières (Baron Rothschild's seat) and elsewhere, and by it grapes cut in October may be preserved till April. The grapes are cut with a longish shoot, and stuck in narrow-necked bottles, so that the branches hang clear of each other. The water in these bottles is sometimes mixed with charcoal, but this does not seem essential; and the bottles are placed in rows upon two laths, supported by two three-legged uprights. Another wrinkle, as to the preservation of peaches, gathered before they are soft-ripe, and packed in bran in a cellar or store-room (ib. 203), is valuable, if to be depended upon. To us it seems a little problematical. Before leaving the topic of fruits, we may note that Fin-Bec speaks experimentally of green-currant jelly—unstained by strawberry juice, as the Americans have it—as really delicious.

The editor's notice of fish-dinner novelties last July, e.g. "Filets de truite à l'Épicurienne," "Rouget à la Réforme," and "Anguilles à la Magdala" (p. 42), lead us away to the whitebait, which Dr. Gunther of the British Museum affirms to be the young herring, miscalled to "please fishermen and gourmands." Whilst Dubois, in his book on the dishes of all nations, can say, as he is declared to say, in p. 142, that "English whitebait is the little fish that is called 'canchetti' in Italy, poutin at Nice, and 'poisson blanc' at Bordeaux," and whilst the editor of Scientific Opinion's crucial test—of watching side by side the development of herring-spawn and whitebait-spawn in separate salt aquariums—remains untried, we shall be content to laugh at the disagreements of doctors, and to call the delicacy which "the English love to eat at 'Grénisch'" by the name which custom has endeared to us. The season of Lent will naturally render that part of the Epicure's Year-Book which is devoted to fish-dinners especially interesting to good Catholics. We wish we could transcribe for them a maigre menu which a Bréton hotel-keeper announced for last Good Friday at five francs a head (p. 31). A French writer—Mercier, quoted in the Histoire de la Table—says that at the French monarch's table in Holy Week, in his day, every fish that swam was imitated in vegetables, to which the distinct flavour of that fish it represented was imparted. We could accept this as strict "fasting," but "Saumon de Loire à la Régence," "Turbot sauce aux huitres," "Mayonnaise d'homard à l'Orientale," with much more, and "Punch Romaine" to wash it down, strike the uninitiated Protestant as in the nature of a feast.

Upon the modern wine question Fin-Bec's remarks are valuable and interesting, the more so as he regards it from the consumer's point of view. The basis of them is Mr. Beckwith's notes, and Mr. Denman's answer; and we may promise those who read the chapter intituled "Our Cellar" some excellent information as to good ordinary and extraordinary wines. One corollary may be safely drawn from the results of his inquiries and researches—that not nearly all the Château Lafite and Château Margaux, or the high-sounding Austrian "crus," any more than the famous brands of Port, or the so-called Cadiz and Puerta-Santa-Maria Sherry, come from the utterly inadequate regions which the names indicate. So far, however, we do not see that the port and sherry fanciers, with whom we desire to be classed, have much the worst of it; and it does not appear at all clear to us that either the shippers of port or ourselves have very much to gain by importing the pure vintages of the Alto Douro. Would they suit our market, or would they improve with age to an equal degree? The hint to the sherry buyer, that he should seek it of a pure straw-colour, soft but not sweet, fruity to the taste, but leaving the palate quite clean, has our entire approval. Of course it makes a vast difference in one's estimate of wines whether or not one accepts Mr. Beckwith's theory, that we should seek a wine to drink; not to sip. Granting this, the buyer of course will go in largely for the wines of Burgundy and Bordeaux. Of these the English taste, unintimidated by visions of gout, will, we suspect, favour the former. For the comfort of those who are thus minded, be it recorded that Mr. Beckwith holds Burgundy, taken with dinner, to be neither "heating nor gout-causing." Yet there ought to be virtue too in Bordeaux; and it would seem that there is to claret-drinkers like our editor, who fairly gets into a seventh heaven of poetry over Mr. Beckwith's inability to describe its bouquet. "Try," he cries, "to describe the loveliest woman your imagination has ever approached. Endeavour after words that shall present to the sense the perfume of the rose, the fragrance of a bed of thyme; master in a written page the full flavour of the peach; and your 'prentice hand' may turn to your Bordeaux bins." A propos of the French wines, no maxim can beat that of the old gourmands—"Burgundy from the cellar, Bordeaux on the stove, Champagne in the ice-tubs"; yet we see that Mr. Beckwith is against the icing of this last, and for deferring its production to a later period of dinner than is customary. In confirmation of his opinion that Champagne will improve by keeping, we must cite from the History of the Table the experience of Père Porignon, the great improver of the Champagne vintage. This worthy, who died in 1715, mastered his subject so thoroughly that he obtained a liquor sparkling or still, white, grey, or red in colour, and strong enough to keep nine years, and stand a voyage to India. We must not quit the wines without retailing a mot from Fin-Bec's scrap-book:—

A MAGNIFICENT SHERRY.

Host. Taste this sherry, sir; magnificent. Bought it at the sale of Bishop—Guest. (Having tasted) Colenso, I presume.

Had we space, we could have wished to commend Fin-Bec's clever scheme for the reform of picnics; no one could deserve a better fortune than such "Potted Luck" as henceforth readers of the Year-Book will know how to provide sous les feuilles. We might have recommended, too, his reviews of books germane to his subject, which, having gone over the same ground, we can testify that he has "read" as well as "reviewed." But it must suffice to say of his second "Year-Book" that it is, as it should be, an improvement on his first; full of good hints, curious matter, capital anecdotes, and—as the "Legacy of Corks," which serves for introduction, proves—some very pretty writing. In most points we are so impressed by his knowledge that we could sit reverently at his feet; only we must beg of him to forward us the address of the poulterer at Rouen from whom he gets his ducklings, and to bear with us if, his "Cellar" notwithstanding, we retain a belief in the possibility of purchasing wholesome Port.

MR. PERKINS will be remembered by our readers as the author of two elaborate and plentifully illustrated volumes on Tuscan Sculpture, which were noticed by us when they appeared.† He has now completed his task, if Sicily be excluded from the Regno d'Italia. But, whereas two volumes were required to give even a tolerably comprehensive outline of the art as practised within one small territory, the whole of the remaining provinces of the peninsula have been comprised by Mr. Perkins, without any retrenchment of his original scheme, within one. The natural inference from this is also the correct inference. Venice may fairly compete with Florence in the glories of painting, but Florence was the intellectual soil of Italian art; and hence the more severe and intellectual of the two sisters was far most at home in Tuscany. Even there, as we pointed out in our former notice, sculpture, despite the great genius and labour which were brought into her service, was never really understood; was never guided by those almost instinctive laws which were felt by Assyrians and Egyptians, and were carried by Hellenic artists to their highest completeness. Italian sculpture, in fact, hardly ever emerged from being a condition of painting, carried out at a great disadvantage in other materials. Its charm, for a very peculiar and powerful charm it has, is mainly derived from the other art; and except when it seems thus to reflect the great contemporary painters of the time, it ceases to please. In nineteen cases out of twenty, we find that Italian sculpture either aims at, or reaches, nothing above ornamentalism. We are very glad to see the fragments collected at Kensington; but their chief lesson is what should be avoided by a sculptor. And this moral is what Mr. Perkins's last volume, containing not above three or four names legitimately entitled to praise for success in their art, brings before us even more forcibly than its predecessors.

The volume must, however, have cost the author an even proportionately greater degree of industry and personal research. It is a perfect mine of information on ancient times, and upon the performances virorum obscurorum. Mr. Perkins has here had to deal with a subject which, as regards the actual works in sculpture, or the history of the provinces in which they were produced, and where they are now buried, is little familiar to English readers. Hence a vast mass of complex materials has been before him; he has had to sketch the early history and to give some account of the chief persons in whose honour the sculptors of the time were employed, in order to give life and meaning to his criticisms. A book written on such a scheme, like that of Messrs. Cavalcaselle and Crowe on Italian Painting, can hardly be made into a work of art, or have the sort of charm which there is in a biographical history; nor has Mr. Perkins perhaps given us so much original research into unpublished materials as the authors just named, who followed a long series of able investigators. He is more like a pioneer in new regions; but his work, like theirs, will be indispensable to all who care to follow out the story of Christian art in detail and with accuracy; although we feel at the same time that, both in the painting and the sculpture of Italy, many most interesting fields remain to reward the diligence of future students. And, though we are grateful to Mr. Perkins for what he has done in the way of illustration, yet it may be remarked that greater delicacy and greater force in the engravings would put the subject of such a work more completely before the eye of the reader.

Apulia, with which the volume opens, is a country which combined many elements in its early art. There are the influences from Byzantium, so long the paramount power in what of old had been named "Great Greece"; the Saracens, who at one time almost promised to carry the empire of Mahomet into the holy soil of the Peninsula; the Normans, who here made a conquest less durable though more brilliant than that of England; the Lombards, who during the imperfectly known centuries of our own Saxon period had planted in the South those seeds of vital vigour which were the true motive elements in almost everything of value, whether in art or politics or energetic life, which sprang up in mediæval Italy. These races have chiselled their mark on many a rude but energetic bas-relief and shrine; and though we must admit with a sigh that the sculpture is of a sadly primitive order, and has little place in art, yet there is an historical value and an archæological curiosity about it which can hardly be overvalued. Mr. Perkins gives a plate from a contemporary relief of two Saracens fighting, at Ravello, which is as vivid and more authentic than a page from Sir Walter Scott. Another etching displays a dragon door-handle, of unmistakeable Scandinavian ferocity. A third engraving shows the bronze statue of Heraclius, cast in Constantinople in the seventh century. We have a sketch of that singular castle which Robert Guiscard built upon more ancient foundations, and which was then enlarged by the great Emperor Frederic II.—him who anticipated in the thirteenth century the "critical spirit" of the nineteenth—into a singular pile, half fortress and half palace:—

> Tenanted only by robbers or wandering shepherds, it has greatly suffered of late years, and its single portal with a double Gothic arch and cannellated pilasters, above whose Corinthian capitals stand the Suabian lions, has been much marred and defaced. Through it the traveller enters into the castle, which from its great size, its peculiar distribution, the mysterious solitudes of its vaulted chambers and winding stairways, and its association with one of the most romantic and interesting persons in history, is eminently calculated to affect the imagination.

A few details follow which make one earnestly desire that, before the process of destruction goes further, some Fergusson (if there be more than one such living) would plan and draw, and preserve for those coming years when such a monument will appear like the relic of a primæval world, a building which must be one of the most singular and important relics of antiquity now existing.

Southern Italy contributes few names to the history of sculpture after these early ages. One beautiful work, the altar tomb of a Countess Montorio, is ascribed to Andrea dall' Aquila, an artist who was manifestly influenced by the Tuscan sculptors of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries. The monument shows a tenderly designed figure of the countess, with her little daughter placed as if for protection in a niche below. The inscription has a touch of true poetry in its simple setting forth of fact:—

> Beatrici Camponescæ, infanti dulci, quæ vixit mens. xiv.
> Maria Pereyra . . . mater . . . Montorii Comitis conjux, > Filiæ suæ unicæ benemerenti, et sibi, vivens posuit.

Filiæ unicæ vivens posuit! What a tale of long past and forgotten sorrow is in the simple words! The genius of a Flaxman would have been required to carry art to a point which would equal them in pathos.

In Naples and its neighbourhood Mr. Perkins describes many works of great curiosity; but the district has made little contribution to art, whether in painting or in sculpture. Merliano, the greatest name of the school, is an ornamentalist of the "pictorial" type, whose crowded compositions were the delight of the connoisseurs of his day, just as there are people who admire the bad pictures in stone which deform more than one costly reredos of recent erection.

The native barrenness of Rome in art has been often noticed. Probably no city, unless we except Athens, has drawn so many great artists together to work within it; but the creative impulse is almost absent from the race. Hence the atmosphere of the Eternal City, from the middle ages, if not from the Imperial period, to our own day, has been injurious to the genius which it has imported. Many an artist from more gifted races than that of Central Italy—English, French, or Tuscan—has turned mannerist at Rome, or sacrificed his talent to please the little winter coterie of ignorant but wealthy patrons.

> Something ails it now; the place is cursed!

The imbecile productions of Mr. Adams and Mr. Mozier, the showy emptiness of Mr. Story and Miss Hosmer, with half a dozen more flourishing manufactories for spoiling marble, are the natural results of that "Rubbish of Rome" under which title contemporary life in the city has been appropriately described.

Mr. Perkins has a few better things to tell of in the interesting chapters which he devotes to Lombardy and Venetia. These districts, like those of the south, contain many specimens of immense historical value, which, however, lie more in the beaten track of travellers than Apulia, and are hence less totally unknown. Milan, possibly at different times the richest city in Italy in sculpture, has gone through two epochs of destruction; that when it was razed by Barbarossa, and that later one, noticed by Mr. Perkins, when the Archbishop Borromeo (like the Bishop of London the other day), reduced what he considered the undue number of its churches. Yet San Ambrogio retains enough to form a museum of early art, whilst the Certosa near Pavia is equally rich in the delicate ornamentation of the early Renaissance. Then follows a long series of names familiar to every intelligent tourist or lover of art—Verona, Vicenza, Padua, Mantua, Bologna, Modena, Ferrara, Venice. Everywhere, indeed, we find that absence of a true conception about sculpture which we have noticed as characteristic of Italy; everywhere it has pursued the same course, passing from the awkward but attractive naiveté, the ignorant earnestness of the "religious" art, so dear to Mr. Ruskin, to the brilliant but baseless decorative exploits of the Renaissance—a style that, in its turn, gives way to that passion for the fantastic and the prosaic into which Italy fell three hundred years ago, and above which she has not hitherto raised herself. So powerful were these adverse influences, that even in the case of men of such extraordinary native vigour and gifts for sculpture as Ricci of Padua, or Verrocchio and Leopardi—the joint authors (for such appears to be the case) of the equestrian Colleone at Venice, or the modeller of that noble bust of the great Andrea which adorns his monument within his native Mantua—their efforts issue only in single pieces of merit, and are incapable of carrying the artists to a series of successful works, much less of influencing their contemporaries. In short, we may say in general that what is good in Italian sculpture is due to the bright impulses of individuals who for a moment broke through the atmosphere of their age; not, as in a healthy state of art, to the prevalence of a good style, carried to its height by individual impulse. This remark applies most completely to the schools dealt with in Mr. Perkins's present volume, although we can hardly credit even the far more excellent sculptors of Tuscany with the knowledge of the true direction of their art, or at least with any consistency in pursuing it. And yet, after all, so much educated labour and natural gift and fineness of invention was bestowed upon Italian sculpture, that it will remain always a subject of intense interest to the lover of art, even whilst he is compelled to read in it the salutary lesson of the inevitable fate which hangs over that art which takes a false direction, and leaves the "main current" for subsidiary channels.

To such students we warmly commend the handsome work which Mr. Perkins's industry and liberality—with little hope of an adequate return—has now completed. It is, truly, one of those few books which should find a place in every library where art is represented.

AMERICAN LITERATURE.

WE have on our list this month two works of a class in which America peculiarly excels; which are executed, for the most part, with greater care and elaboration than any other American books, and the production of which is a characteristic speciality of the national literature. We have repeatedly had to notice the liberality and energy displayed by the State and Federal Governments in promoting scientific and practical investigations into the geographical, climatic, geological, and other natural features of the great Western continent, and particularly of the United States themselves. Expeditions sent out at public expense have explored the rivers of South America, and traversed in every direction the great desert that stretches along the range of the Rocky Mountains, and the course of the Colorado, from Southern California to Utah. One of the most carefully elaborated and most perfect works of travel we have had to notice, illustrated with drawings of extreme interest and admirable execution, appeared in the form of a Report from the Federal officers sent to penetrate that desert, as far as they could, by the waters of the strange river that flows, in many parts, a thousand feet below the level of the surrounding country. At all the military stations in the Far West regular observations of the temperature, atmospheric pressure, rainfall, &c., are taken and transmitted to Washington. No pains are spared to acquire and record all information that may indicate the peculiar character, climate, advantages, and resources of different parts of the country, and assist to direct the enterprise of speculators, the stream of immigration, and the labours of agriculture. Private ability and industry are so actively and constantly employed in the same manner as to prove that the demand for this species of knowledge fully keeps pace with the zeal of the authorities in providing it. Of both public and private works of this class we have before us excellent examples. The third volume of the Report of the scientific gentlemen appointed to make a complete geological survey of the State of Illinois* contains a minute description of the coalfields of that State, and an account of the geology of several counties, tog shells found in various strata, illustrated by a series of elaborately executed plates. The work has been done, and the Report is now published, at the expense of the State, which could hardly lay out its money more obviously and directly to the advantage of its taxpayers.

A far less technical, and to the general reader an infinitely more interesting, work is that entitled the Natural Wealth of California†, in which the geography of the State is carefully explained, with a brief sketch of its history. A minutely detailed description of the different counties, with the peculiar agricultural and mineral characteristics of each, follows; while the latter half of the volume gives an account of the climatic and geological peculiarities of the several regions into which the State is distributed by its physical features, with especial reference to their bearing on agriculture and other industrial pursuits. It is evident from the writer's statements that gold-mining will long continue to constitute one of the most important resources of California, but that it will require science, capital, and organization to render it profitable, and has already ceased to divert the attention of the community at large from more regular pursuits. The advantages which California offers to the farmer are great, and only partially counterbalanced by that want of rain which is the chief trouble of the country. Everything grows twice as fast and twice as big in California as elsewhere. Fruit-trees bear incredible quantities of large and delicious cherries, plums, peaches, oranges, apricots, apples, and pears; strawberries may be gathered all the year round; wheat, in ordinary years, yields an abundant crop, and from the scattered seed of one harvest springs up next year, without care or labour, a "volunteer" crop averaging twenty bushels to the acre. Hops grow luxuriantly, unspoiled by the misfortunes which vex the soul of the Kentish farmer. Dairies are numerous and very profitable, despite the losses by drought in unfavourable years, which a degree of care far less than that required in other countries by the hardiest cattle would entirely avert. But the peculiar and most promising industries of California are those of Southern Europe, the latitude of San Francisco being nearly that of Gibraltar. The silkworm thrives on mulberry-leaves gathered in great profusion and at little cost. The vineyards now occupy some thousands of acres, and produce an annual and increasing vintage of 4,000,000 gallons, the yield per acre being greater than in France. The land is a healthy one, and the climate is never, save in certain exceptional districts, either extremely hot or severely cold; the mean temperature of the several months on the sea-coast ranging from 50° in winter to 65° in summer, and the heat of noon being seldom more than 12° or 15° above that of midnight. In the interior, where the days of summer are hotter, the nights are always cool, and blankets can seldom be dispensed with. The weather is generally very serene, storms are rare, and lightning still rarer, and the "rainy season" of San Francisco is marked by a rainfall not exceeding the average of the year in Westmoreland. Altogether, the book presents an exceedingly attractive, though apparently very fair, picture of Californian life, and can hardly fail to allure the hesitating emigrant.

Mr. Horace Greeley's Recollections of a Busy Life‡, fragmentary and desultory as they are, will interest all readers who care anything or know anything about the political history of America during the last forty years. Of that history the life of Mr. Greeley has been an important part. He was one of the earliest supporters in the press of the Whig party formed during the administration of President Jackson, and including nearly all the opponents of that remarkable and able, if not very judicious or profound statesman. The Whigs held much the same relation to the Federalists that the Republicans did to the Whigs. The Federal party received a death-blow in the defeat of the elder Adams at the close of his first term. That defeat answered, more nearly than those who judge by the practice of late years might suppose, to the ejection of an English Ministry by an adverse verdict on an appeal to the country. The precedent set in the case of Washington, and followed in all subsequent instances down to the time of the younger Adams, had established, in accordance with the purpose of the framers of the Constitution, the idea that, in the absence of reason to the contrary, each President should serve two terms of office; and the refusal to re-elect John Adams was equivalent to a vote of censure on his policy and administration. The Federalists never recovered this disaster, though they continued to act as an organized Opposition under Jefferson, Madison, and Monroe. Their final dissolution may be considered as having taken place at the second election of the last-named President; and the Democratic party was practically unopposed, until the contest between Clay and Jackson rallied round the former the scattered enemies of the dominant faction. The numbers and power of the Whigs were greatly increased by the personal defects of the President, and by his high-handed and imperious policy. But their strongest bond of union was a sectional one. In this respect they differed from the Federalists even more than the Republicans differed from them. The Federalists, though stronger in the North than in the South, hoisted no sectional colours and avowed no sectional purposes. The Whigs, though not exclusively a Northern party, did include, among their grounds of opposition to the Democrats, a decided preference for Northern views and Northern interests, hostility to the extension of slavery, and very strong Protectionist leanings. Mr. Greeley belonged to the extreme Northern wing of the Whigs; a Republican before Republicanism became a party platform. His Protectionism was more thoroughgoing and more extravagant than that of the majority of his party—far more so than that of his leader, Henry Clay, who was the author of the Compromise Tariff by which the violent resistance of South Carolina was appeased, and the Nullification quarrel arranged. He was also, from the first, a political Abolitionist. He did not share the extreme ideas of those impracticable but honest fanatics who, like Garrison, looked upon slavery as a crime and an abomination with which no terms were to be kept, and which was to be assailed without regard to constitutional obligations or public law. He distinctly admits, in the present volume, that the North had, before the war, no more right to meddle with slavery in the Slave States than with "drunkenness in Canada, or polygamy in Turkey." His hostility to it was limited to a resolute determination to exclude it from the Territories, and to resist the execution of all laws for the rendition of fugitive slaves. He does not attempt to explain how he reconciled an obstinate disobedience to the Constitution on this point with the oath which he must repeatedly have taken to uphold it; nor does he appear to have the least notion that the South might fairly complain of her exclusion from the common possessions of the Union, and insist upon the right of her laws and institutions to perfectly equal treatment at the hands of the Federal Government. His views on this point led him further than most of his associates were prepared to go, and kept him constantly in advance, first of the Whigs, and then of the Republican party, formed about 1856, by the union of all the remnants of the Whig, American, and other anti-Democratic and anti-Southern elements. Down to the outbreak of the war he was regarded, even by his allies, as an extreme and dangerous man. But he was averse to war. He insisted that the South was not really Secessionist—an opinion which the unanimous and desperate adherence of the entire people to the Confederate Government has not yet taught him to abandon—and he refused to recognise the announcement of the national will through any other form than that of a direct popular vote; but he argued that, if such a vote were passed by any of the States, the Union should let them go in peace. When Fort Sumter fell, he, like other Northern men of like views, changed his tone, and, refusing to recognise the plain fact that the Southern Government was forced into that attack, threw the responsibility of war upon the Confederates. But, when the war was over, he had the courage to acknowledge that it had been war, and not rebellion only, and to give practical effect to his doctrine by offering himself as bail for Mr. Davis. A paper in which he justifies this act is inserted in the present work. His arguments are, first, that a Power which has levied a regular army and fought a pitched battle is thereby excepted from the category of rebels, and assumes the rights of a belligerent or quasi-national Government, so far at least as to exempt its adherents from the personal penalties of treason; secondly, that a Government which has treated with its antagonists in a civil war, and exchanged prisoners under regular cartel, is thereafter precluded from dealing with them as mere rebels when victory declares on its side; that defeat does not convert those who were yesterday enemies, enjoying all the privileges of war, into criminals and traitors; and finally, that the long detention of Mr. Davis was unconstitutional and illegal in the first place, and cruel and discreditable in the second; that his trial was postponed simply because there was no chance whatever of a conviction, unless a jury were packed for the purpose; and that, under such circumstances, he was absolutely entitled to his release. Few Englishmen will think that such a vindication was required for what was here generally considered as the noblest act of Mr. Greeley's life. Apart from mere politics, the sketches, slight as they are, of the different public men with whom the autobiographist was brought into contact—and particularly of Clay, Webster, Calhoun, and Lincoln—will be generally interesting to English readers. Not less acceptable will be the simple narrative of Mr. Greeley's own early life; the hardships of his boyhood as the son of a labourer in Connecticut; his struggles, labours, and endurance as a printer's apprentice; the long series of disappointments, disasters, and losses which attended his repeated attempts to set up in business on his own account, and the various unsuccessful or temporary newspapers with which he was connected before the establishment of the Tribune. There is very little of the ordinary fanatic about Mr. Greeley. He has sufficient obstinacy, exaggeration, and self-confidence for the character; he seems, too, to have just that imperfect degree of knowledge, and that one-sidedness of judgment, which are necessary to fanaticism; and he clings to various prejudices, personal, social, and political, with something like fanatical vehemence; but the genial temper, the appreciation of humour, and the incapacity of wilful injustice or persevering hatred, which are perceptible in every page of his writings, have saved him from the fate to which his eccentric notions, and his obstinate adherence to them, would otherwise have conducted him. The impression left upon the reader is that of a man who would learn to like even his political enemies, if he knew them, and whom even his political enemies could hardly help liking.

An Introduction to English Literature, by Mr. Day*, contains a great deal that might safely be recommended to the use of young students in this country, as well as in America, who wish to acquire some notion of the history and development of their mother tongue and of its literature, without having leisure to give to so difficult a subject the complete and protracted investigation it deserves, or opportunity to make themselves acquainted with the authorities at first hand. The specimens of English literature in prose and verse which occupy the greater portion of the volume extend over nearly the whole range of what is commonly called English, as distinguished from what is popularly known as Anglo-Saxon literature—from "Piers Ploughman" and Chaucer down to Tennyson and Longfellow. There is, however, a regrettable gap of 150 years, from Chaucer to Spenser, which creates a hiatus in the work even in the aspect in which its author meant it to be regarded, i.e. not as an anthology, but as an elementary history of the language, illustrated by specimens from the principal authors of different periods. The latter portion of the work consists of chapters on the origin and distinctive character of languages in general, and of the English tongue in particular; on its derivations, its grammar, accentuation, prosody, and so forth; in which the writer has had free recourse to Professor Müller and other recent authorities. To the more earnest student this book may serve as an introduction to their works, while the ordinary reader may find it in some sort a substitute for a more elaborate course of study than he has leisure or inclination to pursue.

The second volume of Dr. Beardsley's History of the Episcopal Church in Connecticut † takes up the story of the Church's fortunes at the moment of the final separation from the Mother-country, and brings it down to the present times. It is not without instructive lessons for many of those who, without much knowledge or care about the facts, refer to colonial and American Churches as bright examples of the prospects of a Church set free from State trammels; and the case of Ammi Rogers, related at considerable length, shows how difficult it is for such a Church to enforce its jurisdiction over refractory clergymen, and how much more troublesome and less effective than is commonly supposed is an appeal by such a Church to the intervention of the Common Law Courts.

An elegant and pretentious volume, with copious illustrations, gives a description and history of the Central Park of New York City ‡; a place of retirement and recreation, in the midst of the commercial metropolis of America, laid out with much greater elaboration and at greater expense than our own parks, and differing from them much as the work of a landscape-gardener differs from an ordinary rural park in England.

Plain Thoughts on the Art of Living § is more aptly described by its title than most works of the kind are. The "art of living"—the arts of spending life pleasantly and respectably, and holding a good position in society, of friendly intercourse with neighbours, and of domestic comfort and happiness—really form the principal subject of the "thoughts" set forth in a series of chapters on various themes, from "dress" and "manners" to "marriage"; and if the thoughts are generally obvious and commonplace, they are tolerably just and wholesome.

Of fiction and poetry we have, as usual, a considerable quantity. Fair Play ‖ is the title of a story by Mrs. E. D. E. N. Southworth, of which the subject is Woman's Rights, and the title of which is vindicated by the introduction of a Southern cruiser, obviously intended for the Alabama, whose captain avows it to be his practice to sink captured ships "with their crews." Probably only an American and a female writer could have imagined that even the license of fiction excused so foul and unfounded a slander as this. Cape Cod and All along Shore ¶, by Charles Nordhoff, is a volume of reprints, most of which are tolerably interesting, and written in a lively style and genial spirit. The King's Lily and Rosebud  is a graceful but rather inane fairy tale; and the Flower and the Star †† is a little collection children's stories, not, certainly, objectionable on the score of excess of life or excitement. No Love Lost * is a story told in letters mostly dated from Venice, and written in that Homeric hexameter which some critics declare to be readable and even poetical when skilfully employed, but which is universally admitted, in clumsy hands, to be utterly intolerable.

A Schiller Gallery †, containing descriptions and portraits of all the principal characters in the Robbers and the other works of the great poet, celebrates the centenary anniversary of his birth, and makes a graceful ornament for a drawing-room table. The Album of Languages ‡—a work treating more or less superficially of the characters and relations of some hundred different tongues, and illustrated by translations of the Lord's Prayer in each—is fitted, by its size, its beauty, its binding, and its gilding, for a similar use, and utterly unfit for the shelves of a library or the desk of a student. Why such a work should have been produced in such a form it passes our wit to conjecture.

MR. GLADSTONE'S SCHEME.

THE eager expectation with which the introduction of the Irish Church Bill by Mr. GLADSTONE was awaited was amply rewarded. As a mere piece of oratorical composition, his speech was universally acknowledged to have been one of the greatest triumphs which this generation has witnessed in the House of Commons. Nothing could have been more clear, more aptly arranged, more comprehensive, or with a better distribution of materials, than his statement. He was thoroughly in his element, and he has been so long out of his element while baited and vexed in the Reform debates, and while carried away by his own volubility in his career of stumping, that it almost comes as a novelty to find once more that, when in his element, he is among the very first speakers that have ever addressed an English Parliament. When he has to deal with an enormous array of figures, to address a vast variety of interests, to introduce ingenious novelties, and to weave in bits of not inappropriate sentiment, he shows himself a real master of Parliamentary oratory. His speech on Monday was like a Budget speech on a grander scale, and with a much wider interest. The effect of the speech, apart from the scheme it introduced, is by no means unimportant. It stamps upon the memory of a public which in recent years has had to listen to much criticism on Mr. GLADSTONE—which, if often exaggerated, has yet in the main been just criticism—why it is that, in spite of everything that can be said against him, he holds so commanding a place in general estimation. But the merits of the speech would have been very quickly forgotten if the merits of the scheme had not also been incontestable. The credit of having devised such a scheme, so bold in its general outline and yet so carefully considered and so ingenious in its details, belongs of course, not only to Mr. GLADSTONE, but to the Cabinet. That a Government so recently come into office, having to do with so much matter absolutely new, and with so many puzzles to solve in a short space of time, should have produced this scheme, gives a very high idea of the intellectual strength which resides in the leading minds of the Cabinet. The remarkable feature of the scheme is that there is no crudity in it, no noticeable blunders or omissions, no shirking of difficulties, no vague, tentative, half-and-half legislation. It forms a consistent whole. The whole may be condemned as bad or as founded on a wrong principle, but if the main character of the scheme is once accepted as good, then the details so cohere together, and everything in it is worked out so completely, that the scheme cannot bear much addition or alteration without being spoilt. It is in fact like a good Budget made in a time of great economical change, when every part of the contemplated remission or imposition of taxes and duties so dovetails into the other parts that the Budget must be taken or rejected as a whole. Evidently this is the impression which Mr. GLADSTONE's scheme has made on Mr. DISRAELI. After considering its provisions, he has come to the conclusion that the only thing to be done with the Bill is to oppose the second reading. When once the House of Commons has placed beyond dispute that the principle of the Bill is to be accepted, the acceptance of this particular scheme for carrying out that principle becomes almost a matter of course. Changes will be made in Committee, but they will probably be in those very minor matters which do not practically affect the character of the scheme. The success with which the Cabinet has done its preliminary work gives a hope that we shall really get rid of this wearisome question of the Irish Church once for all within the limits of the present Session; and if this is so, we may invite the world to notice that Parliamentary institutions, which are always said to be on their trial, will have come out of this particular trial in a most happy and encouraging manner.

The two great successes of the scheme, each of which shows great felicity of contrivance, great originality, and great political tact, are the creation of the Church Representative Body and the destination of the surplus. That there must be some body created to represent the Church was obvious; but it was by no means obvious to hit upon the three peculiarities of this part of the Government plan—that the nature of this body should be wholly unknown now, so that the time of Parliament shall not be wasted in settling the squabbles of clerical parties, that the members of the Irish Church shall find themselves irresistibly impelled to create such a body within a given number of months after the passing of the Act, and that the Government, while having none of the trouble of creating it, retains a control over its formation by reserving the right to decide whether it is truly representative. The destination of the surplus, which was always said to constitute the main difficulty of the scheme, is so adroitly managed that there is probably no part of the scheme that will meet with less opposition. The expenditure of the money on works of mercy has a sort of semi-religious sound about it which may comfort those who object to the utter secularization of Church property; it will benefit the poor only, Irish people only, and the only class of poor who would not be demoralized by having money laid out in large sums for their benefit. Fond as they are of jobbery, not even Irishmen will turn blind or mad to profit by the spoils of the Irish Church. And then even those who most dislike it must own that the scheme is a very clever scheme in the subtle and delicate way in which it tempts—or, as Sir STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said at the Middlesex banquet on Wednesday, bribes—people of all kinds to agree to it. There are little bribes held out to everyone. The disestablished Church is left perfectly free from State control, and has unlimited power to adopt any doctrine or any heresy it likes. This will be satisfactory to those who wish to see the Church invested with this sort of plenary power; while those who wish for a strong lay element in the governing body of the Church will reflect with pleasure that a Cabinet of laymen will decide whether the laity are properly represented. Then the Church is to be allowed to keep all its private endowments and all its churches. By the ingenious fiction of pronouncing the glebe-houses unmarketable, it will also get these valuable houses for next to nothing, while in deference to rigid equity it seems to be stripped of them. The Representative Body of the Church will also be pleased at the ease with which new endowments may be formed by the surrender of the capitalized value of the annuities of incumbents to the Representative Body, and the incumbent will enjoy the double opportunity of forwarding the good work and of making a good bargain for himself. The curates must own they have been handsomely provided for, and even temporary curates may hope for a gratuity. Then the landlords cannot be indifferent to the offer to let the tithe rent-charge cease altogether in forty-five years, and they may be thankful for the subtlety—or, as enemies will call it, the sleight of hand—of the PRIME MINISTER, who saw how this could be done by a mere dexterous manipulation of accounts. The tenants are still more benefited by the Bill, for they will all get off paying most of what they now pay to the county cess, and some lucky ones among them will be allowed to buy up the Church land with funds almost entirely supplied for them by the Government, which, as Mr. GLADSTONE said, in a vein of thought delightful to all Irish tenants, may afford a happy opportunity of trying the experiment of breaking up large properties. The British taxpayer, who for the first time in his existence finds himself advantageously remembered in an Irish scheme, will be saved no less than 70,000*l.* a year which he now pays to the Irish Presbyterians and Catholics. Nor are these adversaries of the Establishment without a special bonus. Not only will they see their rival reduced to their own level, but they get between them something over a million sterling in ready money out of that rival's funds. Certainly it is not for them to grumble, and the scheme has so many attractions for different sets of people, or, as the Conservatives would say, the bribery has been done so equally all round, that the opposition to the scheme is likely to grow fainter and fainter as soon as disestablishment and disendowment are once a recognised necessity, as they already are recognised practically to be perfectly inevitable.

The only objections which, so far as we can find, have hitherto been made to the details of the scheme by its adversaries, refer to the proposed treatment of the claims of the Presbyterians and of the Catholics. These objections are twofold. The amount to be given in compensation for the cessation of the Regium Donum and of the grant to Maynooth is said to be too large; and, secondly, it is said that this amount is to be paid out of a fund which ought not to be burdened with it. The facts are these. By far the larger portion of the compensation fund to be given in lieu of the Regium Donum is to be applied in payment of life annuities to Presbyterian ministers and professors, exactly on the same principle as annuities are to be given to incumbents and permanent curates of the present Established Church. So far the two communities are treated exactly alike, and no cause of complaint arises. But in the grant of the various sums making up the Regium Donum there are two items—one for payment made to a Widows' Fund, and the other for certain incidental expenses of the Belfast College. Mr. GLADSTONE proposes to give fourteen times the annual amount of these two grants as a compensation for their discontinuance. The yearly grant to Maynooth has always been made to trustees, and Parliament has never watched over its application, or seen what part goes to what individual. This annual grant Mr. GLADSTONE also proposes to discontinue, and to give in compensation fourteen times its amount. The objection urged is that this is too much. The income of the Irish Church is about 700,000*l.* a year, and about seven millions sterling will be payable in compensation for disendowment; so that the Church will receive only ten times its annual income in compensation, while the Roman Catholics of Maynooth and some Presbyterians will receive fourteen years' income by way of compensation. Equality demands that these fourteen years shall be cut down to ten. Mr. GLADSTONE acknowledges this, but he starts the theory that compensation given to places of education ought to be higher than compensation given to ecclesiastical bodies, because the world is more ready to pay priests and ministers than to contribute to institutions for training them. This is true as a matter of fact, but whether it constitutes a good reason for giving Maynooth fourteen times its annual grant is a very difficult question; and Mr. GLADSTONE appealed to an argument which would come home much more to many of his hearers when he said that another Session he should deal with Trinity College, Dublin, and that therefore it might be worth while for his critics to consider whether the theory he had started in favour of Maynooth might not be conveniently recognised in the interests of the great Protestant institution. The other objection is, that the sum of eleven hundred thousand pounds to be paid in compensation to the Presbyterians and Catholics is to be taken from a wrong source. Mr. GLADSTONE proposes to take it out of the property of the disendowed Church, and it is said that this is a violation of his pledge not to apply the funds of the Church in favour of any other religious body. But it must be remembered that this sum must be paid by some one. No one contests that if the Regium Donum and the Maynooth Grant cease, a compensation, amounting to at least a million sterling, must be paid. The only question is, who is to pay it? If it is not taken out of the funds of the Irish Church, the British taxpayer must pay it; if the British taxpayer does pay it, there will be no gain whatever to the Irish Church, but there will be a million more to spend on works of mercy in Ireland. Why should we in England or Scotland tax ourselves to give more lunatic asylums to the Irish, when we have every reason to suppose they will have many more and much better asylums than we have got? The debate is really not one between Catholics and Protestants, or between Episcopalians and Nonconformists, but between British taxpayers and the payers of the Irish County Cess. The British taxpayers certainly seem at first sight to have the best claim to consideration.

AMERICAN FEELING TOWARDS ENGLAND.

THE task of replying to expressions of American animosity, however wearisome and painful, ought perhaps not to be abandoned as utterly useless. It is, indeed, idle to appeal directly to the candour of a population which has for several generations been educated in a perverse hatred of England; but simple statements of the truth, addressed to Englishmen who may not have sufficiently studied the nature of the quarrel, may perhaps find a hearing from those Americans who would not willingly be guilty of injustice. The failure of Mr. REVERDY JOHNSON'S amiable fictions, and of the fulsome professions which echoed his assurances of friendship, ought to cause neither surprise nor regret. Resentment can only be aggravated by the affected belief that it is non-existent or insincere. The people of the United States were irritated by Mr. JOHNSON'S misrepresentation of their feelings, and they were at the same time encouraged by the undignified eagerness which responded to his overtures. No fresh offence has been offered since all American parties were willing to negotiate for the settlement of the claims arising out of the war; yet the Senate has contumeliously abstained from even taking into consideration the treaty which six months ago it prospectively regarded as expedient and just. The less pugnacious class of politicians have at last convinced themselves that it is a hopeless undertaking to contend against a national determination to perpetuate hatred. The well known and able "Yankee" Correspondent of the Spectator confesses, in a curiously characteristic letter, that, in spite of his own supposed endeavours, there is no hope of a speedy settlement of the grave questions in dispute between the two countries. He also admits that "the reason of this is an unwillingness on the part of the "people here to settle those questions unless on terms the "acceptance of which by the British people is impossible, "without a display of magnanimity on their part of which it "would be hard to find a parallel in history." The term "pusillanimity" would have been more appropriate to an imaginary submission which has certainly no parallel in the history of a powerful and independent nation. It was not until the defence of the fortress had become impossible that the citizens of Calais went out in their shirts to meet the conqueror with halters round their necks. The writer with perfect truth avows that the Alabama claims form but a trifling item in the charges against England. It is not at all certain that an agreement to refer the recognition of belligerency to arbitration would satisfy the appetite of the people of the United States for the humiliation of a rival. Perhaps an unqualified admission that the recognition was wrongful might for the moment appease a rancorous hostility; but few advocates of the American claim have remembered that in crouching to one Power the English Government, while it disgraced itself, would offer an unjustifiable affront to nearly every State in Europe. France recognised the belligerent rights of the Confederacy on the same day with England, in terms which had been settled in concert; and within two or three weeks every maritime Power, including Russia, pledged itself to approval of English policy by adopting the same decision. The French Government more especially would have a just right to complain of a confession on the part of England that both nations committed either a wrong or a doubtful act requiring the judgment of an arbitrator. The Government of the United States virtually admits the injustice of the claim upon England by not preferring it against France.

The calm and accomplished "Yankee" seems to be as incapable as the most ignorant of his countrymen of understanding the grounds on which the recognition is justified. Notwithstanding the full explanations which have been given, he still fails to perceive that the establishment of a blockade was, as the Supreme Court declared, conclusive evidence of belligerency. In other countries private disputants generally submit to the decision of the proper tribunals on purely legal questions; but by an American the judgment of the Supreme Court "is not regarded as having any bearing on the question." The blockade is confused with the occasional determination of a Government to close the ports of an insurgent district, although such a measure would not justify the capture on the high seas of vessels bringing munitions of war to the insurgents. Mr. LINCOLN and Mr. SEWARD preferred for this reason a legal blockade, with all its international consequences. The Supreme Court has ruled that the war had already commenced at the time when the European Governments acted on the same assumption. It may, indeed, be plausibly argued that there was no necessity for immediate action, and that the recognition would have been more courteous, though not more indisputably legal, if it had been postponed at least until the arrival of Mr. ADAMS. If all that afterwards happened could have been accurately foreseen, the English Government might perhaps, at the expense of much practical inconvenience, have been disposed to humour American susceptibility by a short delay; but, when the QUEEN'S Proclamation was issued, no greater doubt was entertained of the existence of a regular war than if the combatants had been Austria and Prussia. No step was ever taken in more perfect good faith, or with less thought of injury or affront to the State which has since grieved. The harbours of the Confederacy along a coast of three thousand miles in length were, with few exceptions, in the power of the seceding Government; and it had already been announced that Confederate cruisers would receive commissions or letters of marque. Half the officers of the Federal navy declared that their allegiance was due to States included in the Confederacy, and it was believed that the commercial marine of the North would be exposed to formidable attacks. The English Admiral on the West India station urgently pressed for orders by which he might regulate his conduct in dealing with the Confederate flag. At the time seven States, which had always asserted their own sovereignty, had combined to form the Confederation, and three or four other States were on the point of joining them. The leaders of all American parties had repeatedly asserted that secession was lawful, or at least that there was no power by which it could be prevented. The late President of the United States had professed the same opinion; Mr. GREELEY, the most conspicuous private member of the Republican party, openly advocated the theoretical right of secession; and General SCOTT, Commander-in-Chief of the army, declared that forcible reclamation was both impossible and unjust. Finally, the Government itself had formally declared that, if the Southern States seceded, they could not be recovered by conquest. The law of the case has never been authoritatively laid down, and the practical controversy has been decided by events. The English Government saw no further than the American people; and it afterwards discovered with unfeigned surprise that its neutrality had been misrepresented as partisanship.

During the whole of the contest, the Government, the leader of the Opposition, and both Houses of Parliament carefully abstained from even verbal interference. A young member who at an early period of the civil war rashly asserted that Republicanism had broken down was immediately checked by Lord JOHN RUSSELL, then the leader of the Government in the House of Commons. Mr. ROEBUCK failed to induce the House to express any opinion which could give offence to the Federal Government, and in the House of Lords the cause of Southern independence was left to the solitary advocacy of Lord CAMPBELL, who, in current American phrase is expanded into the British aristocracy. It is unworthy of a great nation, which perpetually boasts of its greatness, to complain of the partial cheers which once greeted Mr. LAIRD, or of the unfriendly language of two or three Peers and as many Commoners. A year and a half ago the House of Representatives unanimously voted for the abolition of the principal rules of international law, on the proposal of Mr. BANKS, who in an elaborate speech described England as the enemy of the United States. Mr. COLFAX, as Speaker, formally welcomed the representatives of the Fenian rebels on the floor of the House; and within three or four weeks the Mayor of New York had presided at a meeting called to urge the Government to declare war against England. One of the deputies chosen to convey the request to Washington was the same Mr. HORACE GREELEY who subscribed twenty years ago to the expenses of SMITH O'BRIEN's rebellion. The House of Representatives has unanimously passed a vote of sympathy with the rebels in Cuba, and it has prospectively authorized the PRESIDENT to recognise the independence of the island, as soon as a de facto Government is formed. It is wonderful that intelligent Americans nevertheless affect to think their country aggrieved by the recognition, not of independence, but of belligerency, accorded to the Confederate Government, at a time when it held undisputed possession of one half of the territory of the United States. English writers, and a few newspaper correspondents during the war, have perhaps given some provocation to sensitive Americans; but the journals of the United States have for many years scarcely deviated into a single expression of courtesy or good feeling to England. Their correspondents in this country make it their business to collect details of pauperism or crime as indications of the social character of the community. The Correspondent of the New York Tribune lately threatened Englishmen with the vengeance of his fellow-citizens because they had received Mr. REVERDY JOHNSON with civility, on the not unreasonable assumption that his credentials were genuine. The Correspondent of the New York Times for many months scarcely wrote a letter without the assurance that Americans might indulge in any insult or outrage, because it was impossible to "kick England into a war." The "Yankee" himself seems to think that the ancient animosity of his countrymen is justified by the War of Independence and by the war of 1812. No equally intelligent citizen of any other country would think that resentment ought to survive war for thirty or for fifty years. It is absurd to complain that in the eighteenth century the English Government refused to relinquish a large part of its dominions without a struggle, and the successful colonists might well have been contented with the retribution which followed on a few political blunders. They contrived to involve England in war with France and Spain and Holland, and bring her to the verge of a rupture with Russia, Prussia, and Sweden. The Stamp Acts and the consignments of tea to Boston were amply avenged; but unfortunately the Americans were afterwards determined to confine their studies to their own history, which contained scarcely any event except the quarrel with England. In 1812 Mr. MONROE forced England into a war at the very crisis of the great struggle with NAPOLEON; and consequently the flower of the Peninsular army was wasting its time beyond the Atlantic, while recruits and doubtful auxiliaries were fighting at Waterloo. The "Yankee" credits his countrymen with generosity on the inaccurate assumption that in 1860 they were beginning to forgive the quarrel which they had fastened upon England in 1812. It is not worth while to dilate on the extravagance of such a pretext for the hostile feeling which had caused the dismissal of the English Minister from Washington in the middle of the Crimean war. The feelings and language of former times are only exaggerated in the denunciations of the policy of England during the civil war. At a future time perhaps some American speaker or writer, after a dispassionate inquiry into the merits of the case, will have the courage to rebuke the obstinate injustice of popular opinion.

THE IRISH CHURCH BILL.

IN introducing his Bill, Mr. GLADSTONE invited his hearers to observe that the key to the comprehension of its provisions was to keep in view three distinct periods of time. First, there is the period from the passing of the Act until the 1st of January, 1871. Then there is the period of ten years from the 1st of January, 1871, to the 1st of January, 1881. And, lastly, there is such an undefined period after the 1st of January, 1881, as may be found necessary to bring the dealings of the State with the Irish Church to a final close. We propose to state briefly the principal events, transactions, and arrangements by which each of these periods is to be marked. The main character of the first period is that it is of an introductory and preparatory kind. A Commission, to be appointed by the Crown, is, immediately on the passing of the Act, to enter into the technical ownership of all the temporalities of the Irish Church, and to assume the office and functions of the present Ecclesiastical Commission, which is to be dissolved. If any archbishopric or bishopric falls vacant during this preparatory period, the Crown will fill up the vacancy, should the Irish Bishops wish it to be filled up, but the person selected will hold his office subject to the provisions of the Act, and will have no claim to sit in the House of Lords. In the same way any incumbency will be filled up by the person having the right to appoint, but the new incumbent will hold his incumbency subject to the provisions of the Act. The State being represented by the Commission, the Church may, if it pleases, constitute for itself a Representative Body during this initiatory period, and all that the State will require is that this body shall be one fairly representing the bishops, the clergy, and the laity. By the end of the period it is assumed that the State and the Church will each be represented by a body duly qualified to act for them, and thus that it will be possible at the opening of the second period to make the necessary bargains between the Church and the State. Immediately that the second period begins—that is, from and after the 1st of January, 1871—the Irish Church will be forthwith disestablished. Irish Archbishops and Bishops will cease to sit in the House of Lords. The Ecclesiastical Courts and all ecclesiastical jurisdiction and law will cease to have legal existence, the Crown will present to no more bishoprics or incumbencies, the rights of private patronage will cease, and, subject to life interests, there will be no freeholds in any of the temporalities of the Church. The Representative Body will make such appointments in such way and on such terms as it pleases, and although, until this body chooses to make any alterations, the law will assume that the members of the new voluntary community are bound by the existing doctrines and rules of the Church, yet the Representative Body will be at full liberty to make any changes it pleases, to remodel its discipline, and to add to, change, or discard any of its doctrines. If, for example, this Representative Body chose to do away with bishops altogether, the voluntary communion would retain its existence and its property, although its whole character as an Episcopal Church would be gone.

Disestablishment is thus made absolutely complete from the 1st of January, 1871, and the much more complex work of disendowment, which is to last over the second period of ten years, is to begin. Disendowment means taking away the property of ecclesiastical corporations sole or aggregate, or of bodies or persons holding property for the benefit of the Church; and two questions may be asked—On what terms shall this property be taken away, and how much of it shall be taken away? The answer to the first question is that no person having a life interest shall be prejudiced; and the answer to the second question is that all the property of the Church shall be taken from it which does not come under one of two heads—namely, property given from private sources to the Church since 1660, or property of no marketable value. Every bishop, incumbent, and permanent curate—that is, every curate who shall have been serving as curate within two years before the 1st January, 1871, and whose engagement is, in the opinion of the Commissioners, of a permanent character—shall receive from the State an annuity for life equal to the clear yearly sum he has been receiving formerly, and all curates holding temporary engagements are to receive a gratuity. Exactly in the same way all laymen holding semi-ecclesiastical offices, like clerks and sextons, and the officials of the Ecclesiastical Courts, are to receive annuities or gratuities, according as they hold their offices permanently or not, and the owners of advowsons are to receive their value. But it is a great object to tempt the holders of these life annuities to close their relations with the State as soon as possible; and they may, if they please, ask that the estimated value of their annuity shall be paid to the Church Representative Body, with which body they will make their own terms; and as this body will be glad to get funds which it can retain permanently for its own purposes, it will probably give the annuitant a rather larger annuity than the State has guaranteed him. The private endowments of the Church made since 1660—an epoch chosen because it was then first made certain that the Irish and the English Churches held the same doctrine—are to pass without deduction to the Representative Body, and this body is also to take over as much of the non-marketable property of the Church as it pleases. Under this head are placed the churches, and the schools and burial-grounds thereto attached. If there are any churches which the Representative Body does not wish for, the Commissioners will pull them down, and sell the materials, while a special grant is to be made to aid in the maintenance of a few churches of national interest. The glebe-houses, if there is no building charge on them, are also treated as of no marketable value, but the land on which they stand is treated as being worth something; and the Representative Body, if it wants the glebe-house, must pay to the Commission the value of the land on which it stands. With some apparent inconsistency, glebe-houses on which there is a building charge are treated so far as of marketable value that the Representative Body, if wishes for them, must either pay off the building charge, or must buy the glebe-house at twelve years' purchase of its value as a tenement.

All the property of the Church which is not a private endowment and is of a marketable value is to be taken away from it. This property consists in some small degree of sums invested in the Funds or in perpetual rent-charges, but mainly of land and of tithe rent-charges. The land is to be sold, and the tenants who now hold it will not only have a right of pre-emption, but will have money lent them by the State to buy it with. The tithe rent-charge is virtually to be paid for forty-five years, and then to cease for ever. If, indeed, a landlord never chose to relieve himself from paying it, he and his successors would be liable to pay it for ever; but all he has got to do is to borrow its capitalized value from the State, which in forty-five years will consider itself paid off; or, if he likes, he may himself redeem it at twenty-two and a-half years' purchase. Thus the value of the land and of the tithe rent-charges will be almost immediately represented by money in the hands of the Commission. Before the ten years of the second period have elapsed, it is probable that the Commission will have got in almost all its receipts and made most of its payments. It will have sold its land and received the capitalized value of the rent-charges; it will have got the value of the land on which the glebe-houses stand, and a larger payment where there is a building charge; it will have bought up most of the annuities granted for life to bishops, incumbents, and others; it will have given its gratuities; it will have purchased all private advowsons; it will have handed over the churches that are wanted, and sold the materials of those that are not wanted. It will have made its grants towards the maintenance of national monuments. It will have disposed of the burial-grounds; and, lastly, it will have paid the sums to be given in compensation for the cessation of the present annual grants to the Presbyterians and to Maynooth. The Regium Donum now comes to something a little short of 50,000*l.* a year, while the trustees of Maynooth receive 26,000*l.* a year. The Presbyterians are to be treated much like the Episcopalians. Their ministers, assistant-ministers, professors, and all others holding permanent offices, are to receive annuities for life equal to what they get at present, provided that they continue to discharge their duties; while the sum now given annually in aid of the Widows' Fund, and of the incidental expenses of Belfast College, is to be represented by fourteen times the yearly amount paid down once for all, and a further sum is to be given in aid of the College buildings. The trustees of Maynooth are to receive in a sum down fourteen times the amount they now receive every year, and a debt they have incurred to the State for College buildings is to be remitted. By 1881 the Commission will thus have wound up its affairs, except so far as there may still be annuitants who have not capitalized their annuities, and landlords who have not chosen to borrow the purchase-money of their rent-charges. But it is obvious that both these outgoings and incomings might easily have their capitalized value fixed, so that the Commission could buy Government annuities, and sell the rent-charges, if it can be supposed that any rent-charges could then be existing excepting on the forty-five years' footing. The Commission would thus find itself at the beginning of 1881 with a large sum of money in hand, which would represent the net proceeds of the disendowment of the Irish Church, and which would then be applicable to the purposes to which this surplus is destined by the Bill. It might happen that some portion of this residue would be in hand sooner, and the Commission is not bound to wait till 1881, but might apply it to the destined purposes whenever there could be no doubt that it was part of a clear residue.

This clear residue is estimated by Mr. GLADSTONE as something between seven and eight millions, the whole value of the property of the Irish Church being taken at sixteen millions, and a little more than half being needed for compensations and necessary outgoings. These seven millions and a-half are, in the language of the Act, to be applied for the advantage of the Irish people, but not for the maintenance of any Church or clergy, or other ministry, nor for the teaching of religion. It is unavoidable calamity and suffering that the spoils of the Irish Church are destined to relieve, yet not so as to cancel or impair the obligation now attached to property under the Acts for the relief of the poor. The support of lunatic asylums will absorb about half the money, and the other half will be devoted to the maintenance of infirmaries and hospitals, to aiding reformatory and industrial schools, to providing the poor with trained nurses, to educating and maintaining the blind and the deaf and dumb in separate asylums, and to maintaining idiots and other persons of weak intellect not requiring to be kept under restraint. The burden of providing for these works of mercy, so far as they are now provided for at all, falls on the county cess, which is paid by the occupier, not the landlord, and is exacted from occupiers, however small may be their means. The poorer class of Irishmen would thus benefit by the disendowment of the Irish Church, not only by having their lunatic, their blind, deaf and dumb, and idiotic friends kept in the most splendid asylums they could wish for, by having good nurses at hand, reformatory schools ready for their naughty children and industrial schools for their clever children, but by having more cash left in their pockets, and by being relieved from a vexatious and increasing impost. Mr. GLADSTONE even went further, and promised that they should only pay half of the county cess that might remain to be paid after the diminution effected by the contemplated application of the surplus property of the Irish Church had been made. The other half is to be paid by the landlord. This, however, does not form part of the present Bill, and was probably only mentioned by Mr. GLADSTONE because, as he had mentioned the poor Irish occupiers, he naturally wished to show what a good friend he was to them. The general result of the Bill may then be said to be that in 1871 disestablishment will be complete, and the Irish Church will be a voluntary communion governed by a Representative Body having the most ample powers; and that in 1881 disendowment will be complete, and that thenceforth an annual sum of 310,000*l.*, representing the net proceeds of disendowment, will be applied to works of mercy in Ireland.

RAILWAY PROPERTY.

THE moderate improvement of the condition of railway property within the past year is satisfactory, and not at all mysterious. In some parts of the country the traffic is increasing, and the panic which commenced in 1866 is at last subsiding. Although shareholders have suffered heavy losses, the issue of a severe trial has proved that nearly all the great Companies are thoroughly solvent. With two or three exceptions, all railways have continued to pay the interest on their debt; and consequently the rate, which had risen to the amount of one-half, or even one per cent. on the principal, has now generally relapsed to its former level. The clamour of ignorant and interested railway theorists has worn itself out with the alarm which it tended to foster. The most credulous of shareholders would now close his ears to a demonstration that permanent improvements or extensions of a railway ought to be paid for out of revenue. The Court of Chancery alone, for some inscrutable reason, confers on speculators, at the trifling cost of a few shares, a right of litigation which enables them to depreciate at their own pleasure the value of the entire corporate property. The mischievous effects of uncertainty and of misrepresentation have but recently ceased to operate, and it is only since the beginning of the present year that the price of shares has begun to rise from its lowest point of depression. The improvement within two months, amounting on an average to about three per cent., will probably be confirmed or increased by the results of the general meetings. The stoppage of payment by the Chatham Company, in consequence of inability to renew debentures, indicated the existence of a risk which had been entirely overlooked. Scarcely any Company could have dealt with the principal of its debt, however ample might be the margin of revenue after providing for the interest; and Boards of Directors have, since 1866, steadily endeavoured to substitute an irredeemable stock for the old system of temporary loans. It is surprising that, after the suspension of the Chatham Company's payments at a time when the Bank rate of interest was ten per cent., no serious difficulty has been found in the renewal of debentures. The soundness of the security could not have been more thoroughly tested; nor is there any reason to apprehend a more formidable crisis. In a few years the bulk of the railway debt will have assumed the form of permanent stock, and the investment already commands a higher price, in proportion to the interest, than the funds of any foreign country.

The misfortunes of railway shareholders have, like the dangers of railway travelling, been the subject of wild exaggeration. A journey in a first-class carriage on a well conducted line is nearly the safest condition of human life; and the ordinary stock of the great majority of the principal Companies has always produced a liberal return. The London and North-Western, the Midland, the Great Northern, the North-Eastern, the Lancashire and Yorkshire, and the London and South-Western Railways, including much more than half the entire mileage of England, have for several years enjoyed uninterrupted though varying prosperity. The South-Eastern Company paid for the last half year the moderate dividend of four per cent. The London, Brighton, and South Coast, the Great Western, and the Great Eastern are only beginning to show a small surplus over their fixed charges. Within the last year the income of the Midland Company has been greatly increased by the opening of the new line from Bedford to London; yet the London and North-Western and the Great Northern Companies, from which the Midland traffic has been diverted at Rugby and at Hitchin, have maintained their receipts and their dividends. Nearly every Chairman at the late general meetings has complained of the operation of Lord CAMPBELL'S Act, which is nevertheless too just and too popular to be repealed. It might perhaps be found possible to restrain by some equitable enactment the liberal discretion which juries exercise in favour of injured passengers. It is an old and perhaps unavoidable anomaly that the most frightful and culpable accidents are sometimes less costly to the delinquent Companies than minor collisions. An unmarried passenger, or a landed widower with an only son, may recover damages for a broken leg, but not for a broken neck; and if the father of a family is killed, it is economical to dispose at the same time of his wife and children. The Abergele disaster, which scarcely left a survivor, has not entailed on the London and North-Western Company a liability to compensation proportionate to the greatness of the catastrophe. The security of ordinary passenger traffic is in the highest degree creditable to railway managers, and to the officers and servants of the Companies. More deaths occur from accidents in the streets of London in three weeks than on all the railways in the United Kingdom in the course of a year. The character of the accidents which occasionally happen is unavoidably startling and destructive.

Although much energy and ability have been exerted on the financial regeneration of embarrassed lines, the province of administrative skill is comparatively narrow. In the case of Companies which were burdened with large floating debts, it was obviously necessary to obtain the sanction of Parliament for the issue of additional preference shares or debentures; and in the meantime the revenue was applied to meet urgent demands. It is by this process that the Great Eastern and Great Western Companies have been enabled to resume cash payments to their preference shareholders, and to secure a balance for dividend or reserve. It is to be feared that neither Company has brilliant prospects, for there are no manufactures, no commercial ports, and no large towns in the Eastern counties; and the traffic of agricultural districts is inelastic. The Great Western line traverses in some parts of its course a more productive district, and the traffic has already improved with the partial revival of the iron trade; but the misfortune of having been constructed by a man of genius who preferred mechanical perfection to commercial expediency still weighs heavily on the Great Western. The abandonment of the broad gauge, which is gradually proceeding, will either occupy several years, or it will require an immediate capital outlay of two or three millions. In the meantime a considerable part of the system is as completely isolated as if the neighbouring lines were restrained from intercourse with the Great Western by prohibitive duties levied at the points of junction. The fortunes of the Brighton Company have been partially restored by the simple remedy of increased fares and diminished accommodation, as well as by the effects of the great expenditure which caused temporary embarrassment. Nearly all the Companies which had suffered under difficulties have reduced or extinguished their debts to outside creditors; but the North British Company is still compelled to pay its preference dividends in deferred warrants. According to the statements of the Directors, a Bill now before Parliament will, if it is passed, enable the Company to resume cash payments; and, if so, only one considerable Railway Company will remain in an insolvent condition.

The London, Chatham, and Dover Company has for nearly three years paid nothing either to debenture-holders or to shareholders; and seventeen suits in Chancery, conducted by sixteen solicitors, are, it is to be hoped, tending to decide the respective priorities of as many rival claimants. No tribunal could be less satisfactory than a Chief Clerk in Chancery who can only afford occasional scraps of his time to the most important and urgent cases. The delays of which injured shareholders and creditors naturally complain are probably unavoidable, and the multiplicity of litigants is caused, not by the fault of clients or solicitors, but by the speculators who employed strange and complicated devices in raising the capital of the Company. The ordinary shareholders, who behold at an indefinite distance the vague prospect of a dividend, require but little compassion. The greater part of them derive their title from the contractors, in virtue of purchases at more than seventy per cent. discount; and the few shareholders who invested their money at an earlier period must have consented to many successive postponements of their claims. The contest is waged among several classes of shareholders, who for the most part insist that they are preferred to the debenture-holders of all but their own respective sections of the line; and by the debenture-holders on different portions of the capital, and of various dates. It is probable that every purchaser of a debenture believed that his security took precedence of all the shares; but some of the shareholders claim a lien on the gross receipts anterior to any deduction. It is useless to recommend compromise and forbearance where there is an irreconcilable conflict of interests. When the Court of Chancery or the House of Lords has determined the priorities, some of the claimants will be paid in full; and perhaps before the expiration of the provisional term of ten years, the divisible fund, which now exceeds 100,000*l.*, may be sufficient to meet all preference charges. The Chatham line is for the most part extremely valuable in itself; and, notwithstanding the enormous amount of nominal capital, there is no reason to suppose that the construction was unduly expensive. The great defect of the railway is that the head is too big for the body. Two or three hundred miles of line, however profitable, are heavily burdened by great metropolitan stations and approaches. It is an extraordinary fact that the original shares still command a price in the market which represents the belief of purchasers in the eventual prosperity of the line. The Company which nearly dragged down with it all other railway undertakings is the last to recover, as it was the first to break down. Nearly all the suitors in Chancery have been misled or defrauded; and it is but an insufficient consolation that the chief authors of their misfortunes have been overwhelmed by the ruin of the Company.

M. ROUHER AND M. ÉMILE OLLIVIER.

M. ROUHER must be accustomed by this time to the necessary though invidious office of throwing overboard the JONAH of the minute. In concert with his Imperial master he has reduced the process to a system. The appearance of the MINISTER of STATE, whether on the field of discussion or of action, usually heralds the disgrace of a colleague or the abandonment of a policy. There is no continuity between what he says or does and what has been said or done by any other member of the Government. The explanation of his conduct must usually be looked for in the attitude of the Opposition. He has learnt by intuition or practice the extreme point to which resistance can be pushed with safety, and his special function in the Cabinet seemingly is to announce when that point has been reached. Mr. DISRAELI played a similar part more than once in the Session of 1867, but M. ROUHER has to include the country as well as the Legislature in his calculations, and the demands on his acuteness are so much the more serious in consequence It is hard to say whether the PREFECT of the SEINE or the MINISTER of the INTERIOR has most cause to smart under the latest exhibition of this useful talent. Baron HAUSSMANN has been disowned, M. DE FORCADE LA ROQUETTE has been ignored. Neither sensation can be altogether pleasant, but perhaps of the two sufferers M. DE FORCADE LA ROQUETTE deserves commiseration most. The PREFECT of the SEINE may well have been startled at hearing that he, and not the EMPEROR, is responsible for the reconstruction of Paris. Still, when the first surprise was over, there was an appreciable dignity in the position thus unexpectedly assigned to him. To have spent 8,000,000*l.* invests a man with some importance, even when he has been only an agent, and he certainly does not lose in this respect if it is suddenly discovered that he has been laying it out at his own pleasure. But the MINISTER of the INTERIOR has no such consolation. He was suffered to defend the administration of Paris in the Corps Législatif, in the undisturbed belief that the EMPEROR had been the real architect of every new street. Acting on this theory, M. DE FORCADE LA ROQUETTE constructed an ingenious and even eloquent apology. He appealed directly to the vanity, and indirectly to the fears, of the French middle class. Under the Empire Paris has become the capital of modern society, and the change in its exterior aptly symbolizes the exaltation of its position. The gaze of the civilized world is fixed in reverent admiration upon the straight streets and high houses which constitute the Napoleonic ideal of architectural grandeur. To be sure, a good many of them have been constructed in quarters where they are not wanted, but this does but establish the foresight of the Government. These now deserted thoroughfares will one day be peopled, and if the work had been delayed a few years it would only have been more costly in the end. And then just think of the workmen it employs! What might all these skilled artisans have turned their thoughts to if their strong arms and active brains had been left without proper occupation? Who shall say how many insurrections Baron HAUSSMANN may not have unwittingly suppressed? Take care of the building trade, and society will take care of itself. Nor is it only the men's working hours that have been thought of. Their own labour has been made the means of keeping them contented during their intervals of leisure. Those "objects of "luxury" with which the critics of the Corps Législatif find so much fault are so many places of recreation for the artisan when the fatigues of the day are over. He has been building for himself as well as for others.

When M. ROUHER rose, all this pretty theory fell to pieces. There was not a word in his speech about the advantages which Paris has derived from Baron HAUSSMANN's administration. The most pronounced member of the Opposition could not have shown a more icy indifference to those sentimental considerations on which the MINISTER of the INTERIOR had rested his case. Instead of defending what the EMPEROR had done, he boldly denied that he had done it. To make the Sovereign responsible for the administration of the city of Paris "is to commit a deplorable error." The idea of a regenerated Paris may have been the EMPEROR's; but it is the execution of the idea that is now subjected to attack, and the responsibility for this lies with those who undertook the work. Having thus shifted the possible blame from the EMPEROR's shoulders to those of Baron HAUSSMANN, M. ROUHER could afford to say a word or two in extenuation of his scapegoat's conduct. The impression left by his speech is that, in his opinion, the PREFECT has rather muddled away money than otherwise, but that his intentions have been honest all along. The prerogatives of the Legislature have been too often disregarded, "but the mistake will not occur again." Perhaps the present is not the right time for contracting a fresh loan, and it is natural that the Corps Législatif should be indisposed to leave it to Baron HAUSSMANN to determine when that time has arrived. The necessities of the case will be best met by allowing the Government to authorize the loan when it shall seem expedient. M. OLLIVIER has said, with some truth, that it is essential to the success of M. ROUHER's method that he should have the last word; and, if his speech had not come, as it usually does, at the close of the debate, the result could hardly have been claimed as a triumph by the Opposition. The real concession offered by M. ROUHER was extremely small. It was invested with some importance by the fact that it was made in the teeth of a fellow-Minister, but when viewed apart from this accidental circumstance, it scarcely amounts to anything. It is well that the prerogative of the Chamber should be respected for the future, but the value of the promise is a good deal lessened by its being virtually dependent on the willingness of the Deputies to leave the hands of the Government wholly untied. Indeed, a little reflection seems to have convinced the Opposition that M. ROUHER's surrender was only one in appearance. Three days later, when the Report of the Committee again came before the Chamber, the Left supported an amendment in favour of a direct and immediate loan rather than one to be contracted through the medium of the Crédit Foncier and under the control of the Government. A division was insisted on, and though the Government had a large majority, yet the minority were able to command 97 votes.

It certainly looks as if M. ROUHER's position in the Cabinet of which he is the moving principle was on the eve of being seriously compromised. The publication of M. OLLIVIER's narrative of his negotiations with the EMPEROR in connexion with the famous letter of the 19th of January helps to make it clearer what this position really is. In the beginning of 1867 the EMPEROR was halting between two opinions, and this is probably a fairly accurate description of him in the beginning of 1869. At one time he inclines to the "crowning of the "edifice"; at another he fears that if he loses his hold on the country, he may not be able to get it again if he wants it. When he made his overtures to M. OLLIVIER, the first of these feelings was uppermost, and his desire to secure the Opposition deputy as a Minister probably implied an intention of dismissing M. ROUHER, who represents the opposite idea. But the influence of the MINISTER of STATE proved too great to be overthrown, and the leading object of the Government during the two years which have since elapsed has been to maintain the status quo. The means which M. ROUHER prefers for the attainment of this end are eminently elastic. He showed the utmost civility to M. OLLIVIER when it was on the cards that he might supplant him any day, and he will dismiss with equal composure a colleague whose only offence has been a too strict execution of his own instructions. Why he has opposed himself so unreservedly—remembering some of his recent displays, one might almost add, so passionately—to any reconciliation of the Empire with liberty cannot be said with certainty. It may be that he distrusts his own aptitude for a new system, and fears that its adoption would throw the EMPEROR irrecoverably into the hands of some Parliamentary politician. It may be that he distrusts his countrymen, and is genuinely convinced that the Empire cannot dispense with the safeguards to which it has been accustomed for seventeen years. Whatever may be his motive, there seems to be little doubt that he has identified himself too closely with repressive legislation to be chosen as the instrument for carrying out any other. If the EMPEROR wishes to change his policy, he must change his instruments also. That HIS MAJESTY feels this himself is rendered extremely probable by M. OLLIVIER's revelations. The letter of the 19th of January showed how strongly the EMPEROR's mind was leaning in the direction of Liberal reforms; the extent to which it has remained a dead letter ever since proves his unwillingness to dispense with M. ROUHER. But to play such a part as the MINISTER of STATE has chosen for himself requires something more than a succession of doubtful victories. A Constitutional Minister may be content with a working majority, however small; the Minister of an absolute sovereign must annihilate as well as defeat opposition. It is his failure to do this consistently that constitutes the of M. ROUHER's position, and M. MAUPAS's recent crusade in favour of a responsible Ministry is sufficient evidence that M. OLLIVIER will not want successors among Bonapartists as well as among Democrats.

THE DUAL GOVERNMENT OF THE ARMY.

THERE is always abundant consolation in this world for the disappointed, and the many Liberal aspirants for office who were left out in the cold on the formation of Mr. GLADSTONE's Ministry may find balm for their wounded spirits in contemplating the indignities to which their successful rivals are subject. As Mr. BERNAL OSBORNE once said when he found the doors of office closed against him, it is much more dignified to be a free and independent member than to undergo what Ministers are daily compelled to submit to. A few recent illustrations will suffice. Mr. TREVELYAN, by an unlucky slip, attributed personally to His Royal Highness the Duke of CAMBRIDGE those well-known defects of army administration which are caused by the duality between the War Office and the Horse Guards. He was compelled to apologize, and did so no doubt with that reservation of his own views which he owed to his self-respect. But the fact of the apology was published, and the terms of the apology were kept secret, and the subsequent course of the Ministry may have led unthinking observers to conclude that Mr. TREVELYAN has abjured his most cherished opinions. Nothing probably can be further from the truth; but a man in office is forced to submit in silence to the most unfounded imputations.

Mr. TREVELYAN's sorrows, however, are as nothing to what the MINISTER for WAR has had to suffer. Twice in one week Mr. CARDWELL has been called upon to answer questions the obvious purport of which was to draw from him a candid statement of the relations which exist between the Secretary of State for War and the Commander-in-Chief for the time being. Twice in one week Mr. CARDWELL has undergone what to a man of any sensitiveness must be the unspeakable humiliation of giving answers carefully worded so as to meet the specific questions put to him, and at the same time to convey a totally erroneous impression on the real subject on which information was required. And Mr. CARDWELL is not humiliated without companions in affliction. The Cabinet teems with men who in the days of opposition, not twelve months since, stoutly declared their conviction that the civil government of the army was being sapped by military authority and military influence, and all these men are forced to chafe in silence while their colleagues ask the House to credit a diametrically opposite representation. Nor is this kind of moral torture reserved for subordinates. Mr. GLADSTONE himself has risen to accept the responsibility of all that Mr. CARDWELL said. These painful Ministerial duties fall in a modified form, not only upon the Cabinet, but upon their organs in the press. We all know what a heavy moral price the semi-official journals in France pay for the exclusive information they enjoy. Something of the same kind may be traced in England, and the jealous dailies which may have envied the privilege accorded to the Times of announcing in the morning the substance of speeches to be delivered by the PREMIER in the evening may console themselves by observing the suit and service which the Leviathan of the press has to render in exchange. The clever statement of Mr. CARDWELL on the position of the Commander-in-Chief, which indulgent critics might regard as just not false, was amplified and exaggerated in the Times into an article which its most partial admirer must have seen to be just not true. Such are the indignities by which the possession of power and influence is tempered.

This is a sad state of things, the existence of which one would like to disbelieve, but there is no possibility of escaping the truth. No one who has considered the answers given by Mr. CARDWELL to Lord ELCHO and Sir PATRICK O'BRIEN, and both by him and by Mr. GLADSTONE to Mr. WHITE, can doubt that the picture which the Ministers desired to present was that of a Secretary of State for War absolutely supreme, with a Commander-in-Chief as his subordinate, exercising no authority but what was delegated to him by his official superior. Most persons are familiar with the effect of a rose-coloured glass upon a winter landscape. Not a single line seen through it is distorted from the truth of nature, and yet a scene of snow and ice is converted, as by magic, into a landscape of tropical splendour. This is just what the Ministers have done. They have given colour to what they described; but while they invited the House and the public to accept their view, they took some pains not to transgress the limits of verbal truth in any specific statement. Mr. CARDWELL and Mr. GLADSTONE thought it right to pass over in silence the well-known fact that the independence of the Horse Guards, as the general rule, has been sanctioned by a succession of Royal Warrants, but neither of them committed himself to the direct assertion that duality did not "in practice" exist. Mr. CARDWELL said that there was no duality "in theory," but there he stopped, and was content to lead the House by implication to believe that the idea of the dual government had no other foundation than the accident that the Horse Guards Staff was located in Whitehall, and the War Office Staff in Pall Mall. Not so the Times. It is the duty of an organ to say things that the patron does not venture or will not condescend to say, and accordingly we find the Times converting Mr. CARDWELL's pregnant silence into the form of direct assertion. We are told by this candid and highly informed authority, that "the dual government has "no existence but in the imagination of the public"; that, "practically speaking, the authority of the Commander-in-"Chief is at all points subordinate to that of the Secretary for "War"; that "Mr. CARDWELL gave a clear [!] explanation of "the case in his answer to Lord ELCHO"; and that what passed in the House of Commons was "an exposure of a most "inveterate delusion." Of course the Times was bound to outdo its leader, and while Mr. CARDWELL thought he had gone quite far enough in denying the existence of the dual government "in theory," the Times stoutly maintains that, "practically speaking," there is no such thing. Now all these assertions and insinuations are easily subjected to the test of truth. If the dual government is a mere delusion, if it is and always has been the rule and the practice that the Commander-in-Chief for the time being has no independent functions, if he is subordinate to the Minister in the same sense that any other army official is subordinate, then the Ministers have spoken with candour, and the Times with truth, and we, in common with all the world, have been deluded by a wild hallucination. If, on the other hand, it should prove that the office of the Commander-in-Chief has been by repeated warrants recognised as independent in many important particulars of the War Minister, if the matters which come under the direction of the Commander-in-Chief have been expressly excepted out of the jurisdiction of one Secretary of State after another, if the practice has always been and still is in accordance with this doctrine, then the dual government (whether it be a good thing or a bad thing) is a reality, and the Ministers have suppressed, and the Times has denied, the truth which the public are entitled to know. That is the issue which we have raised, and which we are prepared to abide. It is very short and simple, and very easily established.

In the year 1866 a Parliamentary return was printed of certain documents relating to the duties and authority of the Secretary of State for War in relation to those of the Commander-in-Chief. One of these documents, dated the 22nd of May, 1855, was a patent vesting the administration of the army and ordnance, with certain exceptions, in Lord PANMURE. The same exceptions occur in the patent granted to General PEEL in 1858, and nearly the same in that granted to Lord HERBERT in 1859. Since that time patents of this description had not, we are told by the compilers of this Parliamentary paper, been issued to successive Secretaries for War, and the reason is supplied by reference to a subsequent document, framed not later than Sir GEORGE LEWIS's period of office, once for all "defining the duties and autho-"rity of the Secretary of State for War in relation to those of "the Commander-in-Chief." This document was not given in the Parliamentary paper, on the plea that the original was mislaid, but it is incredible that no copy or extract remains, and no one can doubt that it is still the governing document, and that Mr. CARDWELL could scarcely have been ignorant of its purport when he affected to treat the "letter of service" as the sole instrument which determined in practice the position of the Commander-in-Chief. When Mr. CARDWELL tells us plainly what the substance of this document was, and whether there have been any subsequent documents varying its provisions, he will find himself compelled to admit the independence, even "in theory," of the office of Commander-in-Chief on the office of Secretary of State for War.

But we do not need the details to prove our case. If the Commander-in-Chief's office is strictly subordinate to that of the Minister, as that of any Under-Secretary is, what is the meaning of a succession of solemn documents defining the relations between the one office and the other? The bare existence of such documents is an authoritative assertion of duality "in theory." We know well how Mr. CARDWELL will excuse his statement. He may say that though the Commander-in-Chief is not by any document or by practice made in terms subordinate, still he does, as a matter of fact, yield in the last resort whenever the Minister chooses to intervene. This is true in exactly the same sense in which it may be said that in the last resort the House of Lords always yields to the House of Commons. But who would say on this ground that the Peers are not "in theory" independent of the Commons, or that there is no duality between the two Houses? It is exactly the same with the Commander-in-Chief and the Secretary of State.

Now as to the practice. You cannot prove practice from written patents, but we can fortunately prove out of Mr. CARDWELL's own mouth that, as to one part of the "excepted "powers," the independence of the Horse Guards is an actual fact. The Minister was compelled to admit, in answer to Sir PATRICK O'BRIEN, that there is no appeal from decision of the Commander-in-Chief to the Secretary of State for War. Mr. CARDWELL says this is as it should be, and that is a position which any one has a right to argue, and which we are ready to discuss when once we get the facts honestly admitted; but to say that certain powers are vested in the person holding the office of Commander-in-Chief, without appeal, and in the same breath to say that he is a mere subordinate under a letter of service, and that there is no independence and no duality, is one of those contradictions that only a Cabinet Minister can be expected to comprehend.

One word more as to the explanation insinuated by the Minister, and boldly adopted by the Times, as the solution of the whole controversy. The dual government exists, we are asked to believe, so far and only so far as it is necessitated by the fact that the Horse Guards and the War Office are not under one roof. A single question will dispose of this idle pretence. The Commissariat is not under the same roof as the general War Office staff, and the same is true of the Purveyor's and other offices. Has this arrangement ever been found to involve any consequence beyond the sending of a few messengers backwards and forwards, and has it ever given to the chiefs of these really subordinate departments any of the independence and duality which characterize the position of the Horse Guards? Duality is not a question of locality, but of regulation and practice.

In theory, therefore, and in practice, in any but a non-natural sense of the words, the dual government exists. How pernicious it is, we are not discussing to-day; and if the Government approve of it, with all its anomalies and all its extravagant cost, it would be fair and manly to challenge public opinion upon it. But to evade the issue by denying the existence, patent to all the world, of that which they would like to defend but dare not, is a device which does credit neither to the candour nor to the courage of a Cabinet which includes among its members some of the most resolute opponents of military domination. We have only to add that if, instead of putting sarcastic questions which are easily evaded, Sir P. O'BRIEN and Mr. WHITE had asked for the documents we have referred to, they would have compelled an admission of the truth, and sooner or later the whole truth must come out.

MR. FAWCETT'S BILL.

THE difficulty of reforming abuses in other departments of State is trifling compared with the obstructions offered to any measure which touches the House of Commons. On Wednesday last Lord BURY enjoyed the opportunity of avenging, both by vote and speech, his late defeat, on the innocent Mr. FAWCETT. Both members proposed reasonable measures for diminishing the expenses of elections, and both failed to accomplish their object. As the law for vacating seats on acceptance of office was absolutely indefensible by argument, though not by rhetoric, Lord BURY was refused permission even to introduce a Bill. Mr. FAWCETT's measure, on which it was possible that there might be a genuine difference of opinion, was defeated only by a small majority, with the result of affording to the Opposition the shadow of a triumph. Except that he may perhaps have infringed party discipline, Mr. FAWCETT judged rightly in refusing to refer his Bill to the Select Committee on Parliamentary and Municipal Elections. If he had succeeded in carrying the second reading, the vote of the House would have been in the nature of an instruction to the Committee, which may still, if it thinks fit, adopt the principle of the Bill in its Report. There is little chance that the inquiries of the Committee will be followed by immediate legislation; and in a future Session Mr. FAWCETT will probably renew his proposal. A part of the expenses in dispute would be saved, both to candidates and to ratepayers, if the obsolete practice of nominations were abolished; but the advantage of such a change would be too considerable to meet with the ready acquiescence of the House of Commons. The provision of hustings, of poll-clerks, and of booths would seem to concern counties and boroughs not less nearly than the objects to which their funds are otherwise applied. The Sheriff holds a County Court for the election of Knights of the Shire, and the polling machinery serves to inform his judgment on the real decision of the electors. The liability of candidates is inconsistent with the whole theory of elections, and probably with the original practice; but some members are afraid of encouraging contests by cheapening elections, and many more would rather pay two or three hundred pounds once in three years than be supposed to shift a burden from themselves to their constituents. According to Mr. FAWCETT, the expenses in a certain borough, where every election during fifteen years has been contested, would have been covered by the price of half an ounce of tobacco for each ratepayer once in three years. It may be contended that such sums bear but a small proportion to the outlay of candidates in many English boroughs and counties, or in little Irish towns; but some elections are pure and inexpensive, and the abolition of strictly necessary expenses would make irregular extravagance of liberality still more conspicuous than at present. The risk of encouraging frivolous oppositions was met, in Mr. FAWCETT's Bill, by the provision that an unsuccessful candidate receiving less than one-fifth of the votes given at the election should still be liable to pay his share of the expenses.

Mr. FAWCETT and Mr. BAINES contended that the Bill, among other advantageous results, would render the House more accessible to working-men. As no private person would dream of choosing an artisan to act as his agent in important and complicated affairs, it may be doubted whether legislative and public business in general ought to be dealt with more carelessly by prudent constituencies. It is possible that the practical Constitution of England may have been hitherto unduly aristocratic; but the qualities of gentlemen, or of those who are anxious to assume the character of gentlemen, have a considerable value; and politicians of democratic tendencies habitually neglect to estimate sufficiently the weight which Parliament has derived from the social position of its members. An upright and intelligent artisan is as respectable as an educated man of fortune; but if he was recognised as one of the natural leaders of the community, he would not be engaged in manual labour. Yet, however forcible may be the reasons against the election of working-men, no theory can justify their exclusion from Parliament by the indirect machinery of a fine imposed upon candidates. A few years ago Parliament thought fit to abolish the pecuniary qualification of members, either because the restriction was considered inexpedient or on the ground that it was systematically evaded. The expenses of the hustings and the poll ought not to serve the incidental purpose of limiting the choice of constituencies. The opponents of the Bill were probably influenced by a desire to retain some of the privileges which are still attached to the possession of property, but they were fortunate in the opportunity of using an argument which for the moment possesses exceptional weight in the House of Commons. The increase and the partial incidence of local taxation form the latest popular grievance; and it is undeniable that the adoption of Mr. FAWCETT's plan would have imposed an additional charge upon the rates. A young county member quoted in the original idiom the assertion of an enlightened constituent, that he would never consent to pay for the erection of a poll-booth; but it is not to be supposed that the most boisterous farmer would become a martyr to his conscientious horror of local taxation. The preamble to the Bill recited too argumentatively, but with perfect justice, the probability that when counties and boroughs paid for elections, they would take care that their money was not wasted. An under-sheriff or a mayor has at present no interest in saving the money of the candidates, who are regarded by a large part of the community as legitimate objects of plunder. If they were dealing with local funds, they could sometimes avoid the expense of constructing booths for the occasion, and in towns the structures which are only temporary might be applied during the intervals of elections to some useful purpose. The bills of the printer and of the advertising agent would be vigilantly checked, and in the result it would probably appear that many generations of candidates have been unduly taxed. Even if no reduction were effected, the burden on the rates would be utterly insignificant. The members who remarked in the debate that local charges were aggravated by a multitude of petty items, were probably influenced by political rather than economical motives.

If Mr. GLADSTONE and the other Cabinet Ministers had been present, the Bill would probably have passed; but on Wednesday morning Mr. AYRTON, who seemed to feel a peculiar antipathy to the measure, was charged with the conduct of Ministerial business. He had urged Mr. FAWCETT in vain to withdraw his Bill, that it might be referred to the Committee, and he resented Mr. FAWCETT's refusal with a frankness which perhaps would not have been exhibited by the leader of the House. It may be assumed that if Mr. AYRTON had been an independent member, he would have opposed the Bill; and finding himself compelled to vote for the second reading, he made his support as damaging as possible. It is evident that official silence is pain and grief to the most voluminous of speakers; for, in the absence of the Cabinet, Mr. AYRTON attacked Mr. FAWCETT and his Bill in one of his prolix orations. He seems to have forgotten that since he was compelled to signify the Ministerial assent to the Bill, it was his business, if possible, to secure a majority. The Government is too strong to be damaged by a chance defeat; but a Secretary of the Treasury ought to avoid the risk of even the most trifling check. It is not even prudent unnecessarily to reprove a zealous supporter for alleged insubordination. Mr. FAWCETT's reasons against referring his Bill to the Committee were strengthened by the statement of Mr. HARDY, that a Bill affirmed on second reading by the House could not, in conformity with practice, be submitted to a Committee for any purpose except the examination of its details. If Mr. GLADSTONE would find a less busy place for Mr. AYRTON, he would render the Government more popular in the House. It is often a serious question for a Minister whether an active member causes more inconvenience as an opponent or as a colleague. It would, perhaps, have been difficult to refuse Mr. AYRTON office, and the suspension of his independent position has, to the great comfort of the House, materially shortened the debates; but it would be highly convenient that a Cabinet Minister should, if possible, supersede him in the management of the House on Wednesdays.

The rejection of Mr. FAWCETT's Bill acquires some additional importance in consequence of Mr. BRUCE's scheme for reducing the less regular expenses of elections. The applause which has been bestowed on the election Judges may have been well deserved; nor can it be doubted that they have interpreted the law with an accuracy and authority which could not be possessed by Election Committees; yet nearly all their recent decisions tend to relax the restrictions which had, according to popular belief, been imposed on the expenditure of candidates. In Ireland, more especially, it appears that a rich man may scatter money wholesale, as long as he abstains from direct and avowed traffic in votes. The increasing costliness of elections tends far more commonly to deter educated men of moderate means from standing than to exclude the working man whose admittance is recommended and depreciated with so much undue earnestness. A candidate who sincerely wished to discourage corruption, as well as to spare his own pocket, might perhaps feel that his efforts were somewhat less hopeless if Parliament had established in principle the liability of the electors themselves to the necessary expenses of an election. A refusal to pay anything would be more simple and intelligible than a distinction among various kinds of expense which sometimes slide imperceptibly into irregularity and excess. Parliament shows no present disposition to check the evil by distinct prohibition of the principal causes of expense. The employment of paid agents and canvassers, of messengers, and of watchers, will perhaps, on the report of Mr. BRUCE's Committee, be declared illegal; and it would certainly be abandoned if the ratepayers had to pay all the bills, as well as the actual cost of the formal election. For the present the Opposition feels a natural satisfaction, not so much in having thrown out Mr. FAWCETT's Bill as in having technically beaten the Government; but Mr. HARDY's inability to resist the appointment of a Committee which will probably recommend the adoption of the ballot proves that the majority is entirely unshaken.

HABITUAL CRIMINALS.

WHATEVER may be the opinion of the persons peculiarly affected by its provisions, there is no doubt that Lord KIMBERLEY's Bill will be gratefully welcomed by the London public and by those persons who have given their attention to the present state and prospects of criminals. That the professional instincts of those ardent lovers of freedom whom the purlieus of Whitechapel and Shoreditch will send forth to swell the Nag's Head procession on Good Friday resent an interference so prejudicial to their interests, is only what we ought to have expected. The juster fear is that respectable men, for whose protection the Act is proposed, will be so moved by that effeminate dread of inflicting pain which is too characteristic of our age as to agitate against punishments the novelty of which is less remarkable than the necessity. When we recollect that only within a few years men who were deemed intelligent enough to hold the Commission of the Peace for the county of Surrey startled the Sessions Court of Kingston by inflicting a disgraceful sentence on a schoolmaster who had inflicted needful and wholesome castigation on an unruly boy, we are prepared to expect any amount of shrieking remonstrances, not only from the backers and accomplices of our thieves and burglars, but also from the men of competent means and capacious stomachs whose muddled intellects are the suitable interpreters of their gushing hearts. Nor will there be wanting brawlers to enlist the democratic sympathies of the smaller householder in fierce war against any enactment which proceeds from the House of Lords. Costermongers from Bethnal Green and tapsters from the Seven Dials will unite in patriotic indignation against provisions which fetter the freedom of their customers and "pals." All the rascaldom and mendicancy of the land will be fired with constitutional enthusiasm on behalf of their time-honoured privileges of "loafing," stealing, and begging. Amid the din of insolent remonstrance and whining supplication will be heard the familiar accents of the professional humanitarian, deprecating the infliction of cruel punishments or unconstitutional surveillance on erring "flesh and blood."

The provisions of the Bill are, in the main, those which we have persistently advocated. The proposals of the Government are directed to the radical destruction of the criminal class. Some criminals are, like poets, born, not made. They inherit the taint of criminal blood, grow up under the fostering care of fathers and brothers who have professed only crime during their whole lives, and are themselves apprentices to crime from the day they can walk. Others are made criminals by accident; by the temptations of voluntary or involuntary idleness; by the example or the exhortation of wicked companions; by hunger and want; by casual association with criminals. The two classes will come within the provisions of Lord KIMBERLEY's Bill. The first of these provisions is directed against ticket-of-leave men. It is proposed that any ticket-of-leave man may be summoned by a police-constable before a magistrate, and compelled to prove that he is living honestly. If he cannot prove this, he will be remitted to the completion of his unexpired term of penal servitude. As ticket-of-leave men often escape detection in the crowds of populous cities and by removal from one town to another, it is provided that a network of registration and supervision shall be established over the country, by which their persons and residences shall be kept within the cognizance of the police. The next propositions are directed against criminals who have been imprisoned for felony, but not sentenced to penal servitude. They will be liable to prove before a magistrate that they are living honestly, though they will be exempt from the summary process pursued in the case of ticket-of-leave men. Should a man of this description be found under any suspicious circumstances in an inhabited house, or contravening the Vagrant law, he will become liable to imprisonment for one year, and to seven years' supervision after his term of imprisonment. The next portion of the Bill deals with those who may be described as habitual offenders. It takes away the discretion of the judge in the case of a prisoner who has been thrice convicted of felony, and punishes him with seven years' penal servitude. Such a man will not be called on to prove the honesty of his life after his liberation and seven years' supervision, but will be treated as a rogue and vagabond, and will be liable to one year's imprisonment if proved to have been found on any premises under suspicious circumstances. An important—perhaps the most important—part of the Bill bears upon the receivers of stolen property. It is provided that on any person who has been convicted of a crime punishable with imprisonment, and who is found in possession of stolen goods, the burden of proof shall lie, to show that he did not know them to have been stolen. A correlative clause makes the existing law of pawnbrokers more stringent. And one hardly less important than any affixes six months' imprisonment, with or without hard labour, as the penalty for assaults on the police.

To the general character of these provisions all but hardened humanitarians or their friends will give their assent. The Bill does certainly adopt some principles new to the English law, and a great deal of declamation may be expended in denouncing them. But, albeit novel, they are not necessarily noxious. The element of "reputed" character has long been known to the Scotch criminal law, and has been found of great value in the administration of justice. Perhaps some modification may be made in some of the details of the Bill. But the general principle must be retained on grounds of public policy. The fairest modification of details which occurs to us is a relaxation in favour of "suspects" who reside in small country towns. They have neither the same facilities of crime nor the same temptations as those who live in large cities, and their residence has generally been selected with a view to self-reformation and the prosecution of an industrial career. The arbitrary interference of the police might worry away men who, if left undisturbed, would resume habits of labour, diligence, and honesty. But with the noted criminals of great cities the case is different. It is in the populous labyrinths of alleys, "courts," and "wynds," that their dens and hiding-places are found. It is there that their haunts, their rendezvous, their abettors, their "receivers," abound. It is from these that they issue forth to prey upon the country districts. It is there that they train up a race of successors, and corrupt by their example the idle and the unemployed who live near them. As a rule, the homes of the criminal population are and must be in great cities. Not only would small towns and country districts not afford them materials of plunder, but they would not afford the opportunities of concert, the facilities of conspiring against the public wealth, or of disposing of their pillage. So long as predatory crime exists, its professors must live in the capital, or in the largest cities of England. Therefore, the more stringent provisions of the proposed law might perhaps be limited to London and some dozen other towns. This is the only important modification which occurs to us as plausible, and we are not unaware that exception may be taken even to this. How much more stringent the law should be than it now is in the metropolis may be gathered from the catalogue of professional criminals with which Lord KIMBERLEY edified the House of Lords. It appears that we have amongst us nearly 23,000 known thieves and depredators, 3,095 receivers of stolen goods, 33,000 vagrants and tramps, and 29,000 suspected persons. Of these nearly 15,000 live in London, but all have communication with London. This is a goodly array; and when it is considered that a large proportion of these have been many times recommitted to prison, that they have, most of them, abandoned all design of living honestly, and that the more hardened and adroit have established a regular confraternity among themselves, it is tolerably clear that our present mode of dealing with them is slack in the extreme. They are enemies of us all, and we treat them as friends; they constitute a hostile camp in the midst of us, and we keep no watch on their movements. They exercise their calling in opposition to the law, under its protection.

It is surely high time that this were changed, and the principle of the proposed change appears unexceptionable. No one, we imagine, can entertain any reasonable objection to the registration of criminals who hold tickets of leave. They are a privileged class, and the individuals of a privileged class should be known to the world. They are a class of doubtful character, and their presence without the means of distinguishing them is a danger to society. The obscurity which they have hitherto enjoyed has been to their own advantage rather than that of the public. Few people can have forgotten the varied career and versatile abilities of Mr. GEORGE ROBERTS. Sentenced in 1837 to transportation for life, this predatory genius was found in England in 1842 under another name, and again sentenced to the same term of transportation. He reappeared on the stage of English life in 1851 under a third alias, when a sentence of fourteen years' imprisonment was passed upon him. The obscurity which hangs over this period of his career favours the supposition that he worked his sentence out. After its completion, he committed burglary, and was sentenced to eighteen months' imprisonment. Since that time he has divided his energies between the vocations of a beggar and of an area sneak, in both which capacities he has had to inhabit county gaols. Making any degree of allowance for the amusement or the edification which signal talent of any kind affords, it is clearly beyond doubt that felonious talent like Mr. ROBERTS's may be too finely cultivated. A convict who, after having been twice sentenced to transportation for life, reappears to continue his professional studies in England, may be an object of legitimate wonder; but he is an object of equally legitimate alarm. He commits and disseminates crime wherever he goes. Under the proposed law such a man's career will be cut prematurely short. Descriptions of his person, each of which will probably be illustrated by a photographic sketch, will be sent to the different police-stations of England. If he escapes from prison, he will then be recaptured. If he comes out on license, he will be watched. If he renders himself subject to a second and third committal, he will become liable to surveillance in all cases, and to imprisonment in all suspicious cases. The men, too, who provide him with lodging and the means of conspiring with his confederates will be kept under the watchful eye of the law. And, most effective of all, the pawnbrokers who—despite Mr. ATTENBOROUGH's indignant disclaimer—are known to be the best allies and supporters of the burglar class, will not be allowed to fence with policemen as much as they do now, but will be called upon to open their books and reveal their transactions with their skilful but dangerous clients.

To all these provisions we anticipate but two objections. One is that they are new. The other is that they are likely to be abused by ordinary policemen. The answer to the first objection is obvious. The state of things they are intended to remedy is new. The object of the Bill is to prevent it from becoming normal. The second objection is more valid, and may necessitate an additional clause or two. It may be necessary to state of what acts the license-holder has been convicted before he is amenable to long surveillance. And it may be thought prudent to transfer the right of arrest from an ordinary constable to a police officer. Even this precaution may be rendered superfluous by the appointment of the District Chief Constables, whose presence will be a great check on abuse of powers. If opposition is urged by the country members against the Bill, it may, in the first instance, be limited to London. London is the haunt and focus of the crime which we most particularly wish to repress. If the principle of the Bill succeeds in London, it will be adopted by the large cities of England, and then by the whole country. And that it will succeed in London we have no doubt.

INTREPIDITY.

SOME of the qualities which we most admire in a man who has achieved an undeniably successful position are apt to excite much carping remark if they are displayed while he is only working his way to such a position. Foremost among qualities of this sort is the virtue of intrepidity, if we give it the better-sounding name, or, if we give it that with the worse sound, audacity, which is more commonly attached to it in the cases where its possessor happens to fail. When a statesman, for instance, has inspired us with confidence, then the more intrepid he is the better. In an ordinary way there is so much timorousness, apprehension, dread of movement, and passion for the status quo, that the sight of men in high places with none of these fussy weaknesses is almost a liberal education in itself. Most people are so closely surrounded by the denseness of their personal and daily circumstance, with all its exactions and demands, that there is no room for the display of that far-seeing and commanding grasp, that reposeful yet energetic self-reliance, which we justly admire in the ruler. Yet somehow we are always inclined to postulate from an intrepid man that he shall have earned his right to be intrepid. Coming short of this, he is more likely than not to be banned as an adventurer, and what is by and by relished as intrepidity is meanwhile confusedly stigmatized as unscrupulousness or impudence. Thus, the poor man who aspires to Parliament is an adventurer until he gets a seat; the man in Parliament who aspires to office is an adventurer until some rare chance turns up of proving himself unmistakeably disinterested, or until after long probation he has acquired such a character and reputation as effectually to banish all mean or sinister associations from around his name. In a word, there is nothing the world likes so much as intrepidity, when it is sure of its man; nothing it is so chary of construing favourably, until it is quite sure about the rest of a person. There are two explanations of this suspicious and doubting temper, both of which may contain a measure of the truth; we may either attribute it to the sometimes innate grudging and enviousness of men towards their fellows who happen to be taller than the average by a head, or else to the ease with which the virtue is counterfeited by self-interested pushing and forwardness, or by mere ignorant rashness. Moreover it is not to be denied that the world has suffered many things of intrepidity, which is too often found in close company with a heartless indifference to the injuries which may be inflicted right and left in the progress to some end ever kept steadily in view. In politics this is particularly true; intrepidity means Napoleons and Disraelis. We think of mendacious bulletins and Maundy Thursday epistles. Taking all these considerations together—the enviousness of the natural man, the spuriousness of much assumed intrepidity, and the number of persons afloat even in high places who hold the theory that the aim of a career is l'exploitation de l'homme par l'homme—we may begin to understand how it is that even the wise intrepid man often prefers to pass himself off for a quiet person of a blameless and no more than commonplace kind of character. The ancients were anxious to avert Nemesis, and the intrepid modern may well be anxious to conciliate a public opinion which is naturally hostile to a man who boldly proposes to walk over the public head.

Intrepidity on a humbler scale, however, than in the elevated domain of political and public action is less open to invidious remark, and is a virtue worth thinking about. It is rather in accordance with our prevalent traditions to make little of this quality, and to assume that success must be due almost entirely to the respectable qualities of the tortoise. In an old-fashioned commercial country this is quite what we might have expected. As a general rule, a man who sets to work to make his fortune in trade had perhaps better discourage the intrepid impulses of his character as rigidly as he knows how to do, in favour of cautious feeling of his way bit by bit, and of the commonplace excellences of industry, patience, and a slow-blooded tenacity. It is true that we have now fallen upon days when the City loves a speculative stroke, and the temper which rushes into dry goods, teas, tallow, or anything else in the spirit of the desperate warrior heading forlorn hopes. But this new love, besides being particularly out of repute at the moment, it is in any case thought better to cherish in secret. No Polonius would include the speculative stroke among the practices to be enjoined upon ingenuous youth. And in other professions than that of commercial money-making, the experience of the world and a natural turn for perseverance among the best kinds of Englishmen—and, in saying Englishmen, let us be understood to mean particularly Scotchmen—have combined to bring a dashing spirit into a certain suspected position. Yet there is no reason why the cool man who sits tranquilly down for a tenacious spell of some five-and-twenty or thirty years' work, drudging, monotonous, exacting, never to be shirked, and in no way glorious, should not plume himself on possessing intrepidity in the very highest degree; far more than if he impetuously proposed to himself to scale the heights of fortune at a single dash. This is the sort of true intrepidity to which the common use of the term does but scanty justice; as if it did not involve a far more considerable coolness, reach of vision, freedom from tremors, and reliance on one's own nerve and muscle, than the mere capacity of making one or more dashes. We do not often hear people talk of an intrepid patience, yet nobody with any reflection or observation will deny that there is such a thing. Consider the intrepidity of patience on the intellectual side implied in setting about one of those great literary tasks whose execution our own time has been so fortunate as to witness. The tenacity of a merchant who deliberately contemplates the prospect of ever so many years' drudgery and anxiety before he realizes his proposed fortune is not any more marked than the tenacity of an author, like Milman or Grote, who calmly contemplates an equally long prospect of toil to be undergone before the goal of the final chapter shall be reached. The position of a learned author is so dazzling that people seem somehow to associate dazzle and joy with the labours which have achieved the position. They might just as well assume that the merchant or the barrister earned his money amidst the same luxurious and sprightly surroundings in which he may choose to spend it. Yes, but, it may be said, the writer of a great history, for example, has a certain lofty pleasure in the work as it grows under his hands; his investigations are a delight to him because they bring him new treasures; the consciousness that he is contributing new ideas to the stock of humanity is inspiring and elevating. And all this is probably true enough in its way of many moments; but it need not be said that there is another side which is not by any means so attractively rose-coloured. First, there is much downright hard physical endurance to go through. Then, it does not follow, because a man finds pleasure in learning and composition, that he should find no pleasure in anything else; yet, if he be really hard at work, a good many if not most of the other pleasures will have to be sacrificed without remorse or second thought. Worse than either of these, and more inevitably painful, are the intellectual discouragements which throng in many forms around the growing task, and make the wretch feel as if he would fain dash his inkstand at them as Luther did to demolish the mocking fiend. Hence anybody who sits down to work knowing what he has to encounter deserves credit for at least as much sheer brute tenacity or intrepidity as the longheaded merchant or anybody else who, being poor, resolutely sets to work by slow degrees to make himself rich. Then, again, there is the votary of physical science, who needs courage as much as any of his neighbours—the courage of patience, coupled with that animating far-sightedness which is at the root of all intrepidity that is worth the name, or at any rate that is worth having oneself or admiring in other people. Indeed it is exactly this far-sightedness which distinguishes the virtue from its counterfeit. The rash man, dazzled by false impressions either of himself, or of circumstances, or of the people with whom he has to work, believes that he can see further than plain folk, when in fact he is either near-sighted as a bat, or squints, or has colour-blindness, or is in some other way not only not more clear-seeing than the rest, but not nearly so much so. Who does not know the pretentiously intrepid man of this sort, who flies into the air like Icarus, and then, when the warm sun of realities melts his sham wings, flops down to earth or water again?

Yet it is to be said that even when calm and confident self-reliance is not justified, and when events and forces turn out to be quite different from what they had been calculated to be, still a man is by so much the better for his miscalculation in a great many circumstances that may be imagined. Only let us picture the extent to which even a strong person is weakened, the injustice which he does to himself, the disadvantage at which all his powers work, if his strength should happen to lie in every direction but that of fixing his aims and marching towards their fulfilment without the consciousness that there is a world round about him of people with envious eyes and restless unsparing tongues. To be unconscious of the numbers and voices of the audience that accompanies each of us, in one walk of life as in another, must obviously multiply power to a degree almost beyond computation. Such blindness and deafness leave us so free, not universally perhaps, for there are temperaments which are only really alive and alert when the eye and words of the crowd begin to play upon them. And men of such a temperament are likely to be more generous, humane, and sympathetic than others in the conception of their projects. It is only when the hour for executing a project arrives that the danger and weakness of such sensibility are fully experienced. A great Minister of our own time might serve to point this moral; a Minister who appears to have quailed and trembled, and passed slumberless nights tossing on his bed, because some obscure pamphleteer had used bad language about his supposed schemes for disestablishment of the Irish Church. A man less accessible to the scurrility of every passer-by who should choose to shoot out a tongue at him would be much more free to perform his political taskwork with comfort and effectiveness. There is the great letter-writing statesman, for instance, who would, according to the old jest that concealed so much truth, advance with equal intrepidity to the command of the fleet or the amputation of a limb. This is perhaps an excess of a good thing, yet it is excess in the right direction. Nobody can doubt that Lord Russell has had the benefit of such powers as he was born with, absolutely unimpeded. He has been able decidedly to make the best possible use of them, from his own point of view at any rate.

It is perhaps just worth pointing out that action often looks very intrepid when in truth it is only unusual. The unknown always seems set thick with dangers, and the man who steps forth into uncommon courses is assumed to be running countless risks. The beaten track is naturally the safest, yet there is no reason why other tracks should not be safe too, and a man deviating into a career or a policy of his own may be complying just as carefully with all the conditions of soberness and well-doing as if he were acting as people in his case are accustomed to act. He shows more or less strongly marked individuality, but individuality and intrepidity are two different things. Some of the most terrible penalties that await new courses are in the estimates which friends form and express about them. To be able to face these implies courage of the rarest sort; but then persons with strongly marked individualities are as often as not blessed with a thick-skinned apathy about outside opinion which, as we have already said, may be a drawback to fineness of conception, but is a clear gain in carrying plans out.

INSTINCTIVE CRUELTY.

CRUELTY is popularly supposed to be one of those vices to which the "wicked heart" of man is most naturally prone. The earth is indeed stated, at a very early period of its history, to have been "full of cruel habitations;" but then the unbridled lust of power and pelf necessarily leads to a great deal of violence and oppression, and we are speaking here of cruelty for its own sake, not of a selfish disregard for the rights or happiness of others where our own interest is concerned. Every kind of crime, however unnatural or even repulsive in itself, is perpetrated often enough when there is some ulterior object to be gained. But whereas there are "pleasant sins" which most men feel inclined to unless they are restrained by some stronger motive, whether of morality or self-interest, there are also sins which to all appearance they "feel no mind to," except as the means of attaining some further end. It is hard, for instance, to conceive a state of society where parricide would be a normal form of temptation, though a wider experience might have warned Solon against treating it as an impossibility. And cruelty for the mere sake of cruelty is commonly thought to come under this category. It is regarded as too purely diabolical a passion to appeal to any natural instinct of even the most depraved human spirit. There are hideous and well-authenticated tales, to be sure, of monsters in human form who are scarcely, if at all, caricatured by the ogres and Blue Beards, et id genus omne, who were the terror of our tender youth. But then the personages of whom these things are related, though they have every claim to be considered historical, lived for the most part some hundreds of years ago. And we all remember the story of the old woman whose feelings had been deeply harrowed by a Good Friday sermon, but who was at once relieved on learning that the events referred to happened eighteen centuries ago. "Well," she observed, "that is a very long time; let us hope it isn't true." In the same way we half unconsciously hope or suspect that those shocking stories of child-killers, were-wolves, and the like, are not quite true, seeing that they generally refer to a period long past. And besides, if they are true, there is always the convenient resource of temporary or chronic insanity. Why should we consider them typical of a natural instinct any more than the ravings of some unhappy denizen of Hanwell prove that it is an instinct of our corrupted nature to fancy oneself the Emperor Napoleon or the Second Person of the Trinity? And so we are thrown back on the old inquiry, whether cruelty for its own sake is really a natural, or only an acquired taste; or, we should rather perhaps say, whether it has any existence at all when there is no ulterior motive of personal interest or malice to explain it.

In other words, is the witnessing of pain inflicted on others, or on brute animals, a natural source of vicious enjoyment, apart from any special ground of antipathy to our victims?

The popular answer to the question, as we said before, is in the negative, and every alleged case of motiveless cruelty is at once set down to monomania or some form of mental disease. No doubt this is the pleasantest view to take of the matter. But is it the true one? Those who say that it is will of course appeal with confidence to the ordinary experiences of social life. We see abundant examples, they will tell us, of double-dealing and oppression and niggardliness and harsh contempt for the feelings and sufferings of others, and in all these ways cruel injury is inflicted on them, but it is not done for the sake of injuring them. Dives takes no particular pleasure in the sores of the starving Lazarus, though he is too covetous or too careless to relieve him. On the other hand, habits of mind are formed, as moralists teach, both by acts and by passive impressions, though in diverse manners. The constant performance of acts of benevolence produces a benevolent temper of mind, but the habitual contemplation of pain and suffering, without any attempt to relieve it, hardens the temper against all genuine feeling of sympathy. Parish doctors sometimes become in this way little short of brutal in their treatment of the poor. Still, it may be said, that is hardly cruelty for its own sake; it is simply indifference to suffering, bred of selfish dislike to take any trouble in relieving it. So far the argument holds good, and if it covered all the circumstances of the case there would be little more to be said. But unfortunately it does not. It does not even pierce beneath the surface of ordinary social life, as we are acquainted with it under the conditions of modern civilization. There are other vices, usually considered quite as unnatural as cruelty, of which an equally superficial examination would reveal no trace, but which nevertheless are perfectly well known to be rife among us. Some reserve is always found needful in the indulgence, and still more in the avowal, of propensities which are under the ban of society, and we cannot fairly infer their non-existence from their not being obtruded on our notice. An Englishman's house is his castle, as the saying goes, and he is haughtily intolerant of strangers prying into its secrets. Certainly our modern castles have no dungeons, or oubliettes, or other conveniences of the mediæval pattern for coercing or getting rid of troublesome customers. But enough comes to light every now and then to show that a rule of domestic tyranny, not to say domestic cruelty, is by no means so infrequent, even in "the best-regulated families" to all outward seeming, as we might have been disposed to assume. Not to speak of such cases as that of the Eastbourne schoolmaster who got four years' imprisonment for beating a boy to death, there is abundant scope for refined and systematic cruelty without coming under the lash of the law; and there are not wanting instances of fathers, in the same rank of life as Mr. Hopley, testing very similar theories of education—though with a more cautious eye to dangerous consequences—on their own children. What is to be said again of James II.'s enjoyment in seeing prisoners' legs crushed in the iron boot? There are undeniably phenomena which it is not easy to explain except by an inherent love of cruelty for its own sake. And of course, if such a passion exists at all, it will be developed, like any other passion, by indulgence.

But, without pressing these considerations, a previous objection may very fairly be raised to staking the issue merely on the average experience of modern society in a civilized and Christian land. There are, as we hinted before, vices which do not now dare to show their faces in public, but which, however justly in one sense we may brand them as unnatural, have notoriously been so prevalent in other ages and other countries that we cannot reasonably deny their connexion with actually existing tastes of a depraved nature. In such cases we are apt to adapt our nomenclature to what we desire rather than to what we know to be true. And for practical purposes it may be wise to do so. Only we must remember that neither our wishes nor our terminology can alter facts. If we look a little more closely into the present question, and put aside as far as possible disturbing causes, whether of moral influence or material restraint, the testimony of experience will not perhaps square so nicely with our preconceived impressions. Let us take, for instance, the case of children, before they have "set the world in their heart," either for good or evil, while they are still comparatively "children of nature," as we phrase it. Would it be true to say that no such thing as an instinctive love of cruelty ever displays itself? Nero is said to have amused himself as a boy with killing flies, and this is often quoted as an early prophecy of his future character, as though killing flies were the natural anticipation of a taste for burning Christians and for matricide. But have we never seen children on a summer afternoon engaged in precisely the same benevolent occupation? Are we, indeed, quite sure that our own tiny fingers were never stained with the débris of crushed insects? If they were, we have probably long since forgotten what the enjoyment of the process consisted in, but it is not easy to distinguish it from a pleasure in the infliction of pain. Is it so very uncommon for small children to pinch and scratch their smaller brothers or sisters for the pleasure of hearing them cry? Birds'-nesting cannot be fairly brought under the same condemnation, for the love of adventure and the possession of the eggs constitute the charm of that operation to the schoolboy mind, and the sorrow of the bereft parents is viewed merely with indifference, if not altogether forgotten. But what are we to say of the unamiable proclivities of the juvenile mind in the matter of stoning cats or gloating over the proverbial agonies of the "expiring frog"? Such perverted tastes, it may be replied, are among the childish things which are put away with advancing years. True, but they are put away in deference to public opinion, represented in the first instance by the rebuke, or more probably the rod, of an enlightened nurserymaid. We outgrow them as the moral sense of the community is increasingly brought home to us. But the existence of a passion is not disproved by the fact that it may be eradicated or coerced. However, we need not confine ourselves to the psychological revelations of the nursery or the schoolyard. Their testimony will be confirmed if we turn to examine the condition of children of larger growth. For the point to be ascertained, be it remembered, is not whether cruelty is not condemned by the intelligence and conscience of mankind, and therefore controlled or kept in the background in proportion as moral restraints supersede the action of brute force, and civilization takes the place of anarchy and barbarism. That nobody denies. The present question is whether cruelty be not, like lust or envy or malice, one of the vicious propensities of human nature. And the more directly we come into contact with nature in its unsophisticated state, and apart from the moral or religious influences which have done so much to transform it in the course of ages and in the countries we are most conversant with, the easier will it be to get at the true solution.

One of the poets of the day, whose genius—warped and one-sided as it is—it would be mere affectation to deny, has contributed something towards an elucidation of the subject. The main and avowed speciality of Mr. Swinburne is to be classical. Pagan deities, Pagan poetry, Pagan morals, and Pagan modes of thought are his delight, and their Christian counterparts his aversion. We are not now inquiring how far he has worked out his ideal successfully. Except in his first poem, Atalanta, we think his classicalism is in many respects gravely at fault. What we wish to insist upon here is that, according to the Swinburnian conception of classical poetry and life, its two leading passions are cruelty and lust. This is no doubt most prominently brought out in the poem which in form has least pretence to be classical. The Mary Stuart of Chastelard is a voluptuous tigress, combining the fierce lusts of Messalina with the cold-blooded cruelty of Caligula—a kind of psychological monster difficult to conceive of and impossible to exist. But the same idea runs through all Mr. Swinburne's compositions. It is the keynote of the volume of Poems and Ballads, which is cast in a classical mould. Now we are very far from saying that the ideal is true to nature, or true to classical models. Sensuality, when left to itself, gravitates more towards an easy nonchalant good-nature than towards fierceness. And classical sensuality, in its most highly developed and idealized form, as represented in Greek poetry and life, had no tendency to become cruel. It shrank with fastidious loathing from the sight of physical pain, and felt no temptation to inflict it. Mr. Swinburne has wholly misread his Greek models if he thinks he is reproducing their spirit in his sanguinary erotics. But the classical age of Greek poetry, though a period of gross moral corruption, was also a period of high intellectual civilization and refinement. When Rome, in the later days of the Empire, fell under a similar or a deeper moral degradation, and the intellectual life of an earlier period was losing its hold on the nerveless effeminacy of an effete generation of pampered Sybarites, the alternating passions of lust and blood which dominated society were very much what its modern admirer has too faithfully portrayed:—

> Then the gladiator, pale for thy pleasure,
> Drew bitter and perilous breath,
> Then torments laid hold on the treasure
> Of limbs too delicious for death;
> When thy gardens were lit with live torches;
> When the world was a steed for thy rein;
> When the nations lay prone in thy porches,
> Our Lady of Pain.

The Roman ladies who gazed in an intoxication of sensual delight on the writhing limbs of mangled gladiators in the Coliseum—may we not add the Spanish ladies who still gaze with cruel rapture on the ghastly horrors of a bull-fight?—certainly drew their enjoyment, such as it was, from sheer contemplation of intense physical torture. We may call it, if we choose, an acquired taste, but they seemed almost to suck it in with their mothers' milk. And a taste which can be so readily and so completely acquired by a whole population, and that in an age of exquisite material civilization, must have some natural instinct or passion to base itself upon. It would open out a fresh subject of inquiry, and a wider one than we have room to enter upon here, to ask what natural feeling lies at the root of this cruel pleasure in the infliction or contemplation of torture. Is it the sense of security which suggested the suave mari magno of the Epicurean poet? Or is it a latent consciousness of superior power, like the proud conviction of a girl of three years old that she can torment her two years old brother into a paroxysm of agonized naughtiness? Or is some subtler influence at work which the psychologist has still to unravel? For the present we must content ourselves with insisting on the fact, without pausing to investigate its causes.

LAMARTINE.

ONE-AND-TWENTY years ago the death of Lamartine would have been an event of European importance. At that time week after the beginning of the February Revolution, he wa already considered as the representative of order and moderation among colleagues who held various shades of opinion, from the decorous Republicanism of Marrast and Garnier Pagès to the Jacobinism of Ledru Rollin. The respectable classes of France were thoroughly frightened by a revolution effected by an extemporized city mob, and organized by an audacious minority chiefly consisting of the writers in two newspapers. It might possibly have been in the power of Lamartine, who, down to the very eve of the Revolution, had never joined the Republican party, to save constitutional government by supporting a regency when the high-spirited Duchess of Orleans took her son to the Chamber of Deputies. In another mood of mind the sentimental and impulsive orator might not have been disinclined to mediate between the Republic and the Monarchy; but he had lately written a romantic history or eulogy of the great Revolution, and at the moment it pleased him better to be a Republican leader than to become the protector and representative of an infant prince. If he had maintained the Orleans family on the throne, a responsible or free Constitution might perhaps have taken permanent root. It was in consequence of Lamartine's decision that the country was frightened into the acceptance, three years later, of the Imperial system against which educated Frenchmen struggle in vain. The temporary supremacy of the rabble was odious to all other classes of the community; but after the collapse of Parliamentary government the only alternative was to rely on the peasantry, who preferred an absolute ruler to an Assembly. During the anarchy which followed the flight of the King, respectable Frenchmen who had long associated the Republic with the Reign of Terror were to some extent reassured by the presence in the Provisional Government of an accomplished gentleman who had been a supporter of Royalty and a champion of the Church. The Opposition to Guizot had included Legitimists like Berryer, and dynastic Liberals such as Thiers and Berryer, as well as the Republicans of the National and Réforme, who ultimately made their moderate allies the instruments of their own unexpected triumph. Lamartine's eloquence had been employed in the promotion of the common cause; but his admirers scarcely understood, as he had perhaps himself never decided, which of many factions had attracted his sympathy. The part which he had taken in the establishment of the Republic was imperfectly known, and it was justly assumed that his instincts and sympathies would be opposed to the coarse violence of his more dangerous associates. Although he was but imperfectly trusted by his Jacobinical colleagues, he had given recent pledges to the Revolution; and in the Provisional Government itself there was a moderate party which needed a leader. Among the nine or ten bold adventurers who had appointed themselves to exercise supreme power, Lamartine alone possessed any considerable personal distinction. Louis Blanc, then a young man, had never shared in public life, except as a journalist; and of the other members of the Government not one rose above mediocrity. Lamartine also derived great power from the confidence of the defeated party, which, as it afterwards appeared, formed the great majority of the population. While the Republicans were flattered by the accession of their brilliant convert, the bulk of the community regarded him as the sole representative in the Government of their interests and opinions.

The hopes of those who trusted to Lamartine were partially justified by his subsequent conduct; and where performance fell short of expectation, prophecy, according to a well-known mythological law, has converted itself into history. For two or three months he floated on the surface of the popular tide, and sometimes he checked by an eloquent appeal the noisy violence of the mob. The common tradition that he saved France from Jacobinism is almost wholly fabulous. On one occasion he pacified a blatant mob which demanded a change of the national colours, by informing them, with doubtful accuracy, that the red flag had only been connected with the massacres of Paris, while the tricolour had made the victorious circuit of Europe. If his authority as a historian is sufficient to discredit his sincerity as an orator, he was in the habit of calming the people with solemn assurances entirely opposite to his practical intentions. In his characteristic history of the Revolution and of himself, he quotes at great length a speech in which he deprecated the injurious suspicion that the Provisional Government meditated the employment of the army to coerce the people. It was impossible, he declared, that a Government issuing from the victory of the people over the soldiery of Bugeaud should disgrace itself by relying on military force against the founders of its power. Having satisfactorily illustrated his own eloquence, the historian in the following pages proves his statesmanlike sagacity by the statement that he was at the time concentrating a large force in the Northern departments, with the purpose of throwing himself and his colleagues on the protection of the army, if the people of Paris proved themselves too insubordinate. Those who are acquainted with Lamartine's habitual use of language will believe either assertion according to their estimate of its comparative probability; or, by a judicious compromise, they may still more confidently infer that when he addressed the people he had neither renounced the thought of employing military force, nor made any definite arrangement for restoring order with the aid of the army.

When it was found that the dreaded Provisional Government practised neither murder nor confiscation, reviving confidence took the form of unqualified gratitude to the only Minister who was known to disapprove of the precedents of 1793. The most prudent act of the Government had been the formation of the so-called Moveable Guard, which, absorbing into its ranks the young ruffians and reprobates who had made the Revolution, turned their energies into a regular and useful channel. In after years many of the street rioters distinguished themselves as gallant soldiers in Africa and in the Crimea, and in the meantime they not only abstained from mischief, but were ready at the word of command to shoot any troublesome person who might follow their own recent example. There was, nevertheless, much cause for the alarm which was afterwards justified by the terrible insurrection of June. Large numbers of workmen were maintained almost in idleness at the public expense, and although Louis Blanc always denounced the national workshops, he loudly promulgated equally impracticable and perilous devices of socialism. Ledru Rollin, as Minister of the Interior, sent Commissioners to manage the elections in the Departments, with instructions drawn, according to common rumour, by Madame Dudevant, which recalled the memory of the famous emissaries of the Convention. Lamartine and his more moderate colleagues deserve credit for convoking the Constituent Assembly, against the wish of Louis Blanc, who desired to prolong the provisional dictatorship until the country was educated into Republicanism. A dozen electoral divisions returned Lamartine to the Assembly; and when it met, he was designated by common consent as its leader, and as the chief of the future Government. His administration of the Foreign Office derived a factitious lustre from his personal popularity, and he was supposed to have maintained peace, which had in truth never been endangered. The English Government had, in accordance with its habitual policy, accepted the Revolution as a fact; and the sovereigns of the Continent were trembling for the security of thrones which had been rudely shaken. If Lamartine had been an original and resolute statesman, he might have anticipated Napoleon III. by seconding the heroic adventure of Charles Albert, who had pushed the Austrians from Lombardy into the territory of Venice. The French Minister received coldly the overtures of the Piedmontese agents, only hinting that it might be possible to purchase the French alliance by the surrender of Savoy. His more daring successor in power may boast that, if he made a bargain with Italy, he performed the stipulated service before he demanded the price. A foreign policy at once tortuous and timid did nothing to redeem the domestic blunder which precipitated Lamartine for ever from the summit to which he had been casually lifted.

When the Provisional Government resigned its functions into the hands of the Assembly, the moderate majority determined to exclude the extreme Republicans from the Executive Commission which was to administer the Government. By common consent Lamartine was chosen as the principal member of the Commission; but with incredible perversity he refused to accept office unless the obnoxious name of Ledru Rollin were added to the list. The Assembly unwillingly acquiesced; but from that moment it withdrew all confidence from Lamartine, and the entire nation shared its change of opinion. The Republic and its founders were discredited by the scandalous riot of May, when Louis Blanc was carried on the shoulders of the mob into the Assembly; and the helplessness of the Government, and perhaps the complicity of one of its members, were reflected in the desperate civil war which raged for two or three days in the midst of Paris. When the insurrection of June was at last repressed, the inglorious career of the Government was summarily terminated, and Lamartine subsided for the rest of his life into a not unpitied obscurity. His biography, as far as it is a portion of history, begins and ends with the first three or four months of the ill-starred Republic. Before it was founded he was only an accomplished declaimer; and after June, 1848, he exercised no greater influence in France than the humblest elector. It is more surprising that he should have retained a legendary reputation than that his political importance should have wholly collapsed.

The conclusive judgment of competent French critics confirms Lamartine's title to the character of a poet, nor has a certain morbid languor of tone prevented him from securing many foreign admirers. No reader of the History of the Girondists can doubt his literary genius, which, like the kindred muse of Chateaubriand, was better suited to romance than to history. In composing his brilliant narrative he is so utterly indifferent to truth that he sometimes describes in ample detail events which, if they ever occurred, can by no possibility have been known. It is scarcely credible that he should have heard that Rouget de L'Isle, author of the bloodthirsty and bad verses which have been set to the national air, was everywhere pursued in his flight from the guillotine by the sound of the Marseillaise. It is impossible that any historian can know the details of the last hours of Petion and Barbaroux, before they perished in their solitude by starvation, or by the attacks of wolves. In far more important matters Lamartine's authority is absolutely worthless, as when, in an account of the battle of Waterloo, he kills eight horses under the Duke of Wellington, and makes the Highlanders rip up the horses of the French cuirassiers with their national weapon, the claymore. Even in recording his own experience he is not less indifferent to fact. Many statements in his history of the Revolution of 1848 are positively contradicted by Louis Blanc, who is both a practised historian and a man of honour. Probably it was in matters relating to himself that Lamartine was most thoroughly incapable of distinguishing between truth and falsehood. His vanity was marvellous in its extent and in its candour. In the account of his travels in the East he relates how Lady Hester Stanhope deduced from the beauty of his arched instep, which to uninspired observers seemed prosaically flat, the prophecy that he would be the first man in France. In a later work, writing of himself in the third person, he describes his own face and figure with complacent admiration; and his history of the revolution in which he took part is almost exclusively occupied with his own speeches and intentions. Although he was not considered orthodox, he declares that "M. de Lamartine had been created religious as the air is created transparent." "The political principles of Lamartine were those of the eternal truth of which the Gospel is a page." "His sole apostle was Liberty." It is true that he had a genuine love for liberty, and that he consistently denounced both Imperial tyranny and Jacobinical violence. The tenderness for Robespierre which he exhibits in the History of the Girondists proceeds from the interest of an artist in the central figure of his composition rather than from any tendency to sympathy with the pedantic and sentimental forms of murder. In personal appearance Lamartine bore some resemblance to Wordsworth, though his face was less rugged and weather-beaten. In look and manner he might have been mistaken for an Englishman, especially as he spoke the language with correctness and fluency. His genius and temperament were essentially and entirely French; and his place in literature has been most fitly determined by the judgment of his countrymen.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES.

THE unpleasant topic of which we are about to speak deserves notice, in spite of its unpleasantness, if only on account of its admirable exemplification of two great English principles—the principle of leaving everything alone, and the principle of preserving delicacy of language, even at the price of morality or of the national health. It is known to every one that one of the most fearful of known diseases—whose effects are specially distressing, not only to the sufferer, but to his descendants—is being constantly spread throughout the population. The most distinguished surgeons declare that it is hardly possible to speak too strongly of its disastrous consequences, and the returns from our army and navy show how seriously it affects the national resources. If such a disease had afflicted our cattle, the House of Commons would have postponed every measure of internal reform till it had dealt rigorously with the case. As it only affects the health of our soldiers and sailors, and of many thousands of innocent persons throughout the country, and as it is not exactly a subject for general conversation, nor even for more than occasional newspaper articles, Government can only approach it in the most cautious and tentative manner. Moreover, our extreme regard for the liberty of the subject is such, that we prefer that people should be permitted to go about freely spreading disease and death to this and future generations rather than that anything savouring in the slightest degree of coercion should be applied. Even now this theory is accepted as generally accurate. In the one case, however, of our military forces it is admitted by the most bigoted constitutional jurists that society which keeps men in an artificial state of life may also protect them from the ensuing consequences. We should not ourselves think it necessary to prove that society must have made a bargain with some fraction of itself before it can venture to stamp out an infectious disease, and to justify, for example, proper precautions against cholera or yellow fever, by establishing some special claim on the part of the population affected. The attempt to check contagious diseases of all kinds is surely amongst the most legitimate objects of legislation. However, we will not quarrel with the process by which even the most scrupulous sticklers for the propriety of leaving things alone, and saying nothing about anything, have convinced themselves that in the case of the army and navy certain precautions are permissible. This very qualified and guarded admission of the principle led to the passing of the Act of 1866, and the experience already gained shows decisively that the evils in question may be reduced to far more manageable dimensions. The same experience shows with equal distinctness that by observing certain conditions we may obtain still better results. A blue-book which was published last Session contains full evidence upon these points. We will shortly mention some of the facts upon which these conclusions are grounded, and may then confidently assume that the burden of proof lies upon those who would oppose the careful extension of the precautionary measures by which this terrible evil has been already perceptibly reduced.

The first point is, that wherever the Act has been put in force the results have been distinctly favourable. At Aldershot, for example, the number of cases was reduced by one-third in the space of two months from the first introduction of the measure. At Plymouth, in the course of four years, there was a progressive diminution amongst the seamen from 270 to 156 cases. Similar results have been observed elsewhere; and not only has the number of cases, but the intensity of disease in each case, perceptibly diminished. It is obvious, however, that in such places as Plymouth or Aldershot the experiment is tried under very unfavourable conditions, for the simple reason that the influx of fresh troops from unprotected districts is constantly renewing the danger. It is manifestly hopeless to stamp out a contagious disease by selecting only two or three places in the midst of the country, without being able to draw a cordon round them. In accordance with this we find that the success in certain places where there are greater natural opportunities has been far more decisively marked. In Malta, for example, we find from Sir Henry Storks' evidence that the disease has been reduced to a minimum, and that lately, in a garrison of 6,000 men, there were only eight cases. At Sheerness, the only place in England where the Act has been thoroughly put in force, the Committee of the House of Lords tells us that "the disease is now almost obliterated." Encouraged by these successes, Government is carrying out similar measures in Hong Kong, Ceylon, Jamaica, Barbadoes, and elsewhere. A striking confirmation of these results may be found from foreign experience. It is enough to mention two facts. The loss from illness in the English army amounted in 1866 to more than seven days' service of the whole force; in 1868, the imperfect application of the Act had reduced this loss to less than six days. In the French army, at the same time, the loss was only three days. A more startling fact is that, during the year 1860, one in four of the Foot Guards in London was affected, whilst at the same time only one in fifty-six of the troops in Brussels suffered from the same cause. In other words, it is perfectly clear that the disease can be restrained wherever proper precautionary measures are taken, and that the success is in proportion to the completeness with which the protected district can be isolated.

Another point which deserves particular notice is the facility with which the Act has been worked—owing no doubt, in great part, to the discretion shown in its introduction by the police authorities. There is a mass of ignorant prejudice which might easily be alarmed into indiscriminate opposition by anything which, however unfairly, could be construed into oppression; and for every reason it is desirable that the unfortunate classes affected should submit without reluctance to the working of the measure. As a matter of fact, it seems that everything has gone on more smoothly than could have been anticipated. The authorities unanimously agree that there has been no perceptible reluctance amongst the female patients to be retained in hospital until they have been cured. The adoption of the French system of registration would be out of the question in the present state of public opinion, and it is at least very doubtful whether it is not really open to many serious objections, which we need not at present discuss. It is important that it should be understood that the purpose of the Act is simply the suppression of disease, and that no one is more directly benefited by its working than the patients. Mr. Romaine, the Secretary to the Admiralty, informs us that there "has never been any difficulty, or any scandal of any kind in any place." He thinks that the women "now understand the working of the Act, so far that they consider the doctors and others who look after them as their best friends." Indeed, so long as due discretion is shown, there can be no reason why any persons should object to being cared for at the public expense until they are relieved from a terrible disease. The treatment, moreover, is favourable to morality from a higher point of view. Dr. Barr, the surgeon at Aldershot, states that there is a marked improvement in decency of behaviour of the unfortunate class admitted to the hospitals. Some of the women have been able to support themselves by honest industry after their discharge. A considerable proportion have been returned to their friends, or induced to enter reformatories, and this fact is by itself an answer to those who object to what they call public recognition of vice. Its existence is certainly admitted to be a fact; and we may add that it is a fact which there is not much apparent sense in ignoring; but the tendency of the measure is to diminish, not merely the consequences of the vice, but its extent.

The undoubted results thus far obtained are satisfactory; but they show conclusively that, in order to obtain any important improvement, the Act must be extended. Not only has it been willingly accepted in military stations, but the inhabitants of many important towns, such as Bath, Newcastle, Liverpool, Cheltenham, Exeter, and others, have shown themselves favourable to its introduction. Some facts are alleged, which are well worth consideration, to show that it might be applied even to London with much greater facility than is generally supposed. It is indeed equally obvious that it should only be introduced gradually, and with every precaution necessary to secure the co-operation and approval of the inhabitants. There would of course be a certain expense to be incurred in providing hospital accommodation, although the diminution of the disease would, it is to be hoped, lead to the ultimate diminution of the expense. One of the worst results of the present system, or absence of system, is that, from the want of any adequate accommodation, the diseased persons are forced to continue at large, spreading disease amongst the population. The general nature of the scheme which seems best to meet these conditions will probably be that suggested by the Lords' Committee. The Government should have power to extend the Act, first, to all naval and military stations; and, secondly, to any place the inhabitants of which apply to be included, and can give proof that they have adequate hospital accommodation, and sufficient means of providing for the religious and moral supervision of the inmates. A measure embodying these principles would, we imagine, have the general consent of all sensible men; and it is to be hoped that the unsavoury nature of the subject will not prevent its being efficiently supported.

One other point of great importance may be noticed. The Admiralty have ordered that sailors shall be carefully inspected on arriving at a port, before the crew is allowed ashore. The necessity of this regulation is obvious, and it is at least equally obvious that a similar measure is required for the mercantile marine. Till now, by that curious felicity which sometimes distinguishes our laws, the masters of ships, whilst generally bound to provide their men with medical attendance in cases of illness, have been allowed, in this special class of contagious diseases, to turn them adrift in the port. The consequence is that, as a French physician tells us, a "frightful mass of contagion" is annually imported, and he suggests the propriety of some kind of international arrangement on the subject. The French complain, we are told, that our sailors, as coming from a country where there is no regulation, introduce the greatest quantity of disease into France. The importance of this subject is so obvious, that we hope it will not be overlooked in any measure which may be introduced by Government.

THE SCOTCH EDUCATION BILL.

THE Duke of Argyll's Scotch Education Bill is now before the country, and it may be safely pronounced to be an excellent one. The leading propositions contained in it are simple enough. They are, in the main, nothing but an extension of the principles which have guided Scotch education since the Reformation. These principles, stated shortly, are—compulsory rating, local and central supervision, and inspection. Upon these John Knox founded the parochial system which lasted till the disruption of the Kirk in 1843. The rating was in the early time confined to land which yielded a large annual rent, and was applicable to the support of only one school in each parish. The local supervision was exercised by the parochial minister. The inspection was conducted by members of each Presbytery, composed of the ministers of the neighbouring parishes. And the central authority was vested in the General Assembly of the Kirk, to which detailed reports upon the schools were presented by the different Presbyteries throughout Scotland. Since the disruption, this organization has broken down. For a quarter of a century Scotland has been subjected to disquietude through contending denominations, and the Scotch, being an orderly people and more interested in the well-being of their families than in the rivalries of their clergy, are heartily tired of the present state of things. The Government measure therefore proposes to relieve the Churches of the burden of education, and to place the management of all the schools in the country in the hands of a representative Central Board. The principle of compulsory rating is no longer to be confined to the rich landowners, but will be extended to all ratepayers. A committee of ratepayers will be formed in each parish or burgh, and this committee will appoint the teachers and attend to the local wants of the school. The inspection of the schools will remain with the Committee of Council, but will be extended to every school in the country, and certain modifications will be introduced into the Revised Code, so as to render it more applicable than it is at present to the peculiarities of Scotch education. These are the main principles of the new Bill. It is obvious that there is nothing very revolutionary in them. Whatever may be thought of them here, they have been recognised and acted on in Scotland for nearly three centuries.

But though there is nothing revolutionary in the measure, the effect of it on Scotch education, if carried out into law and well administered, it is difficult to exaggerate. There are at present in Scotland something like 5,000 elementary schools of one kind or another. Of these 5,000 schools, rather more than a third are under official inspection, and rather less than a half are efficiently conducted. But many of the latter class are placed by denominational zeal where they are not wanted, and there are miles and miles of country, and streets and streets of thickly-populated towns, without a good school of any kind. Hence only a small proportion of children of school age is sufficiently educated, and in a population of three millions of people, there are nearly a hundred thousand children at no school whatever. It will be the first duty of the new Board to remedy these evils, to see that there are schools wherever they are wanted, to discourage those that are unnecessary, and to ascertain that all are satisfactorily conducted. The Board will thus at once come to operate upon something like 3,000 schools. This will keep it in employment for some years to come; and five or six years hence, if the measure is well worked, the number of schools doing efficient service in Scotland will be more than doubled, and the whole school population without exception will be attending good schools. This will of itself produce something like an educational revolution in the country.

The Board, however, will have difficult and delicate duties to perform before this ideal state of things is reached. The foundation of new schools in districts at present unprovided with them is a simple matter. Evidence is produced that a school is wanted in such a locality, and the Board proceeds to order the formation of a School Committee. This Committee imposes a "school assessment" upon the locality, receives a proportional grant from the Committee of Council, builds or buys its school under the approval of the Board, selects its schoolmaster out of a body of competent teachers, whereof a register is kept by the Board, pays him his salary out of the assessment, and there is an end of the matter. After that, it is the duty of the Board and the Committee of Council, through Her Majesty's Inspectors, to see that the school is kept efficient. In Scotland it is unlikely that the Board will experience much difficulty in establishing such new schools as are required. In England it might be otherwise; but the Scotch peasantry and the village populations value education, and the parsons and magnates of the land are fully aware of this. And whether they like the new scheme or not, they must accept it, feeling the influence of popular impulse from below.

But the settlement of the new schools is only part of the duties of the Board. There are, as we have said, some 2,000 schools in Scotland doing efficient work, and with them the real difficulties of the Board begin. Of these some 800 represent the old parochial schools, and the remainder consists chiefly of schools connected with some one or other of the contending denominations. "The Scotch nation," it has been well said lately, by one who knows his countrymen, "is tenacious—it is not intolerant." This is true of the Scotch nation, but not of the Scotch ecclesiastic. He is both tenacious and intolerant, and when the Board comes to deal with him in his capacity of school manager, it will find him as prejudiced as any English rector, and more vigorous. Power is given in the Bill for the gradual adoption and absorption of all existing denominational schools into the national system, and it lies with the present school managers to propose, and with the Board to accept or refuse the proposal for adoption. In most cases it is probable that the Board would accept the proposal, but not in all. In some parishes, for instance, there may be two rival denominational schools within a hundred yards of each other, doing precisely the same work, and doing it well. But one school is adequate for the wants of the population. Both wish to be adopted, and a choice must be made. Here the Scotch divine will have full scope for the development of his tenacity and intolerance, and it is impossible that the action of the Board in such a case can be satisfactory to the divines of both the denominations. This is only one instance of the difficulties before the Board, but it is sufficient to show the kind of responsibility it will have to discharge. It is obvious from this that the strictest and most judicial impartiality will be demanded from the functionaries composing the Board, and that any suspicion of a leaning towards one denomination or another would be fatal to the institution.

And this leads to the question of the religious difficulty in Scotland, and how the Bill proposes to solve it. The solution of the problem is very simple. It is like the snakes in Ireland. There is no religious difficulty. "Scotch parents," as the Duke of Argyll said, "don't care a halfpenny to what religious body schools may belong, but send their children to the best master, whether it is an Established Church School, a Free Church, or a United Presbyterian." Hence the Bill takes no notice of the religious teaching in the schools, beyond the provision of a very strict conscience clause. Denominational inspection, which has done much harm in Scotland by multiplying unnecessary schools, by causing unnecessary expenditure of public money, and by producing a want of uniformity of inspection, almost to the extent of raising suspicion of unfairness, is to cease for ever. For the future the inspectors are to take no cognizance of religious instruction, unless the school managers desire such cognizance to be taken. This clause will probably give rise to opposition, and the old worn-out cry will be raised, that there is no guarantee for the religious education of the people. But this can easily be answered. In the first place, it may be shown from the Commissioners' Report that religious instruction is just as well given in subscription schools, and others unconnected with any denomination, as it is in those that are under the superintendence of the churches. In the second, we may expect with confidence that the ratepayers will be as desirous of having their children instructed in religion as the parsons now are of attending to the spiritual wants of their parishioners. On the ground therefore of the so-called religious difficulty there is no danger of formidable opposition.

And indeed it seems improbable that the Bill will be seriously opposed on any ground. It has the sanction of a large body of Commissioners, eighteen in number, selected from all political and religious parties in Scotland. It has been before the public for more than a couple of years as a draft Bill appended to the Commissioners' Report, and as such has been subjected to the rigid criticism of everyone who takes any interest in the subject, and it has come well out of that criticism. A few alterations in detail have been made, but the principles of the draft Bill are retained, and, so far as we can judge, the measure has been accepted in Scotland, and received with acclamation even by the Tory newspapers in this country. It is therefore difficult to see from what quarter any opposition can arise. The English clergy may look upon it as an experiment on a worthless subject, and they may fear that compulsory rating in Scotland will lead to compulsory rating in England. But the Scotch have had compulsory rating for three hundred years without affecting us, and we have not yet got within sight of permissive rating. The introduction of undenominational inspection into the Privy Council system is, no doubt, an innovation which the English clergy may look on with anxiety. But the Scotch people may possibly, and very reasonably, claim to relieve their anxiety by taking the matter of inspection into their own hands, and by insisting on a still further severance from the Committee of Council than the Bill contemplates. But that is a matter upon which it is unnecessary to say more at present.

MR. EDWARDS'S DISMISSAL.

THE country has been deprived of the services of one of its greatest, and therefore least appreciated, men. The Court of Bankruptcy loses an official assignee, Mr. Edward Watkin Edwards, and one more skilled in the theory and practice of the great art of insolvency could not have been found for the post. Cuique in suâ arte credendum; and the man who helped the business of Overend and Gurney to ruin, and whose function it was at once to stave off bankruptcies and to compass them, was, one would have thought, the square man in the square hole, or the crooked man in the crooked hole; anyhow, he was the man for the place. It is not, however, on his suitableness for his post, or on the suitableness of his post for him, that Mr. Edwards's services have been dispensed with by the Chancellor, but upon a ground purely technical and formal. Lord Hatherley, in his order of dismission, very slightly, and we must say with but scanty and almost contemptuous indifference, refers to Mr. Edwards's character and accomplishments. Mr. Edwards is dismissed because he happens for a long time to have acted in direct violation of a very plain and intelligible order of the Court, and in contempt of law. When Mr. Edwards became official assignee, or at any rate during his tenure of office, an order of Court was made in 1852, expressed in very clear language:—

"No Official Assignee shall either directly or indirectly carry on any trade or business, or hold or be engaged in any office or employment other than his office of Official Assignee."

Whether Mr. Edwards ever at any time obeyed this order is not plain; but as he himself admits, when the Bankruptcy Act of 1861 was passed, or rather in contemplation of its being passed, he "determined," to use his own explicit words, "to make an effort to increase his general income" by doing the very thing which the order of Court of 1852 prohibited. The Act of 1861 was about to commute the fees by which the official assignees had been hitherto paid into a fixed salary of 1,500*l.* per annum. This arrangement, Mr. Edwards says, "would seriously affect his income." Rem, quocunque modo rem: the first thing present to Mr. Edwards's mind was Mr. Edwards's shrinking income; the last thing was the law. So Mr. Edwards "determined to increase his income," and accordingly took suit and service with Overend and Gurney. This, says Mr. Edwards, was no secret; everybody knew it; and therefore, as it was public, it could not be wrong. Moreover, if it was contrary to the letter of the law and the order of the Court, no less a person than the Chancellor of the day (who was "the then Lord Chancellor" of the day, namely, 25th January 1864? perhaps some obscure annals may be found to reveal this piece of information), to whom Mr. Edwards's connexion with Overend and Gurney was made known, "must have been satisfied on the subject."

And here we are bound in justice to say that Mr. Edwards makes out his case, so far at least as this is concerned, that "the then Lord Chancellor" of January 1864 at least condoned, and to some extent excused, and therefore justified, Mr. Edwards's extra-official engagements and income. "The then Lord Chancellor," like this pleasant month of March, came like a lion into the matter, and went out of it not at all in leonine fashion. When the matter was brought before him by the report of certain public proceedings in the Bankruptcy Court, his Lordship writes in the gravest and strongest language:—"The Lord Chancellor requests that Mr. Holroyd will in open Court make strict inquiry of Mr. Edwards whether or not he is an agent for the house of Overend and Co. If this charge is well founded, dismissal must follow." The inquiry in open Court does not seem to have taken place; the Chancellor's letter was shown to Mr. Edwards, and, in reply, Mr. Edwards admitted that he had, as aforesaid, "determined to increase his income" and to undertake arbitrations, &c. for Overend and Gurney. The result was—why of course the result was that, as Mr. Edwards bravely and honestly admitted his defiance and contempt of the law, the threatened and unavoidable dismissal followed. No such thing; the Chancellor's letter was withdrawn, and Mr. Edwards continued from that time to this to ply the two strings, or rather some twenty strings, to his bow, of which his official assigneeship was the least. Mr. Edwards justifies this course, and says that "the then Lord Chancellor" accepted practically his justification, and moreover his interpretation of the rule of Court. "I consider the rule was limited to office hours, and that I was not precluded from taking any such employment as did not interfere with my hours or official duties. And I submit that that must have been the opinion of the Lord Chancellor in 1864; for after I stated my view, and it was matter of public notoriety and discussion that I had been engaged on behalf of Overend and Gurney, and in the transaction as to which the then Lord Chancellor called on me for explanation, I never received any reprimand or admonition from him or any one else, nor any intimation that I was wrong, or that I was not at liberty to act as I had acted."

This is fair enough and true enough. It does not justify Mr. Edwards's violation of the law, or make his conduct less culpable, or make his very unnatural interpretation of the rule of Court a bit the more trustworthy, to show, as he does, that he openly announced his determination to defy the law, and that he was quite able to misrepresent and misinterpret and wrest the plain sense of the plainest words; but it is something for him to show that, by silence at least, "the then Lord Chancellor" agreed with, or did not show that he disagreed with, this ingenious, but not very ingenuous, reading of the rule of Court. It is a justification of Mr. Edwards—we ask his pardon for the parallel—much akin to that of which the presiding genius of the Judge and Jury Club lately availed himself, and successfully, when he said that the police were quite aware of his, and of his great predecessor Chief Baron Nicholson's, funny ways and sayings, and never interfered with them. Let Mr. Edwards, therefore, have the moral benefit, as he has had the immoral profit, of those five years during which Justice kept the bandage over her eyes closed, and winked at Mr. Edwards and his little extra-official employment. What Mr. Edwards may reasonably complain of is the hardness and technicality and austere literal-mindedness of the now Lord Chancellor of 1869, as contrasted with the pleasant, loose, and elastic laws of interpretation accepted by "the then Lord Chancellor" of 1864. What concerns us is, however, not Mr. Edwards's sorrows, but this unpleasant contrast between these two occupants of what Lord Campbell was pleased to call the marble chair. Lord Hatherley seems to be made of stuff hard as his seat; and if the "then Lord Chancellor" was right in his connivance at Mr. Edwards's reading of the rule of Court, it seems to stand to reason that Lord Hatherley is wrong. And of course vice versâ; if the one is only properly strict, the other was too lax. But here we pause. To attempt a contrast or comparison between two Lord Chancellors, and to say which has certainly forgotten his duties, is not pleasant work to undertake, nor does it tend to edification. To prove that a Lord Chancellor at any time shared in Mr. Edwards's very peculiar notions about duty, official or personal, and therefore is pro tanto indirectly responsible for not a little of the scandal which has attended Mr. Edwards's acting out of his principles, would do no good.

Be this, however, as it may, our immediate business is with the victim of hard-hearted Lord Hatherley's inability to misunderstand or misread the order of Court. Lord Hatherley, indeed, adds to the injury done to Mr. Edwards by dismissing him the insult of saying that substantially he does not believe a word he says or said in his famous interpretation of the rule of Court restricting its effect to office hours. "Mr. Edwards," says our present prosaic matter-of-fact Chancellor, "must be well aware that the object of the 122nd rule was to secure the entire time and services of the official assignee"—which is the exact thing that Mr. Edwards says he never was aware of. And, with something like an ugly pleasantry, the Chancellor goes on to turn Mr. Edwards's flank, and to convict him of an awkward inconsistency, into which, like all other clever men, he has been betrayed by his superhuman cleverness. "I took the Overend agency because it did not interfere with office hours, or with my devotion to my official assigneeship"; and Mr. Edwards might have added, he also took a seat at the Boards of the Crystal Palace Railway Junction, of the famous London, Chatham, and Dover, of the Windsor and Greenwich Hotels, of the Enamelled Iron, of the Metropolitan Extension, of the General Irrigation of France, Companies. He undertook each and all of these offices, because to take them was not inconsistent with the order "not to hold or be engaged in any office or employment other than his office of official assignee." And, moreover, he took them because they did not interfere with his official usefulness or diligence, or with the proper discharge of his duties; which honest boast the Lord Chancellor, not without slyness, contrasts with the parallel statement, dropped by misadventure on Mr. Edwards's part, that the services which he rendered to Overend and Gurney alone, though only extending over one year, had entailed "ceaseless anxiety and never-ending hard work, mentally and physically," or, as he elsewhere puts it, work "constantly occupying him till midnight, and all after he had done the ordinary day's work which is sufficient for most men." What Mr. Edwards had to plead, and did plead, on the one hand, was that his extra-official work was so heavy and tremendous that the result was his "broken health, which sufficiently tells the tale of his ceaseless labour." On the other hand, that this severe work was a mere trifle not worth mentioning, just an amusement and bagatelle for the spare time which hung heavy on his hands. What the Lord Chancellor has felt is, that the Buckingham of finance, agency, and directorship—

> A man so various that he seemed to be

is by far too energetic, too capable, too smart, for such jog-trot work as that of an official assignee from ten to four. Let Mr. Edwards take heart. A successful and lucrative future is still within his grasp. In London such as it is, the London of financing and Company-hatching, such gifts as his will command a market. The little cabined, cribbed, confined Paradise of Basinghall Street is, to be sure, shut against him; but a larger world is all before him, and Providence—or something else which has guided him hitherto—will be his guide. Basinghall Street may once more witness his triumphs and re-echo his famous name.

LORD GOUGH.

THE military career of Lord Gough began as far back as 1794. After fourteen years of active and varied service he had become Major of the 87th Regiment, and went with it to Spain in 1809. He commanded this regiment with great distinction at the battle of Talavera. Early in 1811 Massena lay with a great army before the British lines which defended Lisbon, unable to attack and unwilling to retreat, while Soult, who commanded in Andalusia, had marched towards the frontier of Portugal with a view, which he afterwards abandoned, of co-operating with his brother Marshal. He left Victor in command of that part of his army which was besieging Cadiz, and an Anglo-Spanish force, profiting by Soult's absence, attempted to raise the siege by landing at Tarifa, and taking the French lines in reverse. The English portion of the combined force which undertook this enterprise was commanded by Sir Thomas Graham, afterwards Lord Lynedoch, and one of the regiments employed in it was the 87th. The Spaniards were more numerous than the English, and their General held chief command. He so managed matters that, when Victor marched from his lines to attack him, he allowed his adversary to occupy the height of Barrosa, which was the key of the allied position. Graham, who had a general's eye and mind, saw the danger and devised the remedy at the same moment. The great military historian Jomini says that Graham "attacked with impetuosity the French columns, which, astonished at so much vigour, fell back"; and he adds that this combat did much honour to the English General and his infantry. English historians tell how Major Gough led the 87th Regiment in a charge in which it captured a French eagle, and they claim for their countrymen a victory which Spanish apathy left unimproved. The siege of Cadiz was not raised, but the moral effect of the battle was highly important. It showed that our infantry, led by officers like Gough, were irresistible by the French. Later in the same year the British took possession of Tarifa, an ancient town, surrounded by an old wall, without ditch or outworks, seated on the extreme southern point of Spain facing Africa. Its situation checked the coast traffic by which the French army besieging Cadiz obtained supplies, and Soult determined to take it from the allies. With infinite labour siege-artillery was brought against the place, and was used with such effect that the English and Spanish commanders began to think of abandoning the defence. But Major Gough of the 87th thought only of holding the place to the last, and he was supported by an engineer officer, and by a naval captain who assisted with his ship and crew in the defence. The town of Tarifa is cut in two by a watercourse down which flows periodically a torrent, and the entrance which would be thus afforded into the town was barred by a tower, with a portcullis, in front of which were palisades. Down this torrent-bed marched a French column of assault, while behind the portcullis, Gough, at the head of his regiment, awaited them. The assault was repulsed with heavy loss, and the besiegers, depressed by failure and suffering in health from exposure to floods of rain, were compelled to abandon their enterprise, and leave Tarifa to the English who had held it so tenaciously. We believe that Lord Gough was the last survivor of the officers to whom the honour of this defence belonged. The siege was pressed with great determination by Soult's lieutenant, Victor, and any faltering among the defenders would have given him the place. But Gough was not the man to falter. There have been many more skilful officers than he, but no officer ever surpassed him in that resolution which made any force that he commanded certain to do in some way the work entrusted to it. The assault on Tarifa was received on the last day of 1811. The next conspicuous service of Gough was at the battle of Vittoria, which was fought on the longest day of 1813. Wellington, moving from the frontier of Portugal, threatened the French communications with their own country, and obliged them to retreat northwards from Madrid. At Vittoria, which lies on the road from Madrid to Bayonne, the French army made a stand, to cover the enormous train of baggage which it was carrying into France. The combined attack of the English on three sides of the position of Vittoria was successful, and the French army was not only defeated, but overthrown and ruined. The 87th Regiment, under Gough, played an important part in this great battle, and the bâton of the French Marshal Jourdan was among the spoil taken by them upon this field. In the battle of La Nivelle, which opened the road to France, Gough was severely wounded. From the end of 1813 he saw no more of war until 1841, when he went as a general to China.

Whatever may be thought of the military capacity of Lord Gough, we cannot but admire the good fortune which gave him chief command in several of the most memorable battles which have been fought by English armies. He counted seventy-five years of service, and the experience which is gained by directing the movements of great armies in the field of war was possessed, we may almost say, by him alone among the servants of the British Crown. He was at the head of the land force employed against China in 1841, and, as Commander-in-Chief in India, he earned the title of Conqueror of the Punjab, by which the French saluted him when he went to the Crimea to invest their Generals with the insignia of the Bath. In 1843 he defeated the formidable Mahratta host in Gwalior, and in 1845 and following years he fought four great battles, besides smaller actions, with the Sikhs, and finally broke the power of the most warlike and best disciplined army that was ever arrayed against British authority in India. The memory of these fierce struggles has faded by the lapse of twenty years, and the Crimean war and the Indian mutiny have supplied newer themes for the poet and the orator. But still the names of Moodkee, Ferozeshah, Sobraon, Chillianwallah, Goojerat, have only to be mentioned to recall the sensations of a time when the agony of suspense excited by the news of dubious and bloody conflicts on the Sutlej gave way to rapturous exultation at the news which followed of victory, triumph, and revenge. The British empire in India rocked to its foundation on the night when Lords Gough and Hardinge lay down among their troops under the fire of the Sikh artillery, and hardly hoped for more upon the morrow than to die with honour upon the ground they held. From that field they might advance to unexampled power and prosperity, but irretrievable ruin must attend upon retreat. After the death of Runjeet Sing his fierce soldiery acknowledged no control, and there could be no peace in India until it was exterminated. This was the task which devolved upon Lords Gough and Hardinge when the Sikh army crossed the Sutlej and encamped on British territory, in defiance of our army which lay in observation in the neighbourhood. Lord Gough's method of fighting was simple in the extreme, and he studied little else than to get his enemy in front and go straight at him. He led an army in India as he led the 87th Regiment in Spain, and he had little to offer in the way of tactical or strategic guidance beyond the famous war-cry, faugh a ballagh, which he taught to the Royal Irish Fusiliers at Vittoria. But if he depended, as has been said, solely upon the courage of his troops, the source from which they derived that courage was his indomitable will. From the first day to the last of his long and honourable career he was ready to say to those who served with or under him:—

> I will set this foot of mine as far
> As who goes farthest.

And his deeds would have been answerable to his words.

The Sikh army crossed the Sutlej on the 13th of December, 1845, and five days afterwards was fought the battle of Moodkee. The troops were in a state of great exhaustion, principally from the want of water, which was not procurable on the road, when, about 3 P.M., information was received that the Sikh army was advancing, and the troops had scarcely time to get under arms and move to their positions when the fact was ascertained. The country was a dead flat, covered at short intervals with low thick jungle, and dotted with sandy hillocks. Our cavalry turned the flanks of the Sikh army and swept along its rear, while our infantry completed its dispositions for attacking the infantry of the enemy, now almost invisible amongst wood and the approaching darkness. When our infantry advanced it met with such opposition as might be expected from soldiers who had everything at stake, and who had long boasted of being invincible. This stout conflict was maintained during an hour and a half of dim starlight, and amid clouds of dust which arose from the sandy plain. The enemy was driven from his position, and seventeen of his guns were taken, but victory was dearly purchased by the loss of Sir Robert Sale, the defender of Jellalabad, and of many other gallant officers and soldiers. Be it remembered that some regiments of the British army had marched twenty miles on the day of this hard-fought battle. Three days afterwards the Sikh army, largely reinforced, and possessing a numerous and powerful artillery, occupied the position of Ferozeshah. Lord Gough, to whom the Governor-General, Lord Hardinge, served as second in command, made his arrangements for attacking this position at 4 P.M. The Sikh artillery far surpassed ours in number of guns and weight of metal, and also, as is said, in rapidity of service. Our infantry forced its way into the entrenchments and mastered some of the guns, but the Sikh infantry, which lay behind them, fought in a manner worthy of its fame. Night fell while the conflict raged. The enemy retained possession of a large part of their original position, whilst our troops, intermingled with theirs, kept possession of the remainder, and finally bivouacked upon it, exhausted by their gallant efforts, greatly reduced in numbers, and suffering cruelly from thirst, yet animated by an indomitable spirit. The enemy continued to harass our troops by the fire of artillery wherever moonlight discovered our position. We learn thus much from Lord Gough's own despatches. We know from other sources that retreat was suggested, but Lord Gough counselled to stand firm, and that his own and Lord Hardinge's personal intrepidity in storming batteries at the head of bands of English gentlemen and yeomen at length achieved a partial success and a temporary repose. Thus the long night wore away. But with daylight came retribution. Our infantry formed line and advanced and drove the enemy clear out of his position. It took seventy-three pieces of cannon, and remained master of the whole field. Yet the Sikh leaders brought up fresh battalions and more guns, and opened a heavy fire upon our troops, now occupying their position, to which, as our ammunition was exhausted, we could not answer by a single shot. Once more our weary soldiers were having recourse to the sabre and the bayonet. But the show of readiness sufficed. The enemy drew off; and thus ended the two-days' battle of Ferozeshah, which was gained over the Sikhs, not by an army of Englishmen—for of that we should not think much—but by an army composed largely of native troops to whom a few Englishmen had to show the way, and who without English example would not have stood one hour before the Sikhs. And even English regiments hardly prevailed over these formidable warriors. It is said that at the battle of Aliwal, where a successful charge was made by our 16th Lancers upon Sikh battalions, "the ground was more thickly strewn with the bodies of victorious horsemen than of beaten infantry." When news of the battle of Ferozeshah came to England it was felt that a few more such victories would ruin us. But in February, 1846, occurred what Cromwell might have called the "crowning mercy" of Sobraon. The Sikh army now occupied an entrenched camp having its rear upon the Sutlej. To attack this camp Lord Gough employed heavy artillery, under the direction of skilful engineers. But when it came to the actual assault our troops had to go in as before, and the Sikhs met them as they always did. After more than one repulse, by determined courage, and at heavy cost of life, our infantry forced the lines, and then there fell upon the Sikhs a defeat which was almost destruction. The river was in their rear, and the bridge of boats crossing it was broken. In their front and on their flanks were victorious enemies whom their barbarities had exasperated. Among them and around them were slaughter, confusion, and dismay.

The Sikh power was broken, but not destroyed. In little more than two years this turbulent soldiery again called Lord Gough into the field. The battle of Chillianwallah cost as many lives as Sobraon, and it was almost barren of result. The 24th Regiment of the Line lost more than half its numbers in this battle, and people at home began to doubt whether the soldiership of Barrosa and Tarifa was not an expensive kind of generalship for a large army. Accordingly, Sir Charles Napier was despatched to the scene of action, but before he arrived Lord Gough had finally defeated the Sikh army in the great battle of Goojerat. Nobody doubts that Napier was a far better general than Gough, but his opportunities of action and distinction were incomparably smaller. Napier commanded a regiment at Corunna, but never afterwards in Spain. Gough commanded a regiment, as we have seen, at Talavera, Barrosa, Vittoria, and La Nivelle. Napier did great things with a small force in Scinde. Gough commanded in chief in the most arduous contest in which his country was engaged in the forty years which elapsed between Waterloo and the Crimean war. He was the son of an Irish officer of militia, whose ancestor had emigrated from Wiltshire to Limerick. The English stock transplanted to Ireland has produced much goodly fruit, and none better than this ensign of 1794, who has died a Field-marshal in the present week. When our army lay for many weary months before Sebastopol it was said that the Irish officers used to sigh for one hour of the leadership of the fiery old hero of Barrosa and Ferozeshah. "He would soon have a go in at the damned place and be done with it." For some purposes perhaps bad generalship is better than good; and certainly the highest military skill is of little value without that determination which Lord Gough so conspicuously displayed. When we think of what he was, and that Ireland gave him to us, we may well forgive all the trouble that is caused by that wayward partner in the Union. Nature, which has denied to her coal and iron, has given in compensation a breed of incomparable soldiers.

SPRING EXHIBITIONS.

THE success of the Dudley Gallery is a sign of the times. The number of works sent to this, the Fifth General Exhibition of Water Colour Drawings, amounted to nearly two thousand; more than seven hundred are hung, and upwards of one thousand have been either rejected from lack of merit, or crowded out from want of room. Within a week of the opening of the Exhibition the sales had reached 2,000*l*. Yet it were absurd to contend that the art quality of the collection is in a ratio with these high figures. Indeed, the present Exhibition falls below the standard of some of its predecessors. The success of the Dudley Gallery, then, may be ascribed less to the absolute excellence of its contents than to the wisdom of its scheme and the wideness of its scope. The term "General" implies that the Exhibition represents a large constituency. Thus, while the Old Water Colour Society includes, under the qualification of members and associates, 56 artists, and the Institute 77 artists, the total number of exhibitors present at this moment in the Dudley is not less than 393. These comparative facts may in some measure account for the good fortune that has attended the experiment of an Exhibition open to the whole of England and the world besides. A wide constituency secures extensive sympathy and support, but numbers do not necessarily imply selection or quality; they rather represent the democracy of art, with all that the democratic element involves. The Dudley, in fact, casts a capacious net into the sea, and draws on shore odd fishes. It will easily be understood how much of curiosity attaches to the opening of a Gallery where, by chance, may turn up some prodigy of genius not known before either in the realm of nature or of art.

Mr. Simeon Solomon sends three subjects, which severally represent his peculiar style under the three phases of classicism, mediævalism, and sentimentalism. "Sacramentum Amoris" is a kind of hybrid between a Roman statue and a Life Academy model of soft rosy flesh. A little more firmness of articulation, as for example in the knee-joint, and more strength in the modelling generally, would have given this graceful and ideal, but somewhat feeble, figure the force and nobility which it now sadly lacks. Still we incline to look leniently upon even the faults of a work which, in its motive, rises superior to the literal and low naturalism to which the English school is now for the most part committed. Mr. Solomon is one of the very few artists who, through beauty of form and elevation of thought, redeem the nude from all taint of impurity. The picture is pretty in idea as it is pleasing in colour; specially happy in flush of fancy is the lambent flame sweeping around the figure as the symbol, the life-giving light, of this "Sacramentum Amoris." We must, however, be permitted to protest against the irreverent use, not only of Christian thought and the most sacred Christian associations, but of the text taken from the opening of St. John's Gospel—"et lux in tenebris lucet, et tenebræ eam non comprehenderunt." No Christian could permit this piece of profanity to find place in his house. Of the two remaining contributions of Mr. Solomon, the one inclines, as we have said, to mediævalism, the other to modern sentimentalism. "A Saint of the Eastern Church" is somewhat of a satire on humanity; the picture has been painted for the sake of the saint's wardrobe; the figure serves as a clothes-horse, yet the work may be excused for the beauty of its colour. Mr. Solomon's third drawing, "A Song," brings us down to modern days and mincing manners, to drawing-rooms and pianos, to lovemaking and die-away sentiment. The scene has the merit of being to the last degree unreal; all the women are in love, and all the men in consumption. This new Song of Solomon is most mystic and meaningless. Yet the painter will probably be forgiven by reason of the rare art qualities which he brings to bear upon whatever theme he treats. His colour is brilliant, his light clear and unclouded, his sense of beauty subtle. Could we but see in these creations more physical force and individual character, a great future might be in store for the painter.

After Mr. S. Solomon may follow, by the law of contraries, Mr. E. J. Poynter, a young artist singular for firmness in drawing and unromantic reality in treatment. That Mr. Poynter has acquired a certain academic mechanism may be judged from the academic honours recently and deservedly conferred upon him. Few painters have at so early an age obtained entrance into the Academy. This newly-elected Associate has wisely been studying in Venice, and his contributions to the Dudley show the benefit which his somewhat hard and cold manner has derived from contact with the colour of the school of Titian. Four illustrations to the "Prodigal Son" have evidently kindled into fire under the ardent compositions of Veronese and Tintoret. The artist, indeed, in seeking colour, has been here too indifferent to composition. Instructive comparison is suggested by kindred subjects—"La Dogana and Island of St. Georgio," by Mr. Poynter, and "Venice from the Public Gardens," by Mr. Donaldson. Mr. Poynter, as we have said, is firm in drawing. Mr. Donaldson, on the contrary, cannot draw—a charge substantiated by the ludicrous figure-pictures here exhibited. But how much of beauty and poetry, how much of nature's truth, can be gained by harmony of colour merely, is at once apparent by this subtle and delicious study made by Mr. Donaldson of Venetian sky and water. This drawing shares the intensity of Holland's sketches without their mannerism. Mr. Donaldson may find it to his advantage to exchange figures for landscape; nature is persuasive of sobriety and sanity. There is nothing like steady sketching for bringing a man to his senses. Certainly, an artist with a fine sense of colour may paint, even though he cannot draw; only to him will be denied a first rank. The English school has long shirked drawing, and shakiness in form is specially felt in the Dudley, not to mention other semi-amateurish Galleries. Amateurs are accustomed to take refuge in sentiment, and when their emotions grow very strong they follow the example of the Greek painter who saved the feelings of his spectators by hiding the scene from sight. This may be one reason for the prevalence of twilights and veiling shadows in the nascent school of Piccadilly. But well-trained exhibitors, such as Mr. Wells, Mr. Calderon, Mr. Poynter, and Mr. Marks, illustrate the truth of the dictum that, when drawing of the figure is mastered, all becomes easy, whether it be the delineation of a building, a mountain, a boat, or a tree. For thought and maturity of style, a couple of designs by Mr. W. Cave Thomas may here be commended; the line is firm, the form studious and expressive. Neither can we pass by one of the smallest, yet assuredly one of the most artistic, of studies in the Gallery—"Marion," by Mr. T. Wells, a simple yet masterly head worthy of comparison, for free, firm, and dainty touch, with Lawrence's early and careful drawings. Nor must we forget Mr. Calderon's defiant, slashing figure, "La Fileuse," painted with the confidence and command which knowledge alone can give or justify. This achievement claims remembrance chiefly for the technical process employed, that of tempera on canvass. The effect gained is rather forcible than delicate, the material imposes decisive outline, broad demarcation of form with boldness in laying on of colour, while it precludes repainting or retouching. Thus the method has disabilities as well as advantages. Among the merits are a breadth and simplicity, a brilliance of light-giving power, comparable to the process of fresco. This mode of painting in tempera on canvass, which has obtained special favour in "the St. John's Wood School," may be turned to useful account in the mural decoration of public buildings and private dwellings which seems gaining ground notwithstanding the discomfiture of fresco-painting at Westminster.

The Dudley, as we have already indicated, rivets attention by a not unpleasing medley of mediævalism and modernism, of nature and of nonsense. So accustomed is the visitor to look for eccentricity, that he may pass over sobriety and truth as common-place. Still, did space permit, we might mention with no stinted praise drawings studious and true by Messrs. Luxmoore, Lobley, Mills, Muckley, and Small, Miss Juliana Russell, and Miss Lucy Madox Brown. Miss Madox Brown will be greeted with special pleasure, as well for her father's sake as for the picture of rare promise by which she makes her début. "Summer Flowers," by Mr. Townley Green, and "The Calf," by Mr. Pinwell, are clever, but not original; these artists are but too evidently trying to outrival Mr. Frederick Walker in the "Old Water Colour." The Dudley, as already indicated, draws to itself observation by bringing into public view some of the latest phases of our English school. Thus we meet here with the prevailing tendency to throw an atmosphere of poetry and the pale haze of romance over common things and ordinary incidents of life. The method adopted may be nothing more recondite than lighting up a wall of white plaster and red brick, or placing a figure, well chosen for force and form, against a well-toned background. Mr. Edward Binyon, in such drawings as "L' Arania e la Filatrice," shares this felicity of treatment with M. Hébert, and other French artists. The Gallery, indeed, is rather conspicuous for unobtrusive grays and tender half-tones, which barely escape vague generalities—such, for instance, as the sketchy drawing of "St. Peter's Port, Guernsey," by Mr. Field Talfourd. Mr. Harry Goodwin is another artist who goes in for tone, especially in a low key; indeed, "Autumn—Evening" becomes all but invisible on a dark day. Messrs. Harry and Albert Goodwin are alike too blue in their shadows. Mr. Arthur Ditchfield is yet another artist who gains repose and seeks sentiment in monotone. His "Sunrise on the Thames" is very lovely and impressive. This awaking into day—deep shades of night dispelled at break and blush of dawn—speaks to the mind as a thought in nature. Foreign styles are reflected in the Gallery in the vigorous and broad landscapes of Madame Bodichon and Alphonse Legros. There is much spirit and firmness of hand in the drawing of "Aloes near Tlein-cin, Algeria," by Madame Bodichon. Two impressive but repulsive landscapes by Legros—"Souvenir d'Espagne," and "Don Juan showing his Castle to Eglina"—have something in common with the grand old styles of Gaspar Poussin and De Loutherbourg. These pictures, however, cannot be deemed good of their kind—they are opaque and black; nature might have taught this artist how to have escaped monotony and dreariness by modulations of light and colour and tenderness in the half-tones. It is the misfortune of Legros, whether he paint a figure or a landscape, to mistake roughness and rudeness for uncompromising truth; yet this artist's style may be accepted as a wholesome protest against the prettiness and triviality of our English school. The more largeness of thought and vigour in treatment we can import from the Continent the better; already our school shows signs of approaching reaction. Thus artists such as Mr. C. R. Aston and Miss Anna Blunden who have been accustomed to dot in subjects with the point of a fine pencil, are becoming less scattered. Our painters indeed at last seem to understand the obvious distinction between a study and a picture, and the mockery and delusion of "Pre-Raffaellitism" already belong to the past. The next danger may come in an opposite direction. Mr. Arthur Severn paints the sea in fine frenzy rolling; throwing reason to the winds, he loses the curves and levels of his waves. Still this drawing is grand as an idea; the sky is full of storm, smouldering fires, and gusty winds. How greatly poetic aspects and dramatic actions in nature now usurp the attention of our artists may be seen in the drawings—alike, though most unlike—of Mr. J. C. Moore and Mr. Henry Moore. Solemn, poetic, and tranquil is "The Yellow Tiber," painted by Mr. J. C. Moore. "Thunder Clouds," by Mr. Henry Moore, rise as a grand vision in the sky; these clouds, piled high as mountains, dark in storm and thunder, are illumined by brilliant bursts of sunlight. Mr. Ruskin, in a well-known passage, complains that people do not look at the sky; our artists, we are glad to think, are beginning to open their eyes to the wonders and beauties of cloudland. In conclusion may be noted some few etchings; among the number are brilliant works by Mr. Philip G. Hamerton.

Mr. McLean has opened his "Fourth Annual Exhibition of Oil Paintings, British and Foreign." The collection, which is small but choice, derives its chief interest from examples of Continental schools. The English pictures—with few exceptions, such as the magnificent work "The Thunder Cloud," by the venerable John Linnell—are in no way out of the ordinary run. "The Artist Model," by Mr. W. P. Frith, R.A., is certainly commonplace enough. People, however, may in this Gallery pleasantly refresh and extend their knowledge of French, Belgian, and Dutch schools, represented by two of the Bonheur family, by Fromentin, Bouguereau, Jalabert, Merle, Frère, Duverger, Zeim, Koller, De Jonghe, Bischop, &c. A better opportunity may perhaps occur for passing under review these well-established masters. Among artists less known, we may say that we have never seen, even in the Paris Salon, better examples of Charles-François Marchal, Léon Perrault, or of Édouard-Alexandre Sain, names which appear in the list of medallists of the École des Beaux Arts within the last few years. We may also add that it is with pleasure that we mark the progress made of late by Madame Peyrol, the married sister of Rosa Bonheur. As for Auguste Bonheur, a picture here exhibited confirms an opinion formed in Leeds, that the brother bids fair to head the family. Yet we would ill afford to lose any one of them. It is with reluctance that we leave this small collection, so great is our enjoyment of French and other foreign schools.

"The Society of Female Artists" has opened its "thirteenth season." We have catalogues before us extending as far back as 1858, and we scarcely recall a single Exhibition that was not declared at the time to be an advance upon its predecessors. The pitch, then, to which this thirteenth step in a progressive series has reached is more easily imagined than described. We can, however, with all sincerity declare that the Gallery this year does present an improved appearance, and we willingly accord to the Society itself a most praiseworthy endeavour to serve a good cause. People, however, will persist in asking wherefore there should exist at all any Society exclusively "female," especially at a time when it has become the ambition of women to be as men. One thing certainly seems a little strange and perverse, that while women would, if permitted, rush to the hustings to save the nation, they do not care to paint a good picture to serve this female Society. We would venture to suggest that they should, as a preliminary to absolute rights, do the one thing well for which nature has evidently fitted them. Women, by taste, by fancy, and imagination—by, in short, those intuitions of character, of truth, beauty, and goodness which are essentially womanly—seem peculiarly suited to art-work. And yet this "Society of Female Artists" has been allowed to reach a "thirteenth season" without giving adequate proof of what women can do.

THE THEATRES.

THE short time that has elapsed since the pieces which were brought out for the especial exhilaration of the Christmas holidays began to lose the bloom of novelty has been more than commonly remarkable for rapid productiveness. The Haymarket led the way with a three-act piece, called Home, freely adapted by Mr. T. W. Robertson from a four-act comedy by M. Émile Augier, entitled L'Aventurière. In this the chief personage is a gentleman who, having in early youth escaped from the domicile of a stern father as a confirmed scapegrace, comes back, with a fortune acquired in the United States, to find the "governor" entangled in the meshes of a designing "adventuress" anxious to secure a wealthy husband, and thus to feather her own nest and that of her brother, a loafer of the most unquestionable kind. In order to defeat her machinations, he conceals his real character from his father, and pays court to the lady himself; and as his manners are fascinating, and he has moreover succeeded in making her believe that he is a Count in disguise, he wins her heart through the medium of her head, and she is, as she thinks, on the point of eloping. The old gentleman, interrupting the flight, is at first enraged with his guest on account of his supposed breach of hospitality; but the real state of the case being explained by his daughter, who alone is in her brother's confidence, he blesses the son who has freed him from the fascinations of the siren. The adventuress, when defeated, becomes interesting, and gives a summary account of her own life, which proves that her disposition, naturally good, has been perverted by evil counsels, chiefly administered by her brother. And what makes her situation more pathetic, the passion with which she has been inspired by the pious son has grown into a genuine feeling, though it originated in interested motives. The chief object of this piece is to furnish Mr. Sothern, who represents the returned prodigal, with an effective character; the embarrassment which he displays in an indirect declaration to the young lady whom he is supposed really to love affording him an opportunity of indulging in some of those practical pleasantries in which he has more or less delighted since he first appeared as the creator of the immortal Lord Dundreary. The autobiographical speech, sensibly and unaffectedly delivered, has elevated the professional position of Miss Ada Cavendish, who plays the adventuress. The cool, impudent brother, whose keen eye to business no quantity of alcohol can dim, is an admirable character in the hands of Mr. Compton.

Of more importance is Mr. Robertson's other play, a comedy entitled School, which has been brought out with immense success at the Prince of Wales's Theatre, where it forms one of a series composed of the same author's earlier works—Society, Ours, and Caste—which were produced at the same house, and performed by essentially the same company. The story of a pupil-teacher in a seminary for young ladies is fancifully connected with the tale of Cinderella, which, on the ascent of the curtain, she is discovered reading to her admiring schoolfellows. Edith, as she is called, is treated harshly by the governess, kindly by the governess's husband, and falls into disgrace by conversing too long in the playground with a young nobleman who has come with a select party to witness a school-examination. Expelled from the seminary, she ultimately reappears as the bride of the aristocrat by whom she was brought into trouble, and likewise proves to be of gentle blood herself. That the fairy tale may not be forgotten, the first gift of the young husband to the young wife is a glass slipper. The plot of this piece is extremely slight—more slight, in fact, than the German play, called Aschenbrödel, upon which it is founded. But it has enabled Mr. T. W. Robertson to introduce a number of characters who exactly hit the company for which he writes, and who are convenient mouthpieces for much good dialogue, both smart and sentimental. Edith and her noble lover are the poetical pair, who discourse about each other's shadows by moonlight in such very German fashion that one is surprised to learn that their words have not been furnished by Herr Benedix, the author of Aschenbrödel. These two interesting personages could not be better played than by Miss Carlotta Addison, a young and rising actress, and Mr. H. J. Montague, who has made a speciality of juvenile lovers, and is, in his line, without a rival. Mr. Sidney Bancroft, who for some years was generally laughed at by critics as a "stick," but who is now established as one of the best representatives of the "heavy swell" to be found in London, has his place in the new comedy as a high-bred cynic; and it is the mission of Miss Marie Wilton, who appears as the liveliest and wealthiest girl in the school, to laugh him out of his cynicism, and convert him into her most humble adorer. Mr. Hare—a gentleman distinguished for the accuracy with which he depicts oddities of the most various kinds, and who is absolutely necessary to a piece constructed according to the type established at the Prince of Wales's Theatre—is fitted to a nicety with a nearsighted, puzzle-headed old gentleman who ultimately proves to be the father of the modern Cinderella. The good-natured schoolmaster by Mr. Addison, and the less good-natured schoolmistress by Mrs. Leigh Murray, are both good, substantial characters; and the bevy of young ladies who compose the rank and file of the seminary, and among whom lines suggesting a variety of temperaments are scattered broadcast, help to enliven the scene, though they have but little to do with the fable. Altogether there is a harmony between the piece and the persons engaged in its representation that renders School the pleasantest dramatic exhibition of the day.

The sprig of rue, however, has not been wanting to Mr. Robertson's cup of prosperity. Ninty-nine hundredths of the people who had seen a clever piece admirably acted had been perfectly satisfied with their evening's entertainment; but the other hundredth comprised a travelled gentleman who wrote a letter to the Times revealing the fact that the German play, Aschenbrödel, was the basis of the much-applauded School, and adding that Mr. Robertson's work was nothing but a translation. Hereupon a debate arose which, conducted through different journals, deserves to be remembered among the curiosities of theatrical literature. The relation of Mr. Robertson to Herr Benedix was soon settled by an elaborate article in the Times, which contained a full analysis of Aschenbrödel, clearly showing that the Englishman had indeed availed himself of the skeleton fashioned by the German, but had written entirely new dialogue, had created several new characters, and had even altered the structure of the Teutonic skeleton to no inconsiderable degree. But the thirst for controversy was not to be so easily slaked. Mr. Robertson and his School fade into the background, and we get an interminable debate on the subject of dramatic originality in general, and the length to which an imitator may go without incurring the charge of plagiarism. If he had stated at the outset the exact amount of his indebtedness to Herr Benedix, Mr. Robertson, it is justly said, would have prevented this flood of discussion; but it may be observed, on the other hand, that dramatists of all nations have usually been slow to confess their obligations to each other, and that it is rather hard to charge a gentleman with exceptional toughness of conscience when he simply conforms to a code which, however lax, has been admitted and acted upon for centuries. However, the hardship in the case of Mr. Robertson has its palliation. Through the crash of conflicting opinions, School is the best-advertised piece of the day, and everybody makes a point of seeing it.

Home and School are, in fact, the two chief successes of the season, and confirm an already expressed opinion that the public is getting weary of mere "sensation," and requires something in the shape of writing and good acting. That attention to decorative accessories will ever so completely cease that a papered wall with two old-fashioned chairs in front of it will be accepted as the symbol of the well-furnished drawing-room, is neither to be expected nor desired. We have learned the art of stage arrangement at a somewhat heavy price, and our acquirements, such as they are, for good or evil, must be preserved. The very play of School is put upon the boards after a fashion which makes some of the scenes so many "spectacles" on a small scale. The wood in which the school-girls listen to the fairy tale, the grouping of the listeners, the manner of disposing the moonlight while the lovers utter their pretty pertnesses and sentimentalities, all conduce to give the tale that appearance of reality which modern audiences have learned to regard as indispensable. It was when the taste for reality in external details of the stage threatened to supplant all interest in essentials that it became apparently dangerous to dramatic art.

The reaction in favour of neat writing and good acting which has occurred in the course of about six months has led some Utopians to believe that a day is at hand when everything like melodrama will vanish from the theatre, and universally educated humanity will luxuriously contemplate a series of genteel comedies spiced with a little romance. This is a sort of reformation that is not by any means on the cards. The enjoyment of comedy presupposes a sympathy with certain social prejudices and proprieties which a large mass of our fellow-subjects cannot possibly acquire. To persons who are utterly unacquainted with the delicacies of refined living, and whose lives are spent in a struggle for non-luxurious existence, a tale that involves anything less than a fight for life and death will appear trifling and insipid. In the so-called "palmy days" of the drama, when tragedy and comedy alone composed the dramatic banquets offered to the public, it was generally found that the humble classes cared little for comedy, but always looked upon tragedy as attractive. The real Melpomene, classic or romantic, is now a neglected muse, but the interest in deadly collisions to which she once responded is not extinct, and to the end of time, unless human nature greatly alters, there must be pieces in which somebody is killed, and in which incidents occur involving the safety of life or limb. When tragedy loses its hold there must be melodrama, under some name or other, and as long as this serves as a vehicle for writing and acting it is still entitled to some respect. Perhaps Mr. Watts Phillips's new piece, Fettered, now played at the Holborn, stands on the boundary-line to which modern melodrama may safely go, if it would not pass over to the obsolete condition which even transpontine managers have lately learned to repudiate. When a serious domestic interest is to be excited, the Englishman looks as naturally towards an imprudent marriage, with bigamy for its probable contingent, as a Frenchman looks towards adultery. Thus the principal personage in Fettered is an adventurous villain who, having decoyed a wealthy girl in her teens into an unhappy marriage, commits a forgery which earns for him a sentence of transportation, and afterwards coming back to begin life afresh, accidentally renews his acquaintance with his long-liberated wife by entering her house as a burglar. The "crack" turns out a better speculation than he had expected; for, recognising the lady of the house, and rapidly calculating his own value as a social nuisance, he remains to extort where he had merely intended to rob. So daring are his schemes, and so fertile is he in resources, that one cannot conjecture how his career, which includes a project of marrying a second heiress while the first is alive, would come to a full stop, were not a water-mill in which he takes refuge from the police stricken by lightning. The mill, destroyed in such a manner as to allow the escape of the innocent, while the guilty one is annihilated, has reminded some critics of the old-fashioned Miller and his Men; but there is nothing in common between Mr. Phillips's play and that famed representative of the melodrama of the past. The adventures of Grindoff belonged to a region perfectly familiar to our playgoing fathers, which was peopled with conventional robbers distinguished by their very gestures from the rest of humanity, and which might indifferently be called Bohemia, Spain, Italy, the Black Forest—anything but England. Mr. Phillips's play, on the other hand, is an exaggerated picture of modern London, leading to one of those mechanical displays which will always be found useful in melodrama; and, till he is thrown on his concluding "effect," he shows considerable tact in the structure of his story. Let us add that one of the main attractions of the piece is the character of a thievish vendor of birds, acted by Mr. George Honey with wonderful humour, and not ill-provided with telling points of dialogue. Tom Tit, as he is called, is somewhat low company, but when we reflect that his shop contains a stock of real birds and rabbits and dogs, we are rejoiced that so much live humanity can flourish unswamped by the mass of brute vitality which, we trust, is a farewell tribute to the fading taste for vulgar realism. As times go, Fettered is not a bad piece.

If, however, Mr. Watts Phillips has furnished the Holborn with a melodrama which, with the aid of capital stage-management, sustains a certain amount of pleasurable excitement, he has failed utterly in a piece called Not Guilty, which is perhaps the most incomprehensible drama ever produced on any stage. The main object of the work—that of making Mr. Emery represent two personages, one an estimable military officer, the other a desperate ruffian—is in itself a cause of confusion, for the characters are not strongly contrasted, nor is any striking situation obtained from their mutual resemblance. And, in addition to the complexities that arise from the fundamental idea, there are complexities of detail which render the enigma altogether insoluble, however wise the Œdipus.

A respectable mistake committed by Mr. Palgrave Simpson, who has arranged for the Princess's Theatre a series of pictures, some of them startling, in which Madlle. Beatrice represents Marie Antoinette, but which really never become a play at all, and a very coarse specimen of the old domestic melodrama, entitled Red Hands, and brought out at the St. James's Theatre, complete the list of novelties for theatrical London.

REVIEWS.

DR. WINSLOW ON COSMICAL REPULSION.*

THERE are many signs tending to prove the present time to be in many respects a critical one in the history of physical science. More especially is this the case in the broadest and most extensive field to which the science of physics seeks to extend its powers—that, namely, of the cosmical forces, with their ultimate nature and laws of operation. Since the publication of the Principia the progress of cosmical science has been one of unmixed triumph for the law of gravitation, conceived as a principle of attraction inherent in all matter, applicable to all bodies, terrestrial and celestial, pervading all space, and capable of explaining the motions and periodical changes which successive observations brought to our view in our growing knowledge of the universe. Of late years, it cannot be denied, a suspicion has been gaining ground that the monopoly, so to speak, enjoyed by this magnificent and triumphant hypothesis is liable to question. Not that the slightest doubt exists, or need be started, as regards the absolute truth or the universal applicability of the law of gravitation. Certain facts and phenomena, however, of great physical importance, which had either escaped the notice of illustrious men from age to age, or have been only brought to light by aids to observation not within their reach, have opened new and almost startling fields of speculation and discovery in relation to this momentous theme. Anomalies have not seldom been encountered in the study of nature by the single light of the established hypothesis. In the application of mathematics to physical facts and observations, cases have been found to resist every form of analysis based upon the exclusive truth of that assumption, or at best recourse has been had to a treatment through the use of empirical or exceptional formulæ aside of the original law. A query has thus been raised, in the minds of many astronomers and physicists, whether some subtle principle antagonistic to attraction does not also exist as an all-pervading element in nature, and so operate as in some way to disturb the action of what has generally been considered by the scientific world a unique force.

It is the aim of Dr. Winslow's recent work on Force and Nature to establish the existence, and to trace the fundamental laws, of a repulsive force in nature complementary to the attractive force inherent in matter. In following out this thesis he has shown great subtlety and strength of reasoning, combined with much width of observation and a marked power in generalizing from facts. This is not the first time that his views upon this important problem have been submitted to the public. As early as the year 1853 a treatise was printed by him on Repulsion as a Cosmic Force. In justice to the originality of his speculations Dr. Winslow feels called upon to explain that he was at that time unacquainted with the Theoria of Boscovich, in which that learned Jesuit presented, in 1745, the hypothesis of repulsion, and attempted its mathematical development as a middle range of speculation between the theories of Newton and Leibnitz. Acute and even prophetic as were Boscovich's ideas, they seem to have made no impression either upon his own or subsequent times, nor have they proved to Dr. Winslow himself suggestive either of law or fact during his observations and researches in the same field. The general idea of "molecular repulsion" was indeed, as the author allows, as old as the early Greek philosophy, and was shadowed out in the poetical cosmology of Lucretius, though at no time brought within the range of inductive or experimental proof. A letter from Newton to Boyle is adduced by the author to show that the conception of a force unlike and opposed to gravitation had crossed the mind of that great philosopher, although his views in the main were but conjectural, and were never carried out with the same full and clear development as his other leading hypotheses. Hooke was led, in 1682, by his observations upon comets, to conceive a repellent agency proceeding from the sun, and urging the tails of those bodies in a direction contrary to that which gravitation would cause them to take. This agency he supposed to be light, and applied to it the name of "levitation." Conjectures, more or less vague, had been hazarded by Kepler, Euler, and others, that the light emitted by the sun might be a repulsive force per se; by others, that the sun's electricity exercises a repulsive influence upon distant bodies. The observations of Bessel upon Halley's comet impressed him with the idea of some element of power contrary to gravity inherent in the sun, and engendering in the resisting medium a condition opposed to that of the cometary particles, to which he gave the name of polarity, considering it as something akin to magnetism. In 1858-60 this idea was revived and expanded by M. Faye, who from his own observations, as well as those of Mr. Bond and others, upon the comet of Donati, deduced the idea of a definite repulsive influence exerted by the sun upon comets in general, but not upon the denser cosmic bodies, "née de la chaleur solaire, et exercée au loin par la surface incandescente du soleil." He dwells with interest upon the problem of determining the "duality of those forces which govern the heavenly bodies around us." Dr. Winslow is particular in drawing attention to the date of this declaration of M Faye, with the view of establishing his own claim to the priority of research and publication. It was in March, 1853, he tells us, that his first demonstrations of "repulsion as a planetary, solar, and universal force" were given to the public. Whether this essay or treatise was published in America or England we are not given to understand. Since that time his undertaking has been furthered and stimulated, not only by the general drift of scientific thought in relation to cosmical and molecular physics, but in particular by efforts like that of Professor Rankine in his Outlines of the Science of Energetics. The writer has also to speak of direct encouragement and assistance given to his labours by Baron Liebig, as well as by Faraday, from whom a most generous and encouraging letter reached him in the year 1858.

Molecular repulsion has, as a fact in physics, long been placed beyond dispute. The problem now before men of science—the problem which Dr. Winslow considers himself to have solved in the affirmative—is the extension of this law through all the acts and conditions of molecules to their grandest combinations and phenomena. It may one day be in the power of the calculus to assign to this universal law its definite and progressive quantities and functions. It may, on the other hand, be reserved for this discovery to mitigate or to clear up much of the reproach that in a certain sense may be said to hang over the department of analysis. There are certain anomalies or difficulties, such as those in the lunar theory, in the problem of the tides, and in the secular variation of the earth's mean motion, which are held, so to say, in suspense for lack of the means of integrating the equations involved. What if it should turn out that the real defect lay in the assumption of an attractive force as the sole cosmical condition of the problem? Telescopic science, enlarging and defining the aspects and the range of the stellar universe, has added its suggestive voice to the demand for a wider conception of cosmical force. The spiral form of many nebulæ, notably the great nebula in Orion, and anomalous forms like the "dumb-bell" in Vulpecula, seem at once to challenge the exclusive dominion of a law which would account only for regular curves of the second order. We do not find Dr. Winslow making as much as we think he might of these two branches of speculation. In his chapter on the Nature and Action of Force, he enters with fulness and vigour of reasoning upon the mechanical and crystallographic actions resulting from the primary forces in nature, and indicating in their products the "dual elements of attraction and repulsion" at work in every action of those forces upon aggregates or combinations of atoms. Although not treated by physicists in general as an active agent in crystallization, repulsion is, he rightly urges, without doubt as present and effective as attraction in arranging molecules into geometrical forms, and expanding these forms into their grandest and most perfect proportions. As attraction is known as the force that moulds the faces and produces the shortest axes of crystals, it follows that repulsion must be that which shapes their salient diameters and angles. In the evaporation of any saline solution, the particles are seen to repel and fly from each other like so many animalculæ or infinitesimal magnets, while in another direction they attract and attach themselves to one another, assuming finally regular and solid geometrical forms. "While attraction appears to be the basis of solidity, repulsion appears to assume a higher function, and to inspire in matter a spirit of selection, adjustment, arrangement, order and beauty, and to be an ascending force from inert or neutral atoms, adding to the solidifying force a kind of intelligent life-like endowment."

The same basic force may in like manner be detected underlying the great geological principles which resulted in the formation of the earth's crust. Without committing himself exclusively to any special earthquake theory, the student of nature cannot but recognise the persistent action of a repulsive force in the upheavals and fissures, the undulatory movements and shocks which disturb even now the equilibrium of the earth's surface, no less than in the vast basaltic and metamorphic deposits which denote a highly crystallizing energy at work in the earliest processes of solidification. The testimony of earthquakes to the truth of the hypothesis of terrestrial tension and repulsion is brought together with much diligence by the author, whose extensive travels in Central America and the islands of the Pacific have given him the means of personally testing and measuring the magnitude of those tremendous agencies. His reasoning, which is in part based upon, and in general compatible with, the careful observations and cautious views of Perrey and Mallett, goes to establish the existence of a powerful repulsive principle at work, radiating from the centre of the globe. From the immense stores of facts collected by these and other investigators, he thinks he can see his way to connecting this movement of the fluid mass confined within the solid crust of the globe with the varying attraction of the sun's mass at different portions of our planet's elliptical orbit. The general intensity of the seismic or plutonic force should be, according to this theory, inversely proportional to the length of the earth's radius vector. The tables he has put together do much to substantiate this view, so far as the numbers of recorded earthquakes with their corresponding dates are concerned. "For the six months during which the earth is most remote from the sun there stand 5,175, against 6,697 during the six months of nearest proximity of these two bodies, thus presenting a difference of 1,522 in favour of the perihelic arc." If we proceed to estimate, however, these phenomena in the ratio of their intensity, rather than of their frequency, the results seem to us, at first sight at least, far less decisive, even if any law can be deduced from them at all. Picking out from the long list of earthquakes those which seem to have been the most violent or extensive, we find them occurring without much difference at all periods of the year alike. Of the two great catastrophes at Lisbon, that of 1531 took place on the 26th of February, that of 1755 on the 1st of November. That of Lima, in 1746, was on October 28. That by which the coast of Chili was permanently raised was on November 19, 1822; while one of the most violent on record in this country—by which, says Hoveden, Lincoln Cathedral was rent, à summâ deorsum—took place April 15, 1185. That whereby parts of St. Paul's and of the Temple churches were thrown down was on the 6th of the same month, 1580. The late terrible shocks in South America occurred in the middle of August; the extraordinary eruption of lava in Hawaii during April of last year. The wonderful outbreak of Vesuvius described so graphically by Sir W. Hamilton extended with little intermission from November, 1765, to near the end of October, 1766. The greatest of anomalies is that lately recorded by Professor Phillips—that periodically Ætna is most active during the six months ending with July, Vesuvius during the six months beginning with that month. Dr. Winslow allows little or no force to the tidal influence of the moon upon the molten sea within our earth; else we might refer him to the most recent observations of Professor Palmieri, showing that the eruptive force in the case of Vesuvius is sensibly strengthened at the syzygies and weakened at the quadratures of the moon. It is so far in favour of his hypothesis that none of the fiercest shocks can be pointed out at exact proximity to the June solstice.

The phenomena of comets have been studied by the writer with an amount of pains and an acuteness of reasoning to which we regret that we cannot do justice. On the nature and causes of waterspouts he dilates, it seems to us, with more originality than conclusiveness. Instead of seeing in this phenomenon the simple force of atmospheric pressure, he believes it to depend upon a "positive radiation of the repulsive force as a definite cosmic principle, which acts upon the body of the waters to rarify, in like manner (although in an opposite sense) as attraction acts to condense them." From what source this radial impulse is imparted to the ocean, its surface being in the most signal instances calm at the time, and how it is combined with the rotary action of the descending currents of air, he forbears to speculate, though he might possibly trace here an analogy with the well-known synchronism of atmospheric and magnetic storms with disturbances of the earth's strata. He has done, however, good service to science by exposing the hollowness of referring these and similar systems in the working of nature to the mere hypothetical notion of "reaction":—

To call these and similar phenomena simple "reaction" explains nothing; for reaction, as a word, means nothing unless it represents an idea of direct and positive physical force. If it mean anything, then, it expresses a force opposite in action to that which drew the particles towards the centre and increased the density of the comet's mass as it approached the sun. If it be a force—a positive principle exerting action opposite to attraction—it is the equivalent of molecular repulsion, admitted by every writer on molecular physics, and which has already been demonstrated to be susceptible in our own planet of swelling into indefinite volumes, of producing general radial phenomena, and of becoming an absolute planetary force, the properties of which are everywhere similar, and always expressed in functions of a cognate and voluminously repulsive character. And it may well be concluded from all which precedes, that the final principle of nature which, throughout our globe, expands matter, creates the waterspout, guides the currents of vital force and molecules in the palm-tree and pine, lifts platonic fires thousands of feet high, shakes alike centre and circumference, causes flame to ascend perpendicularly from every radius of the sphere, is no other than a positive living force of repulsion—a principle of energy the opposite of attraction; and that it not only performs the same function in every planet and comet, but also is the identical principle which, in every star and controlling central body of a system, determines and guides all radial phenomena in their outward courses; and in our own system, proceeding from the sun, projects the comet's tail in all its radial aspects in the same manner as repulsion, ever insensibly radiating from the earth's centre, projects the ascending atoms or luminous currents from a burning taper. It is one and the same principle, as universal in its reach as gravitation, and ever antagonistic to it, whether in a molecule or a world. It is the occult principle of energy, the final element of antithetic power, per se, in polarity, as will be more clearly seen hereafter.

Dr. Winslow's volume is more conspicuous for bold and comprehensive generalizations than for the minute discussion of facts. Its tendency throughout is to take for granted, or to lay down as a solid basis for speculation, what may often be considered matter of no little doubt, if not opposed to the received current of scientific opinion. Thus the fundamental dogma on which he proceeds to build his entire structure of proof is that space is absolute vacuum. "No ether, either ponderable or imponderable, exists there." The hypothesis of an ethereal medium, either as engendering or transmitting light, or retarding the motion of bodies in space, will one day be classed, he thinks certain, with "phlogiston," vis inertiæ, and similar baseless figments of the schools. Light, in his view, is "only a compound resultant of molecular attraction and molecular repulsion." When to this highly sounding but vague definition he adds the still more obscure thesis that "light is generated by an equatorial product or function of thermic and other moleculo-chemical vibrations, in the same manner as magnetism is an equatorial product or function of electricity, and vice versâ," we feel compelled to postpone our acquiescence till the author has done more to clear up and substantiate his meaning. Again, he depends upon the assumed fact that "no physicist will admit that a single molecule has ever dropped out of the globe or been annihilated." Now, in our present imperfect knowledge, to say the least, of the ultimate nature of molecules, and of the possible state of tenuity in which the constituents of matter may exist in the volatile or gaseous form, is it within the scope of science to lay down that none of the mineral or other exhalations given off by the earth under the radiant heat of the sun, or the action of volcanic fires, may be so far radiated from our surface into the upper strata of the air as to be absorbed into the absolute cold of space, a consequent loss of molecular bulk being entailed upon our globe? But for some such compensatory loss, indeed, the increase of the earth's bulk known to result from the constant accretion of meteorites would lead by rapid and calculable steps to disastrous consequences. A French savant has worked out in figures the number of years that our planet would take, on the basis of this handicapping by so many kilogrammes of metal annually, ere its race was arrested in the vortex of the sun. We are glad to find the writer in entire accord with ourselves as regards one phase of the molecular or atomic theory, the assumed shapes of atoms or molecules. "Whether molecules possess hooks, or are cubes, spheres, ellipsoids, or of various other shapes whereby to be dovetailed or packed together, or whether they are surrounded with one or several atmospheres of ether or electric fluid, or any other unknown or fanciful condition wherewith to fill up the spaces between their irregular attachments and peripheries," these seem to him scientific conceits which have had or will have their little hour. They may serve as rhetorical flights to dazzle a half-instructed audience, or convenient aids to grasp what might be otherwise shapeless and intangible truths. But they have no place in the severe and sober nomenclature of philosophy. Allowing for a certain diffuseness and prolixity of style, besides that undercurrent of dogmatism and premature speculation we have already spoken of, Dr. Winslow's treatise is one which deserves thoughtful and conscientious study. He has the merit of breaking ground, in a tentative and suggestive sense, upon problems of the highest moment, which it may be reserved for some Newton of a future day to reduce to mathematical fixity and measure.

MR. ARNOLD ON CULTURE AND ANARCHY.*

WE all of us know pretty well by this time what to think of Mr. Matthew Arnold in his character of social philosopher. As a poet, there is much to be discovered about him, and there are many things to be said. As a critic, every competent person so much esteems what he has done that we could wish that he had done a great deal more. But as a person discharging the functions of a spiritual power, playing at being the English Socrates, most people have made up their minds about him, and do not take the trouble either to criticize him or, perhaps unfortunately for ourselves at this moment, to know how others would criticize him. Considering how short a time it is since Mr. Arnold came before the public in this character, only some four or five years ago, and considering how much mark he has really made upon English opinion in this interval, there is something curious in the fact that he should already stand in the ranks of the played-out. Most people think pretty much the same about the performance before us, which is in a manner the sum and substance of foregoing instruction; and when most people think the same about a writer, it is rather a good reason for believing that, as a source of truly vital influence, his hour has passed. We all of us, or nearly all of us at any rate, agree that Mr. Arnold has done a thoroughly good bit of work in familiarizing the English reader with clever nicknames for personages who were already only too familiar to him, for to give a clever nickname is to sap the position of the personage to whom you give it; that he has done a great deal by way of beginning towards cleaving the ugly block of national conceit, not in national excellences but in national defects; and that he has decidedly quickened and stimulated intelligence among many of the most important of those who ultimately form public opinion. Yet somehow we seem to feel that we now know all that he has got to tell us in this order. The general impression on the subject comes to something of this sort—that England has a systematic and disgraceful contempt for anything like the higher intelligence, that she omits from her scheme of valuable things the ideas of order, discipline, organization, logical harmony, and the like; and that this disrespect for brains on the one hand, and for effective organization on the other, must inevitably one day cause severe, if not ruinous, penalties to be exacted from her. There is a great deal of the most valuable and well-timed truth in this, and Mr. Arnold deserves the highest credit for the mixed perseverance and good-humour with which he has pressed it upon everybody who has ears to hear. Yet, once more, people appear to have the kind of sentiment about all this with which young folks come to regard a good and amusing trick of which they have found out the secret. For one thing, Mr. Arnold, in his papers on politics, has indulged without stint in a mannerism which at first was dazzling and effective to a high degree, but which is not of a kind to bear endless repetition and reproduction. There is another prose-writer in our day who practises mannerisms without end or limit, but Mr. Carlyle's mannerism is robust, poetic, infinitely picturesque and diversified. Besides, we are conscious that it carries us very deep down into things. On the whole, we are not conscious of any such thing in Mr. Arnold, with his rather monotonous fun about Mrs. Gooch and Mr. Frederick Harrison and the Rev. W. Cattle and the Editor of the Daily Telegraph. It does not go far into the heart of the matter. Those iterated allusions do not live and stir, as allusions do in Mr. Carlyle. We are not attempting, what would be very unfair, to blame Mr. Arnold because he is not as the old prophet, but are only trying to understand why, of two sorts of mannerism, each good in its way, one palls upon us and the other does not, and why Mr. Carlyle's objurgations of the times go on kindling a flame in the young mind, while Mr. Arnold's are already beginning to strike on the ear as a very old tune, which was never very much of a tune at any time. Perhaps fire is too violent and ungoverned an element for the fastidious critic to resort to, even in its metaphorical designation.

It is something more than a merely accidental coincidence that both Mr. Carlyle in his Shooting Niagara, and Mr. Arnold in the volume before us, should wind up their monitions with an earnest appeal to hopeful and ardent youth to have nothing to do with the barren and windy politics of the day. "At this exciting juncture," says Mr. Arnold, "while so many of the lovers of new ideas, somewhat weary, as we too are, of the stock performances of our Liberal friends upon the political stage, are disposed to rush valiantly upon this public stage themselves, we cannot at all think that for a wise lover of new ideas this stage is the right one." And he gives as a reason why abstinence from eager participation in the practical operations of politics is to be recommended, that the House of Commons must of necessity be the very last place in which the new movement can make itself effectively felt, as being inevitably the strongest and most enduring of the old organizations. The centre of movement is not in Parliament, but "in the fermenting mind of the nation, and his is for the next twenty years the real influence who can address himself to this." In this there is a great deal of truth, but one or two things suggest themselves as worth saying about even the truth that there is in it. For instance, there is a slight inconsistency in our serene adviser rushing incontinently as he does, not into the House of Commons, but into what are strictly House of Commons questions, such as Real Estate Intestacy Bills, Bills for legalization of Marriage with Deceased Wife's Sister, and so forth. If Mr. Arnold chooses to play spiritual power, he had better not meddle with the details which justly engage the temporal power. There can be no objection to his acting the part of Pope if he can find any acolytes, only let him restrain his comments within the sphere in which alone he claims competence. He is welcome to quote Bishop Wilson as much as he likes, but to talk like Bishop Wilson when the subject of discussion is a measure affecting the devolution of landed property in Great Britain in the nineteenth century is to be guilty of that kind of incongruity which the French might call saugrenu—a word which Mr. Arnold himself once so admirably explained to the English public. We are almost humiliated, as by seeing somebody whom one much respects and likes accidentally making a fool of himself, by Mr. Arnold's talk about the Real Estate Intestacy Bill. Of the measure itself we say nothing; it may be good, or it may be bad, but there is something pitiable in the sight of an able man plunging into criticism of a given measure, without having even felt the necessity of fixing the sort of matter in which the measure lies, and determining the appropriate standards and principles by which measures in that order may best be examined. It is all very well to talk about letting your consciousness play freely over subjects, but unless this play is regulated on some intelligible and scientific principle it is just as likely to land you in error as in truth. The supporters of equal division of land in case of intestacy say, according to Mr. Arnold, that by the natural law or fitness of things a man's children have a right to equal shares in the enjoyment of his property after his death. Mr. Arnold takes no pains to find out the real meaning of this statement, but, fastening on the word right, lets his consciousness play about that to the exclusion of all real sight into the nature of the controversy. His consciousness tells him that he has no rights, but only duties; it is unsafe to say that children have rights, instead of saying that parents have duties; nobody's consciousness tells him that to leave all our children an equal share in our property is a duty; and so on. We suppose that this is what is called "play" of consciousness as distinguished from that "work" of consciousness into which most of us are plunged. Contrast this sort of talk with the way in which Burke, whom Mr. Arnold admires, would have elevated a low and narrow fashion of handling a political subject. What we want in politics is a vigorous and intelligent use of political judgment, just as in chemistry or astronomy we ask for the vigorous and intelligent application of a trained chemical or astronomical judgment. And, applying such judgment to the issue about the devolution of real estate, we find that the partisans of equal division maintain that it is for the interests of the nation that our policy recognises equality of right in children in respect of personalty, that large estates are economically prejudicial, and so forth. The partisans on the other side deny that large estates are economically prejudicial, and assert that they are the very opposite; they urge the impolicy of unsettling a tradition that has worked well, refuse to admit any analogy between realty and personalty, and in various other ways make up a defence which shall stand the test of political discussion. There may be underlings who put forth parts of the case on either side, instead of the whole, and talk crudely about rights, vested interests, and the like; but the leaders in the House and in the press know perfectly well, and express with entire adequateness, the true nature of the controversy. Mr. Arnold has absolutely nothing to contribute to the subject, and he assumes to talk patronisingly and condescendingly where he has never taken the trouble to master the question. Mr. Bright and Lord Salisbury, though the one is in Mr. Arnold's vocabulary a Barbarian, and the other a variety of the Philistine, both use their consciousness to much better effect than Mr. Arnold upon this subject, simply because they know to the bottom what they are talking about, and have studied the form of argument proper to the matter, its standards and scope, much more scientifically than their admonisher with his vague play of consciousness. It may be wrong to go into Parliament, and it may be a pity, from the point of view of Hellenic culture, that anybody should be so lamentably Hebraised as to wish actually to pass measures for the improvement of the well-being of the country; but if a man is there, he would deserve as much contempt as even Mr. Arnold could bestow upon him out of his inexhaustible stores, if he did not concentrate his political reason, which is a very different thing from letting consciousness play over things. Such keen, searching, and exact dialectic as Plato taught is Hellenism in its truest and noblest sense; vague, unregulated, unscientific play of consciousness, which is what we get from Mr. Arnold when he talks about politics, is Hellenism made uncommonly easy.

Let us notice another thing. Does Mr. Arnold or any other teacher do anything like the good he might do, by mere injunction to practise this and abstain from that? To bid us follow culture is, for the vast majority even of decently trained persons, simply a word. It is like the sterile admonition of the moralist to follow virtue. What sort of virtue? How? Where? Give us the example of virtuous life and conversation. And so of culture. Present to us the fruits of culture in forms that men may grasp, that may help us to realize the methods and the ends in something like visible bodily shape. Socrates bade men know themselves, but then he constantly went about showing them how they might attain this divine self-knowledge, discussing all subjects, examining all opinions. If he was anything, he was specific. We wish that Mr. Arnold, our polite Anglican version of Socrates, would work in the same spirit, giving us many examples of culture, rather than a single precept about it, clothed in many words. He has done something, we gladly admit, and even a great deal. His volume of critical essays taught us much. His more recent book on secondary instruction in France and Germany was full of lucid and valuable thoughts about education. His verse is a constant delight. In the present volume there are some wise words, and they will exert their full effect, for Mr. Arnold has got his public; but we cannot detect any sort of usefulness in its general purpose. In those practical operations of politics about which Mr. Arnold speaks at once so authoritatively and so contemptuously, you cannot choose precisely the way in which the thing is to be done, nor the hour and the minute, nor the forces by which to do it. The world must be improved, if at all, by these practical operations, and if one cannot carry them out in the noblest way possible, then we must take the next noblest way that is possible. There are large forces, sweeping in many currents, in a country like ours, and it is the business of the statesman and politician to control or use them with as much prudence and effect as they can, for the general good. It is the business of distinguished men like Mr. Arnold to modify these forces in the intellectual order, preparing the way for new activity ten, twenty, or any other number of years hence. But why scorn the rough and needful business of the hour, and the men who are content to do it? Unless we are to starve, somebody must thresh the corn. Not at all, says Mr. Arnold; throw away your clumsy ugly flail, and let us set to work to make a fine steam-machine, which will be in perfect order in twenty years from now. If this is the result of culture, he may well call his book Culture and Anarchy—culture in the next generation and anarchy meanwhile. Only the anarchy would assuredly advance so much more rapidly that when culture arrived it would find all swept and garnished, and our last state would be ever so much worse than even this present.

ERASMUS' PRAISE OF FOLLY.*

UNTIL the taste for reading any Latin book that does not belong to the golden period, and likewise form part of a classical curriculum, has altogether become extinct, the Encomium Moriæ of the ever genial Erasmus is sure to find students among the more intellectual class of the male public. It is a jeu d'esprit in the best sense of the word—a sport with scholarship by a scholar, whose learning sits too easily upon him to render him pedantic, or to obliterate his original nature. The "Encomium" was one of the great scholar's earliest works, and probably the time at which he wrote it was the happiest in his life. Fortune had not yet raised him above the vicissitudes of the literary adventurer, but he was already an object of attraction to all the learned men of Europe, and the religious differences that drew him into the field of theological controversy, and embittered the latter days of his life, had not begun. The name of Luther as a religious wonder was then unknown, nor was there any suspicion of the historical importance subsequently attained by the friar of Wittenberg. The connexion of the "Encomium" with the Reformation, on account of the satirical manner in which its author treated the religious practices of his day, was an afterthought. In common with many indubitable Roman Catholics, Erasmus simply thought that the Church at the beginning of the sixteenth century was not in good condition, and though he had little respect for the prevalent theology, his book does not show the slightest desire to overthrow a single ecclesiastical institution. He wrote it, too, under remarkably pleasant circumstances. He had just satisfied his youthful desire of visiting Italy, the seat of polite learning, and he was sojourning at Rome, under the special favour of the Pope, when he received a pressing invitation from his English friends, who were many and influential, to visit them for the third time. Our country had been endeared to him by his two previous visits, and the invitation was accepted. On his road he wrote the "Encomium," which he dedicated to his good friend Sir Thomas More. The affinity of his friend's name to the Greek word Μωρία seems to have suggested the subject. At least, in his dedication, he supposes More asking him what Pallas inspired him with the notion of filling up his spare hours with a panegyric on Folly, and answers him thus:—"Primum admonuit me Mori cognomen tibi gentile, quod tam ad Moriæ vocabulum accedit quam es ipse a re alienus." That Erasmus was not superior to a pun is well known to every one who has but glanced at the "Colloquia."

The character of self-satisfaction, which is with Erasmus the chief attribute of folly, is imprinted on the very form of the book, which is an oration pronounced by Moria, or Folly herself, who is thus her own panegyrist, vaunting her lofty lineage, and declaring her power over all sorts and conditions of men. She is accompanied by her nurses Methe (Inebriety), the child of Bacchus, and Apædia (Lack of Education), the daughter of Pan, and by several female and two male attendants. The females are Philautia (Self-love), remarkable for her haughty brow; Colacia (Flattery), who is blessed with smiling eyes (arridentibus oculis), and always applauds with her hands; Lethe (Forgetfulness), who is half asleep; Misoponia (Sloth), who leans on both elbows; Hedone (Pleasure), who is wreathed with roses, and has anointed hair; Anoia (Imbecility), whose eyes wander; and Truphe (Luxury), who is nitida cute probeque saginato corpore. The boys are the convivial god Comus, and Νήγρετος Ὕπνος (the Homeric expression for profound sleep). Having stated that she is the daughter of Plutus, God of Wealth, and the nymph Neotes (Youth), who gave birth to her in the Fortunate Islands, where she was suckled by Methe and Apædia, Moria asserts her right to be considered chief of all the deities. What does man more highly esteem than life? Now life presupposes wedlock, and as it is clear that people in their right senses would never get married, Moria's attendant, Anoia, is manifestly the cause of wedlock. If a person who has already experienced the vexations of matrimony is foolish enough to marry again, the aid of Lethe is invoked.

Moria, according to her own opinion, is not only the origin of life, but produces all that makes life pleasant. The charm of infants is their utter lack of wisdom, and the further people are removed by force of education and experience from this state of blissful stupidity, the less tolerable is their condition until they arrive at old age, the evils of which are softened by that second childhood which is in some sort a recurrence of the first. A very old man who retained all the lessons which he had learned through life would be as offensive as a too precocious child. But Folly comes to the rescue, and makes the "lean and slippered pantaloon" a sourse of satisfaction to himself and others:—

* Μωρίας Ἐγκώμιον. Stultitiæ Laudatio. Desiderii Erasmi Declamatio. Londini, et venit Parisiis apud Barbou. MDCCLXV.

> Delirat senex meo munere. Sed tamen delirus iste minus interim miseris illis curis vacat quibus sapiens iste distorquetur. Interim non illepidus est compotor; non sentit vitæ tædium, quod robustior ætas vix toleret. Nonnunquam cum sene Plautino ad tres illas literas revertitur, infelicissimus si sapiat. At interim meo beneficio felix, interim amicis gratus, ne congerro quidem infestivus.

The "Senex Plautinus" is he in the Mercator, who late in life has learned the three letters composing the verb A M O.

As the gods, when they are most kindly disposed to mortals, metamorphose them into trees, birds, grasshoppers, and serpents, thus virtually killing them, since the change of one creature into another of a totally different nature implies the death of the first, so Folly, more beneficent, restores her favourite to the happiest period of his life. If men were content to remain stupid always, no such change would be needed, inasmuch as they would enjoy a perpetual childhood. Herein the people of Brabant are especially to be commended, that the more they advance in years the more stupid they become; and the like commendation is due to the men of Holland, whom Folly affectionately calls "Hollandi mei," since they not only worship her devoutly, but are proud of their devotion. Look at the assembly of the gods. Why is Bacchus always young, and always blest with a plentiful crop of hair? Simply because he is essentially unwise and heedless, and has as little as possible to do with sage Pallas. Why is Cupid always a boy? Simply because he is always a trifler. Venus, χρυσέη Ἀφροδίτη, is proved by her epithet to wear the color of Folly's father, Plutus, and moreover is perpetually smiling. Who is more zealously worshipped by the Romans than Flora, the parent of all pleasure?

Descending from Heaven to Earth, we find everywhere an abode for Folly. If, according to the Stoics, wisdom is submission to reason, and folly obedience to the passions, the supremacy of the latter is shown at once; reason being confined to a little nook in the skull, whereas the dominion of passion extends over all the rest of the human frame. Nay, as man, with all his drawbacks, still had a modicum of wisdom in his composition, he took unto himself, by the advice of Folly, his partner woman—animal videlicet stultum quidem illud et ineptum, verum ridiculum, at suave—that his natural melancholy might be cheered by her foolishness. As for a woman who wishes to appear wise, she is doubly foolish in assuming something contrary to her nature. An ape is always an ape, even if clad in purple; and a woman is always a woman—that is to say, a fool—and it is to her foolishness that she owes her power. Folly gives the best seasoning to the banquet, and is the truest promoter of friendship. As the lover overlooks the defects of his beloved, and even thinks them so many charms, so friends lightly pass over each other's faults, which is in itself foolish. Cupid is painted blind, as one to whom τὰ μὴ καλὰ καλὰ πέφανται, and it is to the kindly absurdities of friends and lovers that life owes much of its pleasure. As for marriage, no one would enter into that holy state if he prudently calculated his chances of happiness beforehand, and few men would remain subject to that yoke did they not close their eyes to many of their wives' misdeeds. Without Folly everybody would hate, not only his neighbour, but himself likewise. To prevent the latter calamity is the office of Folly's attendant, Philautia, without whose aid the orator would grow cold, the musician would become untuneful, the actor would be hissed, the poet would be laughed out of countenance, the painter would come to grief, and the physician would starve in the middle of his drugs. A man must begin by admiring himself if he would gain the admiration of others. Hence it is happily provided by Philautia that no one is dissatisfied with his own personal appearance, his own family, his own place, his own country.

One of the most fertile sources of glory is war, than which nothing can be more foolish. A wise man, worn out by study, and with little blood in his veins, would be altogether out of place on the battle-field, to which stout heavy fellows, with abundance of valour and the least possible amount of mind, are exactly suited. As for the assertion that "Consilium in bellis plurimum habet momenti," that may be very true with respect to the generals, but the rank and file are best supplied by the dregs of the human race. Indeed philosophers are of little use in any of the concerns of practical life. Socrates himself, pronounced the only wise man by the oracle of Apollo, could not escape derision when he meddled with public affairs, and it was only by his wisdom that he came to an untimely end. In the presence of a multitude Plato could not finish a sentence, and Theophrastus was utterly dumb-founded. Isocrates, far from being able to inspire a soldier with valour, was chicken-hearted to the last degree, and Cicero when he began his speeches sobbed like a blubbering boy. Plato's declaration that republics will be happy when philosophers rule or rulers philosophise, will not bear the test of history, which shows that of all statesmen those who fell into the hands of philosophers and men of letters were the greatest nuisances to their country. Of the two Catones, one kept the State in a fever by his insane delationes; the other subverted Roman liberty, while he too unwisely defended it. Brutus, Cassius, and the Gracchi all furnish instances of the same truth, and Cicero was as mischievous to the Romans as Demosthenes to the Athenians. M. Antoninus, admirable Emperor as he might have been (though even that is questionable), was unpopular because he was a philosopher, and he left behind him a son, who injured the State to a far greater degree than it had been benefited by his father. In fact, wise men generally have been unlucky in their offspring, as if nature had kindly provided that the poison of wisdom should not be allowed to propagate itself too far. Cicero's son was a degenerate being, and the children of Socrates resembled their mother more closely than their father. Lead a wise man to a feast, and he is anything but a boon companion; take him to some public amusement, and his face is a damper to the assembly; in his purchases and bargains he is more like a log than a man. The intruder who interrupted the performance of a play by pulling off the masks of the actors, and showing them all in their true colours, would deserve immediate expulsion; and the wise man who unmasks his fellows is a nuisance on a large scale. Human life is so subject to ills that it would be unendurable did not Folly sweeten it a little with ignorance, thoughtlessness, and oblivion, which operate so well that those who have the least reason for wishing to remain alive are the least anxious to die.

The philosopher who considers it a very wretched calamity to be enslaved by Folly utters a mere absurdity, inasmuch as this is the case with the bulk of the human race; and to pity a man because he is a fool is as absurd as to commiserate him because he cannot fly or walk on four legs. The different branches of science and learning (disciplinæ), are in truth gifts of the dæmons, who should properly be called δαήμονες, or "knowing ones," and were without influence in the golden age. In that age all talked one language, so there was no need of grammar; no one disputed, so logic was not required; rhetoric and jurisprudence would have been equally superfluous. But when the golden age had passed away, learning came with other evils, one grammar alone being sufficient for the perpetual torture of life. As it is, those branches of knowledge which approach the nearest to common sense—that is, to folly (quæ ad sensum communem, hoc est stultitiam, quam proxime accedunt)—are most highly esteemed. Theologians starve, the professors of natural science (physici) shiver, astronomers are laughed at, logicians are slighted, but physicians thrive—ἰατρὸς γὰρ ἀνὴρ πολλῶν ἀντάξιος ἄλλων—and the more ignorant, daring, and reckless they are, the more they are prized. Next to the physicians come the lawyers.

The instinct of brute animals furnishes an argument against the utility of human wisdom. No philosopher ever founded a republic comparable to that of the bees, who do not even possess all the bodily senses. The horse, on the other hand, having allied himself more closely with man, is subject to all sorts of woes. Even among men, idiots and maniacs enjoy advantages unknown to the learned and the great. The swineherd was better off than πολύμητις Ὀδυσσεύς to whom Homer gives the epithet δύστηνος, which he never applies to Paris, Ajax, or Achilles. Your thorough idiot, approaching the condition of the brute, is free from the annoyances of shame, ambition, envy, and love; not being a responsible agent, he is even incapable of sin; and not only is he always laughing himself, but, as a general object of derision, he is the cause of infinite mirth in others. In his capacity of Court-fool he is the delight of monarchs, to whom he may utter truths which would offend if spoken by the wise. His happy career over, he goes straight into the Elysian fields, without fear of death, there to recreate indolent souls with his sports. Let the sad, morose life of the wise man be compared with the career of this merry fool, and every advantage indubitably appears on the side of the latter. The argument that folly is miserable, inasmuch as it is a species of madness, is easily refuted. There are two kinds of madness—one sent from the infernal regions by the Furies, the other a pleasant aberration of mind. To this latter kind belongs the madness ascribed by Plato to poets and lovers, and it is well illustrated by the case of the infatuated Argive, mentioned in Horace's Epistle (ii. 2), who, quite sane in other respects, sat alone in the empty theatre, gratified by imaginary performances, and was grieved to the heart when cured of his charming illusions. For a miserable pauper to fancy himself a Crœsus is manifestly a blessing, and when one madman laughs at another there is a general diffusion of enjoyment.

The chase, which is only a noble sort of butchery, the rage for building, the passion for dice, are all so many manifestations of folly, and are all sources of gratification. The same may be said of those external acts of piety by which many devotees expect to escape the penalties of a future state without renouncing their favourite vices. The votive offerings abundantly suspended in churches are so many proofs of the estimation in which folly is held by mankind, for whereas you may find gifts expressive of gratitude for escape from every variety of difficulty and disease, there is not a single testimonial of gratitude for an escape from folly. Suppose some spoil-sport of a sage came among the multitude of those happy fools who trust to the kind protection of saints, especially to that "Deipara Virgo, cui vulgus hominum plus prope tribuit quam Filio," and said to them—

> Non male peribis si bene vixeris. Peccata redimis si nummulo addideris odium malefactorum, tum lachrymas, vigilias, precationes, jejunia, ac totam vitæ rationem commutaris. Divus hic tibi favet, si vitam illius æmulaberis.

What an amount of happiness would be destroyed by a discourse so importunate!

Different nations have their characteristic forms of folly, through the inspiration of Philautia:—

> Jam vero video Naturam, ut singulis mortalibus suam, ita singulis nationibus, ac pene civitatibus communem quandam insevisse philautiam;

atque hinc fieri ut Britanni, præter alia, formam, musicam, et lautas mensas perpere sibi vindicent; Scoti nobilitate et regiæ affinitatis titulo, neque non dialecticis argutiis, sibi blandiantur; Galli morum civilitatem sibi sumant; Parisienses theologiæ scientiæ laudem, omnibus prope submotis, sibi peculiariter arrogent; Itali bonas literas et eloquentiam asserant; atque hoc nomine sibi suavissime blandiantur omnes, quod soli mortalium barbari non sunt. Quo quidem in genere felicitatis Romani primas tenent, ac veterem illam Romam adhuc jucundissime somniant. Veneti nobilitatis opinione sunt felices. Græci, tanquam disciplinarum auctores, veteribus illis laudatorum heroum titulis sese venditant. Turca, totaque illa vere barbarorum colluvies, etiam religionis laudes sibi vindicat, Christianos perinde uti superstitiosos irridens. Ac multo etiam suavius Judæi, etiam dum Messiam suum expectant, ac Mosen suum hodieque mordicus tenent. Hispani bellicam gloriam nulli concedunt. Germani corporum proceritate et magiæ cognitione sibi placent.

In distributing these national characteristics Folly is not speaking ironically, but merely enumerating the different forms of Philautia. And what an interesting survey we have of the state of the European mind at the very commencement of the sixteenth century! Spain was the great military Power; the Pope, as Hobbes considered him long afterwards, was a sort of ecclesiastical Roman Emperor; Paris, pre-eminently theological, then gloried in her Sorbonne; France generally had already established her reputation for politeness—thus, by way of anticipation, contradicting the opinion that she learned it from the précieuses of the Hôtel de Rambouillet; the German proclivities have respectively been handed down by the tall grenadiers of Friedrich-Wilhelm and the metaphysics of the Post-Kantian philosophers; the Scot remains unchanged. As for the Englishman, his regard for personal appearance and his love of good-feeding are unchanged likewise; but he will now be astonished at his exceptional reputation for music. There is, however, no doubt that Erasmus, who knew England well, is correct with respect to the musical proficiency of our forefathers under the Tudors, inasmuch as this is proved in very full detail by Mr. W. Chappell, in his invaluable history of Popular Music of the Olden Times.

The important truth that it is not from things themselves, but from their opinion concerning them, however false, that men derive their chief felicity, furnishes a powerful proof of the utility of folly, and the benefit of flattery and self-love. Thus the gifts of Folly are scattered everywhere. Those who really possess superior endowments of mind and body are necessarily few, but those who believe that they possess them are, thanks to Folly, without number.

The fools are then divided into several classes, to be considered separately—grammarians, poets, jurists, philosophers, theologians, monks and friars, kings and princes, nobles, bishops, cardinals, and popes. Among the scholastic divines of the day, the Scotists are handled with marked severity, the subtle questions enumerated as follows evidently referring to the teachings of the eminent Scotist, William of Occam, though he is not mentioned as their author:—

Num quod instans in generatione divina? Num plures in Christo filiationes? Num possibilis propositio, Pater Deus odit Filium? Num Deus potuerit suppositare mulierem, num diabolum, num asinum, num cucurbitam, num silicem? Tum quemadmodum cucurbita fuerit concionatura, editura miracula, figenda cruci? Et quid consecrasset Petrus, si consecrasset eo tempore quo corpus Christi pendebat in cruce? Et num eodem tempore Christus homo dici potuerit? Et num post resurrectionem edere aut bibere fas sit futurum, jam nunc famem sitimque præcaventes?

The satire against persons in high places consists in a comparison between what the dignitaries are and what they ought to be. If kings and popes really understood the duties pertaining to their respective offices, they would not take so much trouble to obtain them, or, finding themselves possessed of them already, would feel sad under the weight of their responsibilities. Fortunately their wisdom does not extend so far, and thus they can thoroughly enjoy themselves, and promote the enjoyment of many others, who fatten on abuses. The conclusion of the discourse takes a more serious turn, Moria here vindicating her sacred character by the citation of St. Paul's assertion that the "foolishness of God is wiser than men," with corroborative texts.

It is scarcely necessary to remark that, in making Folly her own panegyrist, Erasmus falls into the inconsistency by which it is the doom of allegory to be always accompanied. Ostensibly the same person, the Moria who speaks in one part of the discourse is by no means identical with the Moria who holds forth in another. Sometimes she is the advocate of absolute idiocy or insanity; sometimes she would recommend that blissful ignorance of evil with which the mens sana in corpore sano is perfectly consistent; sometimes she is that practical common sense, of which we find a modern exponent in those persons who, by no means fools, doubt whether gentlemen of the calibre of Mr. J. S. Mill are fittingly placed in the House of Commons. But the enjoyment of a work so excellent, and the parent of many others excellent also, should not be impaired by a spirit of depreciatory criticism. Let it be accepted as the broad statement of the views of things in general taken by a man who had studied deeply and seen much, and in whom the attributes of the recluse scholar and the thorough man of the world were singularly combined, and it will be read with unmixed admiration.

STOKES' LIFE OF PETRIE.*

A LIFE of Dr. Petrie is a work to which we can give a hearty welcome. There are few classes of people to whom we take more kindly than to a rational Irish antiquary. The breed is rare; the specimens are therefore the more precious when we come across them. And Petrie was distinctly the head of his order. He did a very great work, a work the importance of which in its own line can hardly be overvalued. He brought reason and evidence to bear on a subject which had hitherto been given up to wild guessing and extravagant speculation. A goodly band has since arisen to walk in his steps, but Petrie was undoubtedly the beginner. A self-taught man, working for a long time well nigh alone, and with very little in the way either of books or of men to guide him, he may sometimes have come to hasty conclusions. But no one who knows the difference between Petrie and the Irish antiquaries who went before him will ever be inclined to be harsh on any points where they may think that Petrie's views will not stand the test of the most recent criticism. We say this because we have seen in some English antiquaries a certain tendency to undervalue the greatness of Petrie's services to antiquarian knowledge. The work he did was such as has seldom fallen to the lot of one man to do; and, compared with the gigantic fabric of error which he overthrew, any slips of his own—supposing such slips to be very many more than we believe them to be—are the merest dust in the balance.

Petrie is best known in England, and no doubt in Ireland too, from the work on which his fame will doubtless always mainly rest—his magnificent volume on the Round Towers and the other early ecclesiastical remains in Ireland. But we hardly knew, till we learned it from Professor Stokes' book, how varied his studies and attainments were. He was not only devoted to the study of antiquities of every kind, but he was also a painter and a musician; indeed it was as a painter that he began life. As for his musical tastes, those he contrived to turn into a branch of his antiquarian studies by diligently collecting the old national songs and airs of Ireland. That he was versed in the Irish language and the Irish national chronicles we need not say, because such knowledge is taken for granted throughout his great inquiry, and it indeed lies at the root of the whole thing. While other people were simply speculating and talking nonsense, Petrie had set to work in the right way, with the proper combination of indoor and outdoor study, to see every ancient relic with his own eyes, and to compare what he saw with his eyes with what he read in his books. He thus established, what no sane person now doubts, the real origin and object of the Round Towers. To those who have taken a wide view of the history of architecture there never could have been any doubt as to the matter. But, before Petrie's time, there were not in any country many critical students of architecture as a branch of history; in Ireland there were perhaps none at all. The few who were qualified to judge had not studied Irish antiquities, and those who professed to have studied Irish antiquities simply gave the reins to their fancy. The wonderful thing is that Petrie, whose studies were very local, and who had not given much attention to anything out of Ireland, should have known how to set about the work as he did, with such perfect patience and sobriety and in such a thorough critical spirit. While other people babbled about fire-worship, phallic worship, every conceivable absurdity on the face of the earth, Petrie simply showed by the evidence of records what the Round Towers really were. They were simply belfries, standing detached from their churches, and used, as church towers were used more or less in all parts of the world, for various secondary purposes. The circumstances of the country made defences a matter of special moment even for ecclesiastical buildings; the towers therefore were made more strictly defensive than was usual in more settled countries, though certainly not more so than was usual in Pembrokeshire at a much later time. All this Petrie demonstrated by incontestable evidence. Now an architectural student of wider range would most likely have come to Petrie's conclusions without going all through Petrie's evidence. A comparative archæologist would adopt Petrie's views on the Round Towers instinctively. Still it is a great thing to have the matter thoroughly worked out as a matter of evidence. It is a great thing in itself, and it is a still greater thing with regard to objectors. If the unlearned and unbelieving are to be convinced at all, they are much more likely to be convinced by such a laborious testing of evidence as Petrie's than by the instinctive perception of the comparative archæologist. To them this perception would seem simply a guess, like their own guesses, differing from their own guesses only in being prosaic and unattractive. Indeed many of the unlearned and unbelieving abide to this day as stiff-necked as ever, in the teeth of all that Petrie has done. Mr. Keene and his Cuthites offer a memorable example indeed. Professor Stokes is naturally moved to a righteous wrath at what he calls the "desecration" of employing Petrie's own drawings and engravings to illustrate a book in which Irish archæology has been flung back into the slough out of which Petrie raised it.

On the other hand, we have seen now and then, and we have always seen with regret, a disposition among a few English antiquaries to undervalue Petrie's researches. Our own belief is that, taking his work as a whole, Petrie could have stood his ground against any man; but undoubtedly he had his weak points, and he made his occasional slips like other people. A wide view of things, a range of study less exclusively confined to Ireland, would undoubtedly have been an advantage to him. The wonderful thing, as we before said, is that, working within so narrow a range, his work was of the high character which it always bears. No doubt he often gives his buildings dates a good deal too early for them; he sometimes falls into the common error of mistaking the foundation of a church or monastery for the date of the erection of the present building. Indeed it appears from his Life that he latterly admitted that his dates in some cases were too early. But, if Petrie has now and then slipped in detail, we still maintain that his system is sound as a whole against both classes of adversaries, and that he was himself far more logical and critical than either of them. We have often said to English objectors who complained that Petrie put a building in the eighth or ninth century which they would have put in the eleventh or twelfth—"Never mind; your difference is a very slight one; remember that Petrie is fighting against people who put them in the eleventh or twelfth century the other way." Antiquarian research has undoubtedly advanced since Petrie began to work, and certainly no one man has done more towards its advance than Petrie himself. Some improvements might no doubt be made in detail if his work could now be gone through again by some competent person; but we feel sure that such an examination would leave his main positions very much where they are now. Most of the objections made to his system are decidedly captious, and they often rest on mere misconceptions of the authorities quoted on their behalf. For instance, Petrie holds that there were stone buildings, and even ornamental stone buildings, in Ireland long before the English Conquest in the twelfth century. We should also say long before that imitation of foreign work which, in Ireland as in England, went before the actual foreign invasion. Cormac's Chapel on the Rock of Cashel holds a place in Irish architectural history analogous to that which Edward the Confessor's work at Westminster holds in England. We are told that the Irish did not build in stone till the eleventh century, and that nobody anywhere could use the chisel till late in the twelfth century; but we have shown in former articles that these views are founded on utter misconceptions of the passages of St. Bernard and of Gervase which are quoted in their support. Again, Giraldus—whom, by the way, Professor Stokes somewhat oddly speaks of as Cambrensis without any name—distinctly speaks of the round towers as an ancient custom in his days. It proves nothing to show—what there is no doubt of—that there are few round towers as late as Giraldus's own time, or even later. The witness of Giraldus, to say nothing of all the other evidence, shows that the erection of these later round towers was simply the retention, possibly the revival, of a custom which had been in use ages before. In the Appendix will be found some remarks of Petrie's in answer to Mr. Parker, in which he holds his ground on some of these points well and successfully.

The life of Petrie was, as might be expected, not an eventful or exciting one; his biography is almost wholly a record of his labours with the pen and the pencil. He was born in Dublin in the year 1789, and he died in the same city in 1866. Though his birth was Irish, his descent was Scotch, both his parents having migrated from the younger to the elder Scotia. He was a painter and an antiquary from his youth, almost from his childhood. His profession as a landscape-painter gave him great opportunities in the antiquarian way, of which he made the best advantage from the very beginning. Professor Stokes gives us large extracts from the journals in which Petrie recorded his early tours, and though the style is sometimes a little too highflown, they are valuable and interesting, as showing how early he began to exercise his powers of observation and criticism. He thus received, though at his own hands, a real antiquarian education. As Professor Stokes pointedly says, "He did not take up the pursuit in middle life, as is the case with so many dilettanti antiquarians whose minds in their youth have had no preparation for the study." For purely Irish matters—and Petrie commonly kept himself to purely Irish matters—this was really a very good education. For wider inquiries a more general culture would have been needed. Like other people, he broke down when he went beyond his proper beat, as when he dreamed of Greek colonies in Ireland in some remote mythical time. Still, after all, we may call the error a comparatively slight one, as Aryans of any kind may count as brethren in opposition to the Phœnicians, Scythians, Buddhists, daughters of Pharaoh, and other strange persons whom the pre-scientific school thought fit to quarter on the Green Isle.

Petrie's first literary efforts were made in the pages of several local periodicals, such as the Irish Penny Journal and the Dublin Penny Journal—periodicals which, though extinct, are still known to antiquaries on the strength of his contributions and those of a few others like-minded with himself. He had much to do with the Topographical Department of the Irish Ordnance Survey and with the Royal Irish Academy. It was out of a prize offered by this last body that his great work arose. He seems never to have been on the Continent, and his visits to Great Britain were not frequent. They were made mainly to investigate points connected with his Irish studies, as when he went to see the two Scotch round towers at Brechin and Abernethy. His last visit to Great Britain seems to have been in 1849, when he, and several other distinguished Irish antiquaries, attended the Cambrian Archæological meeting at Cardiff, held under the presidency of his intimate friend Lord Adare, now Earl of Dunraven. He there took part in a discussion on cromlechs, which he was surprised to find that some—by no means all—of the Welsh antiquaries still looked on as Druidical altars. Petrie, it seems, was one of the first to make out for himself, before the Danish scholars had taken up the matter—at any rate before their researches were generally known—that the cromlechs were simply graves. This, again, considering the general state of opinion on such matters when he began his work, was a sign of no small accuracy of observation and independence of thought.

Personally Petrie seems to have been in every way excellent and delightful. He was the centre of a circle of attached friends, most of them men of kindred pursuits with his own. And that circle has grown into a school, which still has a work to do and enemies to contend against. It will be with pride and reverence that that school will always look back to Petrie as the founder of rational archæology in Ireland.

LUCREZIA BORGIA.*

In many an old Italian city there is a half-forgotten public library, which the natives carefully avoid, and to which strangers do not often resort. Now and then some enthusiastic scholar may pay it an unexpected visit, and ransack its seldom molested stores, but during the long intervals between such rare invasions its volumes stand tranquilly upon their shelves, its papers lie undisturbed in their cases. And yet there is much that is curious to be seen in these old cemeteries of learning, and much may be learnt by any one who will consult their relics aright. Even if no great results arise from his researches, if no startling discoveries throw a flood of light on one of the dark places of history, the hours which he has spent in an old library of this description will seldom appear to have been wasted. There, in the shade and quiet which are seldom troubled by the glare and noise of the outer world, he will at least experience the pleasure of becoming intimately acquainted with the former life of the city which spreads around him, and over the ancient chronicles of which he is poring. And if he afterwards publishes a history of that city, he will possess the obvious advantage of having some real knowledge of the subject on which he writes. The book which is now before us appears to owe its existence to one of the unfrequent visits we have mentioned. Mr. Gilbert seems to have spent some time in consulting the public records of Ferrara, and especially those which have reference to the life and times of Lucrezia Borgia, and his labour has resulted in a curious picture of the city as it was between three and four centuries ago, and a very interesting study of the character of a princess who has hitherto found but few champions. The idea originally thrown out by Mr. Roscoe, in his Dissertation on the Character of Lucretia Borgia, has been fully worked out by Mr. Gilbert, who has at least succeeded in proving that the beautiful toxicologist of the stage has very little in common with the Lucrezia Borgia of history.

Mr. Gilbert's efforts are mainly confined to drawing the picture of the life led by Lucrezia after her marriage with the Duke of Ferrara. In doing this he has placed great reliance on her letters, of which there are no fewer than 339 "at present extant in different public libraries or private collections in Italy." They extend over a period of nineteen years, beginning a little before her marriage, and ending a fortnight before her death. On nine of these, addressed to the celebrated Pietro Bembo, a charge has been founded against her of infidelity to her husband; but this seems to Mr. Gilbert manifestly unfair. And at all events, he says, among all the other letters there is not one from which a line can be quoted to her prejudice, while most of them speak highly in her praise. Some of them contain appeals for mercy on behalf of condemned criminals; others show her solicitude for the interests of the sick poor. Many of them are written to her husband, describing in an affectionate style little matters of family interest, about the health of her children and other similar affairs, such as would seem to prove that she was a good mother, and a woman true to feminine instincts and feelings. Others are to her husband's father and sister, by both of whom she was greatly beloved—a fact which of itself goes far to show that she was not as black as she has been painted. Throughout these letters, or at least in those with which we are ourselves acquainted, there seems to m nifest itself a kindly and affectionate spirit, as well as the tone of piety, unmixed with bigotry, on which Mr. Gilbert lays great stress. It is impossible to read them without forming an idea of their writer as a woman of great intelligence and ability, in her public capacity evidently a large-minded ruler, in her private life apparently an affectionate wife and mother. When we add to the evidence afforded by her own letters the favourable testimony of some of the most celebrated writers of the day, we must at least allow that Mr. Gilbert's scepticism with regard to her depravity is not altogether unwarrantable. It is difficult to consider that woman a monster of crime of whom Ariosto says that Rome ought to prefer the modern Lucrezia to the Lucrezia of antiquity, as well in modesty as in beauty, and to whom, as the most worthy of women, he gives the first niche in the temple erected to female excellence in the Orlando Furioso; whom all the historians of Ferrara mention in terms of the highest praise; than whom Paolo Giovio, Bishop of Nocera, says he never knew "a more amiable, virtuous, or pious woman"; and to whose merits, speaking some years after her death, Aldo Manuzio bears this striking testimony:—

> What might not I say of her piety towards God, of her charity towards the poor, of her beneficence to those about her, of her justice to all? The marvel was what an amount of misery she had been able to alleviate by the ministers of her bounty; what prudence she had exhibited in the transaction of public business and in the administration of justice; what care she had evinced in giving to all what appeared to be their due, so governing her State as to have the good rewarded, the evil-doers punished, and having affairs so well conducted in the Senate as to exhibit to her subjects the most excellent judgment and the greatest acuteness of intellect.

* Lucrezia Borgia, Duchess of Ferrara. A Biography. Illustrated by Rare and Unpublished Documents. By William Gilbert, Author of "Shirley Hall Asylum," &c. 2 vols. London: Hurst & Blackett. 1869.

The wonder is, if her merits were really so great, how she could ever have been made the subject of the horrible charges which have rendered her very name infamous. One explanation that may be bitterly detested that she, as their relative, was recklessly charged with crimes fearful even to think of, and was readily believed to be guilty of them. She was a Borgia; therefore to be attacked. She was the daughter of Alexander VI.; therefore she must be corrupt. She was the sister of Cesare Borgia; therefore she must have been in the habit, when in wrath, of instantaneously killing by a sweetmeat or a flower or a glove; or, when vexed, of swiftly turning vigorous youth into decrepit old age by a single draught of cunningly doctored wine.

If Pontano and Sannazarro are to be believed, Lucrezia Borgia was the vilest of women; but they were not only poets, but also faithful subjects and admirers of the princes of that House of Aragon which the Pope had betrayed, so it is not wonderful that they should have attacked the whole Borgia family. It is true that the gravest of their charges is also to be found in Guicciardini, but it has been already pointed out by Mr. Madden that the accusation does not appear in the earlier editions of his work. What throws most discredit on the testimony of the poets is the fact that it is not supported by that of Burchard, whose official position in the palace made him better aware than any one else of what the Borgias were doing, and who hated the Pope and his family so much that he would have been delighted to side with Lucrezia's poetic enemies if their verses had been in accordance with the prose of fact. As it is, although he says nothing of the particular crimes they mention, one of the chief blots on her character is derived from his pen; that is to say, if he really wrote the well-known description of the orgy which preceded Lucrezia's marriage with Alfonso d'Este—an orgy which Mr. Gilbert thinks never existed except in the diseased imagination of some hater of the Borgias.

Lucrezia was certainly educated in a very bad school. During the period in which she was growing up to womanhood Rome was in a fearful state. Murder was then a very commonplace affair. The witness who saw the body of the Duke of Gandia flung into the Tiber excused himself for his silence on the subject by saying that he had seen a hundred dead bodies pitched into the river in his time, and therefore did not attach much importance to any particular corpse. The Pope and his son Cesare ruled with unrelenting severity. For a contemptuous gesture or an angry word they would have a man strangled or drowned without the slightest compunction. Sometimes, it is true, they refrained from killing, but their mercy was far from complete. A man was once seen pointing his finger at Cesare Borgia. For this crime he was immediately arrested and thrown into prison, "where his finger was struck off, and tied to the iron bars of the jail window, as a warning to others to be less demonstrative." Another misguided person not only pointed his finger rudely at the Duke, but even spoke of him without respect. "The man was arrested, and both his finger and tongue were amputated, and exhibited by being tied to the bars of the prison window." It would have been strange if Lucrezia's family had been anything but unpopular among the Romans, or if she had escaped being involved in the hatred which at least her father and her brother justly deserved.

But in Ferrara she found herself in a very different position from that which she had occupied in Rome. Her husband was deservedly popular, and she herself soon acquired the respect and even the affection of his subjects. During the years she lived there no scandal sullied her fair fame, and neither her husband nor any of his relatives seem to have had reason to be displeased with her behaviour. When she died he seems to have felt her loss acutely. "I cannot write without the tears coming into my eyes," he says in a letter to his nephew, "so sad is it to find myself deprived of so amiable and good a companion; so dear was she to me, not only from her excellent life, but from the tender love which existed between us." And there is good reason for believing that his sorrow was shared by the inhabitants of Ferrara, to whom she had endeared herself by the exercise of virtues which seem strangely inconsistent with the vices with which her name is generally associated.

Mr. Gilbert has done good service in carefully investigating the evidence on which the charges rest which have been brought against her, and his researches are likely to produce the more effect, inasmuch as their results have been described in a manner likely to prove generally interesting. His clear and unaffected style is admirably fitted for biography, and the chapters which are devoted to Lucrezia's life tell its story exceedingly well. Unfortunately their sequence is broken by the introduction of such long accounts of Ferrara and its inhabitants that the thread of the narrative sometimes vanishes entirely out of sight. Not that these pictures of Ferrara life are uninteresting; on the contrary, they contain much that is curious and attractive; but they seem somewhat too numerous, and too minute in detail, for insertion in a memoir.

Some of the regulations which prevailed at Ferrara in Lucrezia's time might be advantageously put in force among ourselves. For instance, not only was begging prohibited in the streets, but those who encouraged beggars were punished. "For the first offence the mendicant was imprisoned, and for the second flogged, while any person detected in the act of giving him money was fined two scudi." It appears also that "the punishment for the offence of selling bread under the just weight was a severe fine for the first offence, and imprisonment with flogging for the second," which probably kept small traders awake to the necessity of having their weights in due order. In fact all kinds of offenders seem to have been somewhat severely punished, from a forgetful guardian of the castle clock to such a criminal as that Madonna Laura who was immured in a cell but a few feet square, in which there was no aperture except the small window through which she received her food, and there confined until she died. So ingenious, indeed, were the contrivers of these punishments that some Ferrarese historians claim for their city the honour of having been the first to use the guillotine. Certainly there is an execution mentioned of one Giuseppe Ariani, in which "the executioner pulled a cord and the knife fell." One of the strangest offences mentioned in the annals of the city is that alleged to have been committed by a certain physician, who "was strongly suspected of adulterating his vipers." It seems he supplied a great many for the benefit of the plague-stricken in one of the hospitals, the accounts of the institution containing such entries as "For 21 vipers, comprising three dead, bought in Bologna at 7 soldi apiece; and for the carriage of the same," &c. A still stranger entry occurs a little further on. "For 4,320 scorpions at 25 soldi the hundred," &c. The plague made great ravages in Ferrara, and numerous documents relating to it exist in the archives of the city, one of them containing an entry which speaks well for the care exercised by the rulers of the city, being an account of a reward paid to a certain notary for many things he had done, and, among others, for "carrying daily a report of the progress the plague was making, as well as of the condition of the sick, to the illustrious Duke, or his consort the Duchess Lucrezia." The land also appears to have been afflicted about the same time by a plague of poets, who "were as plentiful in the city as frogs in the meadows surrounding it." Eventually the sufferings of the people reached such a pitch that the Duke sold off the whole of his silver plate and his rich furniture, and Lucrezia, who was now in her thirty-fifth year, "and therefore at a time of life when a woman is apt to have great faith in the value of dress," pledged all her jewels in order to relieve the distresses of her people.

This sacrifice was the greater inasmuch as personal ornament was specially sought after in those days. Mr. Gilbert has given some interesting extracts from various works relating to the extravagance and the eccentric notions of taste which then prevailed in dress. Some of the patterns and devices then adopted seem not a little strange, as, for instance, in the case of the lady who wore "a robe on which were embroidered no fewer than six hundred figures exemplifying different episodes in the life of Christ." It appears, from a tract published at Ferrara about the beginning of the sixteenth century, that ladies were in the habit of making free use of such cosmetics as powder of white mushrooms, powdered candied sugar, dark powder for colouring the eyelids, powders of white and red coral, and powdered talc, "the latter being mixed as a sparkling for the hair." The tract also contains several recipes for turning black hair to a gold or yellow colour. Perhaps the most striking documents quoted in relation to dress are those which relate how Leonello, Marquis of Ferrara, attempted to curtail the trains worn in his time by ladies. Not only did he issue an edict prohibiting trains "which, when a lady stood upright, could be stretched out more than half a yard from her heels," but he invented a plan to enable fathers and brothers to give information against their wives and sisters, or daughters, without being detected. For this purpose a box was placed at the entrance of the cathedral, with a slit in the lid through which anonymous denunciations against ladies who wore their trains too long might be safely slipped.

That Mr. Gilbert will succeed in amusing and interesting his readers may be safely predicted. Whether he will be able to alter the world's verdict in reference to the character of Lucrezia Borgia is a very different question. It is hard to stem the current of general aversion. And in the court of popular opinion the "devil's advocates" are listened to more readily than the promoters of a canoniza- Moreover, an honest indignation will not readily consent to become sceptical on the subject of the great crimes of history. And whatever may be the effect produced by Mr. Gilbert in the study, it can but in few instances serve to counterbalance the influence of the fatal confessions which Lucrezia herself has been made to utter on the stage.

MAXIMS BY A MAN OF THE WORLD.*

IN a paper entitled "To Persons about to Find Themselves Famous" the author of this little volume remarks that there is not in these times much demand for essays. Their day, he thinks, is gone by. "People prefer to think for themselves on this and that subject, and do not desire other men's 'views' upon them." How far this assertion may be true in a purely commercial point of view we will not inquire; but it is a bold assertion to make in a volume which, though nominally devoted to "maxims," is really a series of essays. Shall we condemn the author out of his own mouth? He has given us not a little provocation, for which we are half inclined to take revenge. A young author, he assures us, regards a critic exactly as a barrister regards an attorney—"he despises him from the bottom of his heart, but he pays him the most respectful court." The writer is evidently not a young author, but he seems scarcely to have purified his mind from the resentments instilled into it at some earlier period He pays our craft, it is true, an ironical compliment to the effec that he knows "no critical organ which he does not reverenc and admire for their sterling honesty and excellent taste" but we fancy he comes nearer to a genuine expression of feeling though of course he is still speaking jocosely, when he except from his compliment one or two critics "whom I may dismiss with the observation that they are malignant and contemptible idiots." Nay, he goes a step further, and ventures to speak of the Saturday Review by name, with a levity, if not a positiv disapproval, scarcely expedient in one about to appear before that critical tribunal. If, therefore, we gave way to a natural feeling of resentment, we should be able to retort easily upon our assailant. People, we might observe, do not desire the "views" of the author of Lost Sir Massingberd upon marriage, love, money, friendship, children, and other similar subjects. If we wish for reflections upon such topics we may go to Solomon, or to the various wise men who have discussed them in the English and other languages for some centuries past. Are not the very titles we have quoted taken almost verbatim from the titles of some of Bacon's Essays, and does the writer think that it requires the acuteness and fiendish malignity of the Saturday Reviewer of his imagination to discover that there is a wide interval between Bacon and the author of Lost Sir Massingberd? The day for such things, we might repeat, is gone by; essays, maxims, or whatever you may please to call them, are old-fashioned methods of composition, and it is as hopeless to restore the literary fashions suitable to the days of the Spectator as i would be to bring back our great-grandmothers' hoops.

Nothing could prevent us from taking this line of argument and summarily judging the "Man of the World" out of his own mouth, except the consideration that it is not founded in fact. Our great-grandmothers' hoops, to use our own illustration, returned upon us with certain modifications only the other day; and, in spite of the suicidal assertion of the author, essays upon social and moral topics have by no means gone out of fashion. Rather we wonder at the public appetite for a kind of literature which in magazines is stigmatized as "padding," but which certainly composes some very popular volumes. So long as we have such essayists as Mr. Helps and "A.K.H.B.," to mention no others, it cannot be said that there is no market for essays upon general subjects; and as the author's practice contradicts his theory, we may presume that he would not too eagerly dispute the assertion. He will probably admit without much reluctance that his literary wares are not to be summarily rejected as belonging to an unsaleable class, although he may possibly differ from our estimate of their value. To settle this point satisfactorily we ought to know what people want in an essay. Why should any one desire to read a few remarks upon love or marriage or sickness? Do we not, generally speaking, lay in a tolerable supply of moralizing once a week that we are so anxious to make up possible deficiencies by the study of lay sermons? When a gentleman proposes to abolish marriage, or to introduce polygamy, he may claim the merit of comparative novelty; though he must make haste, however wild may be his theories, if he would not be anticipated. But can any human being throw any light upon love considered in the abstract? Certainly, if it were necessary for a writer to do so before presuming to rush into print on the subject, the essayist must be either a profound philosopher or a presumptuous impostor. Fortunately there is no such necessity. It is true, as the "Man of the World" remarks, that "to write well and strikingly upon what is already well known is given to very few folks indeed," and we might once more condemn him out of his own mouth. Yet it is also true that people have an amazing appetite for reading their own commonplace thoughts, if put into a tolerably graceful style, and enforced by a few appropriate anecdotes. It is beyond our present purpose to inquire into the remote causes of this singular propensity; and we may assume it to be an ultimate fact in human nature that mankind enjoys this simple intellectual food, if it is only dished up with a certain amount of culinary dexterity. All that seems to be strictly necessary is that the commonplaces thus treated should be sufficiently disguised not to strike us as obtrusively commonplace. If we ruthlessly boiled down any of these, or most similar essays, we should find that essentially they came to very little. Half of them would turn out to be a kind of literary "water-bewitched"—some obvious truism properly expanded and garnished with a sufficient commentary. The other half would be similarly reduced to the paradoxes which are the reverse of those truisms. Yet, simple as the process sounds, it doubtless requires a good deal of skill in manipulation. Essayists generally have so little to say, that much depends upon the neatness with which they put it. A man has, we will suppose, to prove, in a score of pages, that honesty is the best policy; or, like the "Man of the World," to illustrate the proposition that "marriage is the crucible of love." If he desires to be piquant more than to be improving, he will perhaps demonstrate the reverse of these truths, and show that honesty is the worst policy, or that marriage produces love instead of testing it. The first man who hit upon the truism about honesty must have been a man of genius, for he has succeeded in making many generations repeat his phrase till it has become wearisome. He compressed into five words a thought at which generations had been hammering without making it into an epigram. The reverse process may be similarly exemplified. When somebody at last succeeded, after many failures, in concocting the epigram that language was given us to conceal our thoughts, he invented one of the happiest witticisms that have ever been uttered. Yet all he had to do was to put into a formula the reverse of an intolerable truism. The imperfect attempts at uttering this phrase which have been discovered by the curiosity of later generations beautifully exemplify the extreme difficulty of making a really telling epigram. The business of the essayist is the reverse of this; he takes a platitude, and expands it into a disquisition; he resembles a sculptor who should repeat on a large scale the carving on a gem; or, more accurately, if more prosaically, he is like the cook who makes a savoury compound from a diminutive packet of portable soup. The epigram is the essence of art; and the essay is the dilution, which, for some purposes, is of more easy consumption.

Hence it would be absurd to condemn an essay on the ground that it, after all, says very little, and that that little is very old. If the threadbare text is expanded with due felicity, and made into an artistic whole, the writer has done all that can be demanded of him. He ought not, indeed, to give us blank commonplace, but we should be content if he sustains himself, though at a very small distance, just above the level of platitude. We might easily find fault with the "Man of the World," who is fonder of the essay founded upon simple platitude than of the cynical variety which starts from a paradox. He is accordingly rather apt to fall into downright commonplaces and to deal in that oppressive goodness and "geniality" which inspired Mr. Dickens's Christmas Books. "Next to a good wife," he tells us, "a good friend is the very best thing to be got." "A husband soon gets tired of the pretty artifices which pleased him as a lover." "Sacrifice nothing to appearances." These, and other little remarks which it would be easy enough to select, are not only true, but we might also say, disgustingly true. They are the raw material cropping up where we ought to have the manufactured article; the bare canvass showing where we only want embroidery. It is doubtless difficult in treating such subjects to avoid an occasional drop into the flattest prose, but the author is here a little abusing his privilege. For the most part, however, his remarks are pleasantly put and neatly illustrated, with a pleasant sprinkling of humour. The most unaccountable circumstance to us is that they should have been described as by "a Man of the World." The device rather resembles that by which tracts are sometimes distributed in envelopes holding out a promise of impropriety. We take up the book expecting to see some harsh and bitter criticisms upon human nature and society. To our surprise, we find ourselves talking to an amiable gentleman very fond of quiet family life, strongly attached to children, attached to the clergy, and with only one strong prejudice, which is apt to crop out at intervals without much reason, to the effect that the House of Lords is an effete and foolish institution. Indeed, the author is obliged to admit that he uses the title of "Man of the World" in a non-natural sense.

It is difficult to give any specific account of essays which are principally amplifications of well-known maxims, unless we were to indulge in long quotations. It is better to say simply that people who have time for such reading will find them pleasantly written, and, unless they are closely connected with the peerage, thoroughly inoffensive. Even a peer need not take the jibes directed against his order very much to heart. Probably it will survive several such assaults. There are, however, two or three essays touching upon more special subjects which we may commend to all whom it may concern. Persons interested in Universities and public schools may discover what is the view taken of them by one of the reprobate—by a gentleman, that is, who has gone through the usual course, and has only learnt to hate Latin verses with a bitter intensity, to detest even the classical authors generally, and to announce boldly the opinion that the Seven against Thebes is "as windy, worthless, and idealess a composition as exists." He has also learnt two small classical jokes, which he "values exceedingly," on the ground that they cost him a thousand pounds apiece—being, in his opinion, the net result of an education which amounted to that sum. The writer is eager to assure us that this opinion is not the result of any antipathy to poetry or literature as such, for he is an ardent admirer of Shelley, Shakspeare, and other great men, whose compositions did not enter into his course of instruction. It is merely, he thinks, the natural result of the stupid blundering system which makes our education generally a hollow mockery and sham. We forbear to inquire into the precise value of this argument, and will content ourselves with commending to the attention of Mr. Farrar and similar radical reformers the fact that a gentleman who can write good English, and is not without strong literary tastes, can speak with a certain personal antipathy of our whole educational course, as an intolerable grievance. We decline to ask whether it is the fault of our schools and Universities, or of the "author of Lost Sir Massingberd," that they disagree so decidedly with each other.

KING AND MUNRO'S HORACE.*

THE real student and the mere man of taste will each find a treasure in King and Munro's Horace. But, as is just, the worker will get the lion's share of it. The virtuoso will feast on wood engravings reproducing upon paper the actual effects of the glyptic art, will inspect without quitting his library the varied riches of the Beverley, Blacas, Paris, Berlin, Roman and British gem-collections, will assess the marketable value of this or that rare cameo or intaglio, and snatch a new sensation from signets that may have graced the finger of Menander or Aspasia. But the thorough-going scholar will reap more tangible fruit, while he not only feeds his eyes and informs his mind with the actual shapes of things known to him hitherto only by word and in imperfect conceptions, but also finds the text which these shapes illustrate soundly revised, and prefaced with a lucid and masterly introduction from the pen of one whose name rises first to every tongue when we speculate who shall be the first Cambridge Latin Professor. It is but natural to attach most value to these latter points; and never was inquirer less in danger of disappointment than when he seeks, in the text now given, definite views as to readings and orthography, and, in the introduction, clear grounds for those views, as well as a multum in parvo of curious and convincing criticism. Still the sternest iconoclast would be sorry to lose the gems wherewith Mr. King has illustrated the pages of his Horace, after once discerning the singular light they throw upon the text, and realizing their close connexion with the history, antiquities, and mythology of Rome as it was to Horace. Mr. King bases the claim of his edition to higher favour than met a century ago the beautiful copperplate vignettes of Pine's Horace, and the various followers in Pine's lead from that time till the present, upon his having limited himself to "the resources of the glyptic art alone," and not availed himself of medals or fancy-designs to help out a complete set of gem-subjects elucidatory of his text. "All persons," he writes, "conversant with ancient art are aware that engraved gems filled exactly the same place in the Roman world as prints on paper do in the modern; all subjects, being embodied in their medium, and by means of impressions circulated all over the empire. No theme was too high or too low for their scope; the profoundest mysteries of religion, and the broadest caricature, imperial majesty and the puffs of a quack doctor, with every other expression of the various feelings of our nature, claimed gems for their exponents." Acting upon this knowledge, Mr. King has secured the highest skill in wood-engraving for the production, not of "reduced copies of other copies," but of veritable "subjects drawn after the originals," which originals are furthermore culled from the vastly augmented stores that enrich the present generation. He deserves all the credit of having struck out an independent and definite path of illustration, untrodden or only partially trodden hitherto, and having pursued it with a tact and spirit which must command success. Perhaps it scarcely comes within the range of average scholars to have more than general ideas about Phidias and Apelles. The history of the ancient art of engraving on precious stones, with the names of its foremost professors, is but beginning to be popularized by the interesting researches of Mr. King. But its application to Horace is an idea which none will fail to appreciate, after having once tested its curious resources of illustration. It supplies in cameos and intaglios, chiefly used of old for signets, a contemporary portrait gallery; a commentary or Greek and Roman mythology; an "illustrated companion" to the implements, usages, and fashions of classical antiquity. Where could be seen a finer show of the historical and literary Romans of the Augustan period, or of the Greek philosophers, mostly indeed from gems of Imperial Rome, but still entitled to the credit of authenticity, because copied probably from contemporary statues? Among the philosophers, however, the "confronted busts of Socrates and Plato" represent a gem of exceptional rarity, being, Mr. King tells us (Sat. II. iv. A, pp. 286 and 446), a work of the best period of Greek art, and presenting what Visconti pronounced wellnigh indiscoverable—a genuine portrait of Plato. Other portrait-gems curiously illustrate individual weaknesses. That of Aristippus (Epist. I. xvii. A) bespeaks, by "bostrukized" hair and beard, a philosophic courtier who thought it worth while principibus placuisse viris; and the Numidian Juba (Od. I. xxii. A), from Mr. Maskelyne's electrotypes, seems to have set no less store on being, as Cicero described him, bene capillatus. Among historic personages, Mark Antony, at the head of Od. I. xxxvii., seems by his "massy features" to claim that Heraclid lineage which he so much affected, and at Od. III. xvi. A, Perseus, the last of Macedonian Kings, asserts his descent from his fabulous and Jove-born namesake, by a winged petasus, tipped with an eagle's head. At the head of the first ode of the Second Book, the "Julium Sidus" in the field fixes a date to the noble profile of Julius Cæsar, and elsewhere the likenesses of Augustus, Agrippa, Mæcenas, Livia, and Julia present these personages as vividly to the scholar, as the portrait exhibitions at South Kensington brought students of English literature and history face to face with their heroes and worthies.

If we turn to mythology, there is no lack in Mr. King's pages of varied illustration of its legends—some in the grotesqueness of early Pelasgic and Etruscan art, others in the "pure, perfect forms of mature Hellenic schools," and others again in "the flowing and languid elegance of the Decline." The feats of Hercules crossing the Styx and about to muffle Cerberus (I. iii. B), and voyaging in a raft upborne by empty amphoræ, with his lion-skin for sail and his club for rudder (I. vii. B) are both Etruscan; and so indeed is Nessus grasping Deianira, the headpiece to epode iii., wherein the Centaur's figure has the forelegs of a man, the original conception of the semi-equine form, which more refined Greek taste superseded with the human bust, completing the usual horse's figure. A very curious contrast between the Etruscan and Greek treatment of the same subject is pointed to in p. 143 and p. 154. In the latter page will be seen a Sisyphus conceived in the matter-of-fact Etruscan style, and in the former the same mythic personage performing his "up-hill" task according to perfected Greek style. In this all is natural enough. But in p. 154, a squared block is being lifted up the steps of a pyramid, which is destined to fall as soon as completed. Mr. King notes hereupon that the subjects of King Porsena, whose tomb is described in Plin. (N. H. xxxvi. 19), might be excused for taking pyramid-building as the best expression of "labour in vain."

Of the finished Greek school and style are "Apollo Musagetes" (I. xxxii. A); Ariadne, a beautiful head from the Berlin collection (II. xi. B); and Venus robing herself, an exquisite gem from Mr. Maskelyne's collection, said by Mr. King to have been probably a signet of Aspasia's class and date, and suggesting provokingly the high antiquity of crinolines. In the same book we are charmed by a graceful engraving of Atalanta, the gauzy texture of whose drapery shows the perfect symmetry of the Greek figure. One or two glyptic monuments claim, as Mr. King teaches us, a very far antiquity. The "Stork in its Flight" (Ode II. xx. A), bearing the genuine signature of Dexamenos the Chian, is proved, by the letters being read from right to left, to belong to a date prior to Herodotus. A beautiful nymph kneeling beside her pitcher, and identified by the tympanum on the field with the priestess of the mother of the gods, Rhea Silvia, is doubtless Roman (III. ix. B); and so are "Paris" (Ode I. xv. A), a youthful Bacchus (III. xxv. A), and numberless other heads and groups from mythology. Even more interesting, however, to the scholar will be those engravings which illustrate antique customs; e. g., the drinking vessels (scyphus, cyathus, crater), which figure in the Etruscan gem aptly adopted as a tail-piece to the last ode of the First Book; the insignia of the sacerdotal office graven on the signet of some ancient Flamen (Ode III. vi.), and "the instruments of sacrifice" on a gem used for the same purpose, represented at III. xxiii. B. In p. 64 (cf. 404) may be seen the "plectrum" and scabillum, which are the proper arms of a musician. How many of us can tell off-hand what a scabillum was?—the bronze shoe-sole which flute-players used to beat time with. These and many more curious antiquities appear in this Horatian museum, which in this respect admirably supplements, if it does not actually supersede, Rich's Illustrated Companion to the Latin Dictionary and the English Lexicon.

We could dwell for ever upon these delightful helps towards realizing antique forms and faces, but we must not forget a less superficial feature of this new Horace—its text, and its introduction to the text. For this text, in the absence of all MSS. of any great age, the chief materials have been a fuller collation of Bentley's Queen's College Oxford MS., by Mr. Nettleship of Lincoln College, and the more valuable "Oldest Bernese" of Orelli, older as it is by a century than all other existing codices, and that century "the interval in which designed interpolation began to be rife." It is fortunate, as regards the chief deficiency of the "Bernese," the almost entire absence of the Epistles and Satires, that there is compensation in the exceptional accuracy, as this part, of the collation by Cruquius of the MS. of the ninth century, known as "Blandinius Antiquissimus." In points of orthography the "Oldest Bernese" seems to have been followed more completely than in former editions.

We are not surprised that Mr. Munro ridicules, and slays with the sword of criticism, the phantom which has haunted most later German scholars, that many of Horace's odes are wholly or in parts spurious. Mr. Munro argues, with much force and eloquence, that, of all styles, that of Horace would be the hardest to imitate successfully, and he draws a pertinent analogy from Bentley's edition of the Paradise Lost. As that critic, from want of sympathy with Milton's highest efforts and ignorance of his favourite sources, the Italians and his own country's romances, cut out many of the poet's noblest lines, so Grüppe and Peerlkamp, in "crass ignorance of all the environments of Horace, and of the sources, native and Greek, most of them now lost, from which he drew his materials of thought," maunder about supposed incongruities, and in some cases actually excise (e.g. Ode I. xii.) what Quintilian quoted as genuine. But though there is no room for scepticism as to whole odes, Mr. Munro thinks there may be much as to single words. Such is the state of MSS. that, in spite of Macleane's vehement professions, even he had to desert their authority for conjecture. The best service that can be rendered under the circumstances is such sifting of evidence and critical dicta as Mr. Munro justly credits to Mr. J. E. Yonge, and as we discern, in method at least, in the valuable introduction before us. Not, indeed, that it is smooth sailing for such as venture to air their conjectures and possible emendations. "Most of us," says Mr. Munro, "from long habit prefer our own mumpsimuses to the most brilliant sumpsimus." And we can ourselves testify how much against the grain is conviction as to new readings, when our conservative instincts are interfered with. Indeed, we are ready to tax ourselves with perfidy matching that of any Cinara or Glycera, in inconstantly giving up old loves, or readings, for new and strange ones. But there is no help for it; we must throw overboard "Veris inhorruit Adventus," Conington's "Spring's first shiver" (Ode I. xxiii. 5), for Bentley's "Vepris inhorruit Ad ventum," in which he was anticipated by Salmasius, and which Munro decidedly prefers, because in February, spring's first advent, there would be as few lightly-moving leaves to shake in Italy as in England, and the steady zephyr's breath would be the last thing to frighten a fawn. With "Mauri peditis" (I. ii. 39) it is a less pang to part. As Bentley urges, the Moor was not "acer," and did not fight afoot, or hand to hand, to say nothing of the ill compliment to Mars involved in picturing him as delighting in the prowess of his children's foe. On the other hand, the traditional character of the Marsian, corroborated by Appian's proverb that "there never was a triumph over Marsian, or without Marsian aid," should reconcile us to this emendation. To the usual reading and interpretation of Ode II. xx. 6-7, "Non ego, quem vocas, Dilecte Mæcenas, obibo," we are not yet prepared to say good bye; but there is serious ground for surrendering the wonted punctuation at v. 5 of the first ode of Horace. In spite of the judgment of his great predecessor Bentley, Mr. Munro calls on us to place a full-stop after "palmaque nobilis." In this case the infinitive and the two nominatives, both joined with one "juvat," have an exact Horatian parallel in Ode I. iv. 29; and vv. 7-10, otherwise without a construction, find one approved by Macleane and Dr. Kennedy, and justified by the parallel which is cited from Epist. I. xvii. 33-4:—

> Res gerere et captos ostendere civibus hostis
> Attingit solium Jovis et cœlestia temptat.

The feeling of awkwardness at ending the sentence with v. 5 is "mere habit," and, amidst many similar rhythms, Munro quotes an exact parallel in the first sentence of the last ode in the third book, the epilogue to the Odes, as the first ode forms their prologue. Another conjecture, which he supports with such force as to justify its acceptance, though he stops short of that step, is to read "Thynus" or "Thœnus" for Pœnus in the lines "Navita Bosporum Pœnus perhorrescit" (II. xiii. 14). Whereas the drift of this passage is that men only guard against known dangers, the common reading here represents "the Punic skipper fearing straits with which he has little business," none at any rate comparable to his own Syrtes. Munro shows the futility of Orelli's suggestion that "Pœnus" means "Tyrian" or "Sidonian"; and by imagining a case of a supposed corrupt text in Shakspeare, argues that it is more legitimate to accept Lachmann's Thynus here (the Thyni dwelt along the shores of the Bosporus) than "Cales" or "Cadiz" for "Calais," supposing a sentence to have run, "the Calais skipper fears nought beyond the straits of Gibraltar." Yet the latter emendation, he says with a quaint drollery which it is impossible to summarize, would be greeted with a εὕρηκα. At III. xxiv. 4, his inclination would lead him to read "Tyrrhenum omne tuis et superum mare," and to consider "Apulicum" a gloss for the italicized word; but he accepts Lachmann's "Terrenum omne tuis et mare publicum" in deference to authority, although with a suspicion that "Tyrrhenum" is genuine, and "terrenum" baser metal. Upon another contested line "Altricis extra limen Apuliæ," his reasons for doubting Mr. Yonge's emendation "limina villulæ"—namely, the absence of such diminutives from the highest class of Augustan poetry—constitute in themselves a small mine of criticism. We must refer the scholar to it, and only notice one other improved reading (Ode I. iv. 8), which he thinks justified by MSS. authority, although he does not, with Bentley, adopt it. For "Vulcanus ardens urit officinas," some MSS. read visit; and Munro attributes this variance to the fact that in Horace's day "visit" would be written "uissit." Correct transcribers would keep "visit" when "uissit" became obsolete, while the more ignorant would change it to "ussit," an unmeaning perfect soon changed again to "urit." As he adds truly, "Venus dancing in the moonshine while her husband is away visiting the stithies of the Cyclops," is a beautiful picture. For many more valuable hints as to interpretation, as well as prosody and punctuation, we must refer our readers to the volume itself, and content ourselves with saying that in its twofold aspect, and in the excellency of the distinct work of its twin editors, this edition of Horace reflects the highest credit upon English culture and scholarship.

A YANKEE MINOR POET.*

THE reader will doubtless receive with curiosity the announcement of a new poem by the author of Daisy Swain. That poem was in every possible respect so utterly unlike anything to which we have been accustomed in this country, that it is not probable that any Englishman who had the privilege of reading it can have forgotten its characteristic features. To those of our benighted countrymen who were prevented, by lack either of time or of Transatlantic sympathies, from making acquaintance with Mr. Dagnall's first work, an opportunity is now offered, by the publication of the Mexican, of appreciating the merits of this minor poet of America. A major poet Mr. Dagnall himself would at present perhaps hardly claim to be, since he has only hitherto given to the world two not very lengthy "poems" as the fruit of his genius.

It is true that much higher claims have been put forward in Mr. Dagnall's behalf by some of the American daily, monthly, and quarterly papers and magazines. Daisy Swain was, according to the Vermont and Massachusetts critics, an "elevated," "inspired," and, above all, a "thoroughly loyal" poem. A magazine of Philadelphia said that Mr. Dagnall had displayed real power in that work, and that his genius would earn him an enviable position and fame as a poet. "If," cried a Boston journal, "any Englishman should contemptuously ask now 'who writes an American poem?' we should triumphantly answer, 'John M. Dagnall.'" But it was a New York paper that gave the severest rebuke to the narrow insular prejudices of Albion, by raising the new author to a height above our most renowned poets of the present and past centuries. "Byron," said this critic, "wrote Don Juan; Shelley, Prometheus Bound; and Coleridge, Christobel (sic); but neither of the three had the genius to produce Daisy Swain. Long may its distinguished author write," &c. &c. It is, however, fairly questionable whether the whole of this criticism springs from purely æsthetic considerations, or whether some of it may not have been written from an international or anti-British point of view. Just as there are in England some journals and some politicians who make the most sincere and admirable efforts to be truthful and impartial on most topics, but on whom the word "Yankee" or "negro" has a perfectly maddening effect, so it is conceivable that some American critics may be unable to resist the temptation of administering a snub to English literature, and may choose rather to obey the dictates of patriotic spleen than those laws of criticism which their profound study of high art would otherwise have suggested to them to follow. Had the Boston critic been able to keep the thought of the "contemptuous Englishman" out of his head, and had the recollection of our pretentious Byrons, Coleridges, and Shelleys not occurred to the New York reviewer, they might perhaps have claimed a somewhat less transcendent glory for their new poet. And, at any rate, Mr. Dagnall himself will probably for the present be content to be classed among American bards as a "minor poet." Even if he claims to be superior to every English poet of the eighteenth or nineteenth century, it may occur to him that, according to the proverb, Au royaume des aveugles les borgnes sont rois. His ambition, if he be the gifted creature that his Yankee critics portray him, is probably tempered by at least a Transatlantic modicum of modesty; and it is not likely that he will at present expect us to rank him above his countryman Longfellow.

The scene of Mr. Dagnall's new poem is laid in Mexico during the last days of Maximilian's Government, and it describes the adventures of a young Republican of Sonora. This hero, whom the author sometimes calls "Rafael," and sometimes, from considerations of metre or of enthusiastic affection, "Raf.," is betrothed to a lovely creature named Morena, and is enjoying life immensely in her society until it occurs to him to meditate upon the wrongs and sufferings of his country under "the foreign sneak" Maximilian, and to conclude that he ought to strike a blow for the Republic of Mexico. He is possessed of great personal prowess, which is thus described in lofty lines by the poet:—

> Nor one, nor two, he feared to meet; for tho'
> Still young in years, yet few his strength could boast;
> And he who dared dispute his way, he'd rap
> With well aimed blows his sconce, until his eyes
> Would flash with stars.

Accordingly, leaving Morena under the care of her father, Don Pedro, he goes on board a privateer, and sails down the Gulf of California. After a desperate but triumphant encounter with a French vessel, he is caught in a storm and shipwrecked. All the crew except Rafael are drowned; and he is cast, almost dead, upon an apparently desert island. Here however he is rescued and cherished by an enchanted princess, who falls in love with him, but from whom, after a time, he escapes on board of a Spanish ship which puts into the enchanted island for water. Meanwhile Gandora, a rival of Rafael, but whose suit has been rejected by Don Pedro and his daughter, having first betrayed to Maximilian the meditated rising in Sonora, carries off Morena to a castle which he has strongly fortified. Rafael, however, who returns at that juncture from the enchanted island, and disembarks from the Spanish vessel, pursues Gandora to his stronghold, and after a sharp struggle kills him, and rescues Morena. This done, and the Republican cause having meanwhile prevailed, the lovers are happily married.

Now as to the metre in which the poet has clothed this epic. Judging by the foregoing extract, the reader may perhaps have jumped to the conclusion that the poem is written in iambic pentameters, or blank heroic verse. Such a conclusion would be erroneous, though very natural. The impression made upon any reader by the first ten lines must certainly be that the poem is intended to be written in that measure; and perhaps, by a very liberal allowance for the use of trochees, tribrachs, anapæsts, dactyls, and even cretics, in the place of the normal iambics, he might manage to maintain his theory for the first ten or twelve pages of the poem, though he would find his liberality sorely tried by such lines as the following:—

> For them he felt
> He war could wage, or still in tempests live,
> Danger scorn upon the waste of waters,
> Where the winds of ocean free shall waft him
> Where adventure leads to fame and conquest,
> 'Gainst his foes upon the sea.

But he will come before long to verses to which it is impossible to assign five feet of any kind whatever, and which even upon the give and take system—that is, allowing the redundant syllables of one verse to supply the deficiencies of another—cannot be made out to be pentameters. For example:—

> But doomed beneath their roofs
> Of mold and filth of dungeon damp they may > Be for a time; yet the sun doth shine
> Doth weigh the balance.

* The Mexican; or, Love and Land. By J. M. Dagnall, Author of "Daisy Swain." New York: American News Company.

The most Procrustean ingenuity cannot torture the third and fourth of those lines into heroic verses; and the occurrence of these, and hundreds of similar and even shorter lines, throughout the poem may sorely puzzle the English reader, unless he bethinks himself of the true solution of the difficulty, which is thus suggested in the words of the poet's New York publishers:—"Nothing in this work is stilted. The poet's thoughts spring spontaneously from the subject; and his verse is unaffected and free from the restraints of mechanical mannerism on which so many poets rely for their reputation." The obvious truth is that this child of Columbia cannot, like the unhappy Byron or Coleridge, and like so many miserable English poets of the present day, suffer himself to be tied and bound by the rigid fetters of metre. The genius of his poetry bursts the slavish bonds of prosody, and soars far above the region of forms into that illimitable Yankee empyrean where only he and the spread eagle are at home.

Let us, in a spirit of hopeless yet ungrudging admiration, proceed to note some of those beauties of thought and diction which justify the ecstasies of the publishers at having secured the monopoly of such a work. And, in order to save the constant repetition of the symbol sic, it may be here stated, once for all, that every extract from the poem is quoted with literal and verbal fidelity to the original. Here is an instance of what the poet's publishers call "his sweet and elegant expressions of language." The poet has been describing a scene between Rafael and Morena, in which they "pay compliments," or, as we should say, make love, under "a green alcove"—that is to say, the shade of a mango tree. Sitting under this mango,

> Alternate then
> They'd look at each and smile, then clasp each hand
> With friendly fervor; for each one felt that each
> Was loved.

The "compliments" of American lovers are somewhat intricate. It would puzzle two European lovers to smile upon each; but their utmost ingenuity would probably fail to find out how to manipulate their four hands, so that they might clasp each of the four with friendly fervour. Having ended "their compliments," the lovers, if we are not mistaken, kiss one another:—

> Then wrangling Mars
> And Cupid quartered in their leafy camp.

But it is difficult to be sure of the exact meaning of these lines. Mars clearly means Rafael, and Cupid, apparently, Morena. The loves of Mars and Cupid are a novel, but exquisitely improved, American edition of the Old World tale which Demodocus sang; and the refined term "quartering" no doubt embodies the notion which is conveyed to us English Philistines by the commoner word hugging. Having "quartered," the lovers go home:—

> Soon they reached
> With graceful step and slow, the palace of > Don Pedro fair Morena's honor'd sire,
> Whose shiny pate an index bald revealed
> That there old Time a barber turn'd and shorn
> It of the locks his youth had wove.
> But yet he bore his weight of years well.

In England an index is generally intended to reveal something else, and does not itself require revelation. But Mr. Dagnall does not use the word in that low utilitarian sense. According to him an index means a secret or mystery which requires explanation. In England, also, shorn is not, except in one or two provincial dialects, the past tense of shear, nor wove the past participle of weave. An English poet would feel himself compelled to write sheared and woven. But then in England we are enslaved by the tyranny of grammar, as well as that of prosody. The American minor poet is equally free in both these respects; and we must envy the elasticity which our language gains under his patronage. Thus, for example, the pronoun thou is in this poem both singular and plural, and of both second and third persons. "Thou may," "thou wilt," "thou did," "thou wish," "thou conceives," "thou doth"—all these combinations are common in the Mexican, as they were in Daisy Swain. The following verses will illustrate this great improvement in the use of pronouns. The poet makes Rafael exclaim, after his shipwreck,

> Ah, comrades brave! alas! I cannot help
> Think of thy fate. Oh! let thy conscious spirits
>
> Blame not me . . .
> Down in thy ocean graves in peace repose
> From earthly toil secure, sweet be thy sleep!

And again, before the storming of Gandora's stronghold:—

> "The maiden yield from thralldom vile," Raf cried,
> "Ere we upon thy heads destruction hurl."

His use of the termination th is another example of the poet's liberty. This termination, which a tyrannous prescription compels us in England to reserve for the third person singular of the present tense indicative, is used by Mr. Dagnall for the termination of almost every person, number, and tense of the verb. The following lines will severally illustrate its employment for (a) the first and (b) second persons singular, and (c) for the third person plural, of the present tense; and for (d) the third person singular, and (e) third person plural, of the past tense:—

> (a) It was the pleasing smile I oft hath seen.
> (b) Here at my side when thou Rafael goeth hence.
> (c) Hath Republics but a life's uncertain date?
> (d) Don Pedro rose,
> And spaketh to his mirthful guests around.
> (e) Ere their words upon the south wind fledeth.

After all, however, it is useless to attempt to classify the poet's usages of words. Any such attempt shows a fundamental inability to appreciate the unconditioned nature of the poet's liberty. One could almost as well imagine an American patriot subject to the grinding despotism of Queen Victoria as an American poet submitting to be governed by grammatical rules or critical canons. Under what rule, for instance, could we class the following amazing discord of the verb and its subject?—

> The weapons which thy grace wouldst lend
> To quell the rash insurgents.

Or the following abnormal, yet elegant, inflection of the verb to

> They done as bid, for every one approved
> The Captain's word.

To attempt to formulate the unconditioned is a hopeless task, and the reader is probably ready to admit that Mr. Dagnall's verse is indeed "free from the restraints of mechanical mannerism." Such lines as > Soon near the altar stone in special pew

> Devout, near other worshippers, she knelt.

Or,

> Come hither champion brave, the rostrum mount.

Or,

> But him she'd pass
> Disdainful by, nor condescended once
> To fix upon his low and sensual phiz
> A gaze.

Or,

> Ah! who she sighed can tell what evil there
> On yonder deep, which now so tranquilly > Reposeth, hath befallen my young man?

will sufficiently convince the reader that Mr. Dagnall's publishers are justified in asserting that he possesses "all the human moods, the very qualities of heart and soul of the true poet." On the whole, it is clear that, since the publication of Daisy Swain and the Mexican, the reputation of Byron, Shelley, and Coleridge has been hopelessly doomed.

WIFE AND CHILD.*

WHAT evil genius prompted Miss Whitty to attempt a story so entirely beyond her grasp, both in method of narration and in circumstances? The autobiographical form, when the speaker is assumed to be a man, is almost beyond the power of any woman to render lifelike. How indeed can she make lifelike the workings of a nature with which she is necessarily very imperfectly acquainted? for even the woman who understands most about men is still very far from any accurate knowledge of them as they are with each other and to themselves. Wife and Child is simply an amazing story, so far as its mistakes go. We cannot understand how any educated person in the present day, when so much is known concerning French society, should have made so many and such grave blunders. She might have read, if she could not observe; and the meagrest magazine article that treated of her subject could have set her right, and have given her more correct information than what she possessed for herself. The book is made-believe—and it is a very transparent make-believe indeed—to be written by a Mr. Harley, an artist travelling in France apparently in happy forgetfulness of picture-dealers and exhibitions; who, alighting by chance at the village of Gamaches, instantly plunges into the midst of the small love affairs and domestic dramas going on there at the moment, and moreover gets admitted to the grand château, and taken into the confidence of peer and peasant in a way little less than marvellous. But it is as difficult to understand why Miss Whitty chose France for her scene of action as why she chose a man for her fictitious narrator. For though she has probably passed through Picardy and Normandy, where she places the scene of her story, she has evidently learnt no more of the life there than a foreigner would learn of England by looking at the fields and villages from the windows of a railway carriage. She gives no touch of local colouring anywhere, and her ignorance of even the most salient points of difference between us and our neighbours is as complete as it is odd. Her characters have French names, but they have decidedly English ways, and speak, act, and think as if they had been born within the sound of Bow Bells, and had never stirred beyond it.

When the ground lines are shaky and ill-drawn the whole structure is sure to be awry; and we are bound to confess that Wife and Child is very much awry indeed. There is not a blunder in any way possible to be made that is not dragged in to swell the list of literary offences. The author speaks of men getting drink at a road-side café; her travellers go by a coach and alight at the door of a village inn; among these travellers is the narrator, the Mr. Harley in question, who has passed as a Frenchman with his peasant fellow-voyagers, until, suddenly aroused, he speaks in English, when to their amazement they discover he is an Englishman; though how a set of unlettered peasants could distinguish the Britannic tongue from the German, the Russian, or the Spanish, is among the minor mysteries of the narrative. Hodge at his plough would not be so discriminating, for every foreigner would be mounseer to him indifferently, feeding on frogs and living in slavery, whatever his special nationality. When these perspicacious peasants alight at the door of the village inn, which is in the square, and is called the Artists' Home—we should like to see that sign translated into French—they all go into the "coffee-room," and here Mr. Harley hears something about a former occupant of the state-chamber of the inn, an Englishman, commonly called "le Gentilhomme"—certainly a literal translation of "the gentleman," the name by which a stranger might have been known in a primitive English village, but as certainly not the name which would have been given him in France. When the room called le Gentilhomme's chamber is being prepared for the new-comer, Madame Planchette, the untidy hostess with a good heart under her slatternly exterior, finds that she has no sheets, so has to borrow them from her neighbour, Madame la Directrice de Poste, next door. Now this was a very strange want on the part of Madame Planchette; inconceivable, indeed, in a country where almost the poorest peasant bride has her "dozens"—of household linen among the rest—as her necessary corbeille de mariage, and where linen is far more plentiful than in England; partly because, in the country, the "grand wash" comes only two or three times in the year, not as with us every week, and therefore a larger store is needed; and partly because the national customs go that way, and French linen, like Scotch "napery," marks the respectability of the family and the niceness of its habits. These are the first blunders; all occurring quite in the beginning of the book; and they have so far a good effect that they prepare the reader for the graver mistakes that are to follow.

The authority of parents over their children, and the almost universal obedience which children pay to their parents' wishes in the matter of marriage, with the consequent prevalence of the mariage de convenance over that of mere affection, and the excessive shyness and social effacement of unmarried girls, are about the cardinal points of French society. Take away these, and the whole social fabric must be reorganized. It would be no longer France, but another country altogether. Let us see how these cardinal points are dealt with in Wife and Child, and what is made of the obedience of sons and the social effacement of girls. A young man, the heir of his house and the only son of his mother, has fallen in love with a street girl, a wandering acrobat originally, whom his mother took from her perilous profession and brought up in her own house in unfettered intimacy with her son; all which, to begin with, is as utterly impossible as that an Eastern youth should be in full familiarity with his friend's harem. This lady, Madame de Vermandois, wants her son Louis to marry his cousin, one Mademoiselle Adèle d'Artigny; but though Adèle is passionately in love with Louis, he snubs her cruelly and will have none of her. The queerest bit of drawing of all is in this character of Mademoiselle Adèle. She is a bold, forward, sensual girl, who talks to gentlemen that she sees for the first time with the aplomb of a married woman—and a singularly cool hand, too, among married women; who is insolent and discourteous as no French lady would allow herself to be; and who shows such an amount of voluptuous love for her cousin as would be simply impossible in French society. No well-conducted woman of any age could so far forget herself as Adèle is represented as doing; even among the lorettes themselves it would not be tolerated as an exhibition made in cold blood; and were a demoiselle of Adèle's rank mad enough for such displays, they would be taken as the aberrations of madness pure and simple, and the girl would be consigned to a maison de santé or to a convent. A demoiselle is the very fetish of French sentiment, the idol round which our neighbours hang their choicest garlands; and the care taken of her in anything like decent society is one of the main facts of French life. Again, no man would have spoken of a demoiselle, and his cousin, too, as "a splendid creature—a fine animal." Public opinion would revolt against such a tone as abominable and disgraceful; for, whatever Frenchmen may permit themselves to say of married women or light women, a young girl—l'ingénue of the stage—is sacred. Then Adèle is supposed to be able to go out alone at all hours, to have secret interviews with a ruffianly vagrant by name José, and to sleep on the ground floor, far away from her mother's room, and in a part of the house where the gentlemen and the guests sleep—all of which is no more according to the habits and customs of French domesticity than if a Frenchman were to speak of our ladies as joining in a man's wine party, or sleeping in communistic dormitories. What can we think of a picture of French manners which makes a lady apologize to a gentleman, and an Englishman too, for having placed his room on the ground-floor next to Adèle's? whereupon he answers, "It will make no difference, unless it should produce a nightmare"? to which she replies, "I trust it will produce nothing worse!" referring to the enmity between them, and the possible results of this, not to anything more equivocal. A shrewd sharp Frenchwoman could not possibly have made such a broad double entendre innocently; and, not being able to make it innocently, she would not have made it at all, of a demoiselle. Then, again, a husband and wife detail their night conversation together, which also is utterly inadmissible as a picture of manners, on many grounds. This kind of writing is indeed a perilous playing with edge tools.

The Mr. Harley, too, who tells this odd history of Anglicized Gauls, is about as like reality as a waxwork figure or a field scarecrow. He is simply a very weak woman put into coat and trousers, and his voice is the voice of Bottom roaring like a sucking dove. He plays with little children like a woman; takes maternal care of distressed young females like a woman; gives scarlet flannel to old dames, and expatiates on the advantages of the scarlet colour for warmth and comfort, certainly not as a man would have done; enters into the love affairs of his neighbours like a woman; and is tearful, pedantic, and impulsive, all like a woman of rather more than average sentimentality and rather less than ordinary fibre. He and Louis de Vermandois talk together in the tallest of the high falutin' style. Their first interview is described thus:—Mr. Harley is sketching; Louis is half asleep on the ground near him; the two are strangers, but Louis, suddenly arousing himself and lifting his cap, apologizes for "turning the highway into a bedchamber"; but he "could not make an exertion to look up," he said, "so locked was every faculty in the imprisonment of thought." To which Mr. Harley replies: "At your age I should have fancied imagination to be a more natural expression than thought." "Imagination is the offspring of passions—thought the child of knowledge." After a little more of the same kind, Mr. Harley goes on to say:—

> While I was thus drawing my own conclusions, he turned, and seeing my scrutinizing examinations, laughingly exclaimed, "Are you wishful to take my portrait, in order to impart human animation as an enhancement to your landscape sketch?" "Not unless you think your portrait would produce the desired effect," I answered, with a somewhat malicious smile. "Ah! that is a reproach to my discourtesy in presuming your drawing needed improvement." "Nay, it was not my drawing I alluded to, but this lovely scene, which, so far from needing humanity as an embellishment, makes us poor mortals feel terribly out of place amidst such exquisite poetry of nature," &c. &c.

Is this the kind of talk two young men would hold together in the Forest of Eu or anywhere else?

If Wife and Child is odd in every other respect, it is also odd in its grammar; it is as if the author wrote by ear, not knowledge, and her ear played her false not unfrequently. She speaks of a language "comprehensive to all around"; says "have control of you"; makes "them" refer to "any one"; calls a bad smell "inodorous"; and so forth. As for the story, it is worthy of the diction and general style of treatment. A secret marriage between the "gentilhomme" of the beginning—one Mr. Edward Dargan, whom Mr. Harley knew from the first to have been an Irishman, and not English at all, because he was said to have had dark blue eyes—and a factory girl, by name Marie, has resulted in the birth of a little girl, and the flight of the unacknowledged wife or mother. Mr. Dargan dies, the mother dies; the child becomes a street acrobat; is saved by Madame de Vermandois; has her papers, her mother's marriage certificate, &c., stolen by José, and is therefore for a time unable to substantiate her legitimacy; is much exercised and hardly dealt with by Adèle, because of her love for Louis de Vermandois; and finally emerges from all her clouds under the patronage of Mr. Harley, and is married to Louis with the full consent of everybody. If Miss Whitty had called her book a picture of Chinese society, she would have been quite as near the mark as she is in making it a would-be representation of French life; for not a line in it, not a character, not a circumstance has the smallest flavour of France from first to last, and laws, manners, and national characteristics are all equally ignored or violated.

FRENCH LITERATURE.

THE fresh discoveries of manuscript documents which are daily taking place prove at the same time how little we still know of the historical treasures at our disposal, and how necessary it is to reconsider some of the facts which have been hitherto regarded as established beyond the possibility of a doubt. Examine, for instance, the question of the Spanish marriages during the reign of Henry IV. and the Regency of Marie de Médicis. Most historians in discussing this twofold piece of matrimonial diplomacy assert that the negotiations on the subject began in the year 1609; if we believe them, Henry IV. was thoroughly averse to the whole affair, and took no pains to conceal his feelings. But, in point of fact, the preliminary schemes with reference to the fresh bond which was to connect France with Spain may be traced back as far as the year 1602; at the very birth of the Infanta Anne of Austria and of the Dauphin Louis they were already in contemplation, and in 1609 they were interrupted on account of the "grand design" which for a time estranged France from Spain, whilst it led to an alliance with Savoy. It follows that, on assuming the regency, Marie de Médicis could, without departing very much from the truth, say that in renewing the negotiations for the Spanish marriages she was adhering to the policy of the late King. We have thus stated in a few words one of the points on which the history of the reign of Henry IV. and of the subsequent regency requires to be corrected; but there is, besides, a fact which, although universally acknowledged, has never been sufficiently explained. In 1612 the marriages were settled, and the necessary documents signed by the contracting parties; how is it that the exchange of the princesses did not take place till 1615? The answer must be found in the opposition raised by the members of the Royal family of France, who, by suggesting fresh causes of delay, tried to render the alliance ultimately impossible, and nearly succeeded in so doing. M. Perrens, in attempting to throw new light upon this important episode of the early part of the seventeenth century, has written an interesting volume*, full of valuable details, and illustrated by copious extracts from unpublished diplomatic papers; these are the despatches of Roberto Ubaldini, Archbishop of Montepulciano, and Nuncio at the Court of France (1608–1615), and the correspondence of Savary de Brèves, French ambassador at the Court of Rome during the same period. Other papers, enumerated by M. Perrens in his preface, have also been profitably consulted; and, with such sources at his disposal, he has been able to complete not only M. Bazin's Histoire de Louis XIII, but the contemporary narrative of Charles Bernard, Claude Malingre, Levassor, and Father Griffet.

It was only last month that we had occasion to review a new French work on the history of Charles VIII. The present volume of M. Zeller takes us to the same epoch *, but its subject is Italy, not France, and the field over which the historian extends his observations is far wider, including the second half of the fifteenth century as well as the first twenty years of the sixteenth. M. Zeller has made it his aim, not to produce an erudite and original work, but to popularize the results of learning, and bring them out in an agreeable form. He gives us a series of lectures in which both the literary and the political condition of Italy during the Renaissance period are impartially discussed. The Medici, the Borgias, Machiavelli, and Savonarola are the principal actors in that busy drama; the extremes of refinement and of corruption uniting as in one common channel to overrun society, whilst the counter-current of the Reformation is already gathering its strength and threatening the Church.

With the exception of a volume written two centuries ago by Charpentier, the first President of the Académie des Inscriptions et Belles-lettres, France could not until very lately boast of a good monograph on Socrates and his philosophy.† M. Chaignet has endeavoured to supply the deficiency, and his unpretending book will be found to furnish, in a readable and attractive form, every fact of moment respecting the subject of which it treats. M. Chaignet, in estimating Socrates, places himself at a point of view diametrically opposite to that which Mr. Grote has adopted. Even in the preface we see the feeling of antagonism breaking out, and the author, whilst discussing the authorities for a biography of Socrates, wonders that Mr. Grote should have tried to rehabilitate the philosopher Adrastus Aphrodisiensis, quoted by Proclus, but whose evidence has seemed to Dr. Ritter worth no consideration whatever. M. Chaignet has studied in all its bearings the system of philosophy introduced by Socrates, and he finds in it not merely an intellectual reform, but a revolution affecting man's whole life. The principle from which Socrates starts is, we are told, exactly the same as that afterwards adopted by Descartes; he clears the ground of the extraneous materials accumulated by those who had gone before him, and contends that, instead of studying the phenomena of the outward world, man should concentrate all his attention upon himself. We have spoken of the system of philosophy which Socrates originated; but the expression is not strictly correct, and M. Chaignet finds fault with the great Greek moralist for not having propounded anything like a distinct code of doctrine. The quotations contained in M. Chaignet's volume are very judiciously selected, and they show a considerable amount of reading and research.

M. Camille Selden has the great merit of discoursing about Germany with a full knowledge of what Germany really is, and the introduction to his volume entitled L'Esprit moderne en Allemagne‡ proves that he has bestowed long and careful study on the subject of which he writes. We have to thank him for an amusing and thoughtful volume. Heine, the Archduke Maximilian, Hebbel and Anastasius Grün, suggest by turns a number of excellent remarks which place our author far above the usual tribe of tourists who pretend to know Germany à fond if they have only spent a single season at Vienna or Dresden.

It may seem singular to find M. Martha beginning his essay on Lucretius by a declaration to the effect that he, M. Martha, is neither an Epicurean nor an atheist.§ But religious discussions have reached such a pitch in France that even literature is under suspicion; both parties are on the look-out to watch the slightest symptom which can indicate to what side you belong, and if any writer of acknowledged reputation were to compose a book in praise of Bayle's intellectual qualities, there is no doubt that he would be ipso facto set down by some charitable critics as a thoroughgoing sceptic. M. Martha takes some pains to explain, in the first place, how Epicureanism has already been refuted over and over again; and, in the second, how unfair it is to deny the literary merits of an author simply because the opinions he advocates are erroneous. A system may be decidedly false, and at the same time the prose or poetry in which it is expounded may be as decidedly genuine. Such is the case with Lucretius, whose value as a poet and thinker may be, and ought to be, estimated quite independently of the doctrine which he has clothed in such magnificent language. A hundred years ago the poem De Naturâ Rerum obtained a kind of spurious popularity, not so much on account of its literary merits as because it served the then fashionable cause of irreligion. Lucretius enjoyed in the salons of Madame du Deffand and Madame Geoffrin what the French would call a succès de vogue, though very few indeed amongst the poet's most enthusiastic admirers would have been able to give a critical and scholarly account of his works. M. Martha has given us a volume which, in a certain sense, completes the well-known edition of M. Munro. He deals not so much with the grammatical side of the subject as with the literary merits of the work, the ideas developed, and the system maintained. In a preliminary chapter he gives a general sketch of the doctrines of Epicurus, he then shows how Lucretius has popularized these ideas, and he concludes by an estimate of the system itself. Ingenious parallels with other writers, both ancient and modern, occur frequently, and some of the most striking passages are translated into French Alexandrines.

The collection of travelling handbooks prepared under M. Joanne's direction has just been enriched by the publication of a new volume on Corsica.* For the majority of Frenchmen that island has almost the interest of a foreign country; the language is one with which they are not familiar, the manners of the inhabitants are extraordinary, and the terrible vendetta is there, threatening all imprudent persons who might even inadvertently trifle with the feelings of the sensitive Corsicans. M. Léonard de Saint-Germain has accordingly found it necessary to give details of a kind somewhat different from those which fill most guide-books. A geographical and historical résumé opens the volume; then comes the itinéraire, properly so called, including a disquisition of forty-two pages on Vendetta and Bandittism.

The first three fasciculi of Dr. Wurtz's Chemical Dictionary are now published†, and they enable us to judge of the importance of the whole work. Not only is the strictly scientific view of chemistry fully discussed, but also the manifold applications of the substances which come successively under notice. Thus the article Amidon gives us, in the first place, a complete enumeration of all starch-producing substances; it describes also, with every possible detail, the preparation of starch itself, its uses and its effects. The essay on Analysis, occupying forty-eight pages of close print, may be considered as thoroughly exhaustive. It includes some important remarks on spectral analysis, and is illustrated by a number of useful woodcuts. Dr. Wurtz is responsible for a series of papers in which, whilst examining the subjects of atomicity, the atomic theory and atomic weight, he adds fresh developments to the views which he had stated in his introduction. The fabrication of steel is described under the heading Acier, and the preparation of alcoholic liquors furnishes another instance of the care bestowed by the learned author upon questions of applied science.

M. Arnaud (de l'Ariège) has nothing very new to tell us about the famous case of Christianity versus the French Revolution.‡ Far from adopting M. Michelet's theory, he maintains that the Revolution is the practical realization of the theory on which Christianity itself is based. He writes in a fair and dispassionate spirit, and evidently wishes to claim on behalf of the Church an important position in modern democratic society. Not only does he represent apostolic Christianity as perfectly compatible with the tendencies of the age, but he cannot imagine that the doctrine of religious infallibility as asserted by the Church is a fallacy to be cast aside and for ever given up. The only cause of the quarrel between the two contending parties is, in his opinion, the union of Church and State.

The history of the French Revolution §, as we have already said, is in M. Michelet's estimation the history of the decay and final catastrophe of Christianity. Three more volumes of this singular work are now before us, and they bring the narrative down to the events of Thermidor. We notice at the beginning of the fifth volume a preface in which M. Michelet professes to describe M. Louis Blanc's hero, Robespierre, as he really was. It would be difficult to find anything more curious in the way of statement and reasoning. Robespierre, says our author, rose to absolute power, thanks to the support he obtained from the Jacobins, the priests, and the landowners. The last two elements in this enumeration are rather startling. Never was there, continues the ingenious historian, a less violent mob than the Parisian populace. If Robespierre has been whitewashed, it is because Napoleon was his successor; a Jacobin tyrant leads naturally to a military despot, and by the law of reaction the government of the sword must bring back that of the clubs. We are also informed by M. Michelet that Count Joseph de Maistre was an admirer of Robespierre. Madame de Staël is found fault with because her sympathies were too aristocratic, and because she suffered from a chronic attack of Anglomania.

M. Durand's list of new publications contains some items which deserve to be noticed here; and, first of all, M. Beaussire's interesting and comprehensive work on Liberty.‖ The author begins by showing what man's individual rights really are, and by tracing the history of the assertion of these rights from the earliest period to the present time. Amongst the nations of classical antiquity, where the action of the State was incessant, philosophers were less anxious to enjoy the liberty of professing their doctrines than to procure for those doctrines the sanction of the Government. They wanted to become legislators, and to obtain a kind of monopoly which, in the long run, must prove fatal to freedom and to the security of the State itself. Christianity marked out in the clearest manner the respective provinces of the State and of the individual conscience; but the Church compromised the ideas of its Divine founder by seeking an alliance with temporal rulers, and even the reformers of the sixteenth century committed the same mistake as soon as they had thrown off the yoke of the Papacy. M. Beaussire proclaims the independence of moral life, and from this point of view he examines man's position in the world, both as member of the State and of a family. Education, the freedom of the press, the right of meeting, the question of property in its various aspects—all these subjects are carefully discussed.

The History of Cartesianism, which a few years ago made M. Bouillier's name justly popular *, has reached a second edition. It would be difficult to name a more interesting subject, whether we consider the genius of the men who were concerned in upholding Cartesianism or the results which it brought about. Descartes, Malebranche, and Spinosa are, of course, the three principal figures in M. Bouillier's volumes; but around them are grouped a number of other characters which give life to the narrative, and transport the reader from one part of intellectual Europe to the other. For the Histoire de la Philosophie Cartésienne is much more than a mere exposition of abstract metaphysical principles; it is a complete picture of society, political, literary, and ecclesiastical. The entire university system was affected by Cartesianism; physicians regarded it as a frightful heresy, and the Sorbonne divines thought that, with the Discours de la Méthode, the abomination of desolation had been introduced into the world. Even ladies like Madame de Sévigné and her daughter, Madame de Grignan, discoursed about the tourbillons, and Molière ridiculed on the stage the blue-stockings whose time was taken up by speculations regarding the formation of the universe and the souls of dumb animals. We thus see the peculiar interest which belongs to M. Bouillier's volumes. They address themselves not merely to philosophers, but to all readers who would know with anything like accuracy the history of the seventeenth century.

The monthly comptes-rendus of the Académie des Sciences morales et politiques † claim, by their variety and their erudition, a high place amongst the periodical transactions of learned societies. A publication containing biographical sketches by M. Mignet, essays from the pen of M. Jules Simon, M. Franck, or M. de Parieu, deserves to be generally known and attentively read. The Académie deals with subjects so various that its bulletins are certainly not liable to the charge of tediousness or monotony. Thus in the number for December last we have the seventh part of a disquisition on the principles of political science, an excellent article by M. Edmond de Pressens on Gnosticism, and a review of books by M. Jules Simon. The able historian of Spain, M. R. Saint-Hilaire, relates the episode of the last days of Philip II.; and M. Eugène de Rozière, in a learned paper, endeavours to determine the date of that famous text-book of the Roman chancery, the Liber diurnus.

M. Georges Pennetier comes forward in the field of science under the protection of Dr. Pouchet ‡, and opens a brisk campaign against the adversaries of heterogeny. His little volume is not addressed to savants; it is an attempt to popularize a theory which has, he says, been hitherto very little understood by the generality of readers. After defining spontaneous generation, he proceeds to argue that the philosophers who take the opposite view cannot account for the creation of the microscopic animalcules which are formed from organic matter in a state of putrefaction; heterogeny, he further asserts, is the only theory capable of explaining how life appeared originally on the face of the earth. M. Pennetier's book, otherwise written in a simple and interesting manner, is unfortunately too much of a polemical production, and the discussion often assumes a tone of bitterness which ought not to disfigure works professedly designed to further the cause of truth.

The Causeries scientifiques of M. Henri de Parville § are perhaps not quite so complete as M. Figuier's Année scientifique, nor are they by any means so methodically arranged; but they have the advantage of being illustrated with very good woodcuts, and we must acknowledge that in many cases no amount of description can compensate for the absence of correct drawings. Thus M. Foucault's pendulum, and Dr. Fromentel's new ventilator, and M. Leauté's oxygen lamp become much more intelligible, especially for the non-scientific reader, when the description given in the letter-press is completed by a sketch showing the mechanism which works the apparatus.

M. Charles Baudelaire may be studied as a poet and as a critic.‖ His works—now collected for the first time, and printed uniformly—will show, we think, that whatever may be his qualifications for discussing the merits of this or that picture, or his acquaintance with the various schools of painting, he knows very little of the fundamental principles of æsthetics. His great merit consists in plain-speaking, and in the most complete absence of what French people call parti pris. With respect to his poetry, it may almost suffice to say that, when first published, the whole edition was seized by the police. The present reprint, though still sufficiently repulsive, is shorn of its chief horrors.

We are thus led to say a few words of two or three of the most recent novels, where horrors, as usual, are thickly strewn. If *Un Naufrage Parisien is meant to scare people away from vice, we must give the authoress credit for her good intentions, but we cannot reconcile ourselves to the thought that it is a lady who has written so repulsive a story. Jean de Chazol †, though decidedly sensational, has at least nothing immoral about it; and in M. de Bentzon's Roman d'un Muet ‡ the interest of the tale rests upon the infirmity of the leading character. Here the feeling produced is far from pleasant. Novelists, we think, would do well to beware of dealing with exceptional facts in human nature; and although Xavier de Maistre's admirable Lépreux de la cité d'Aoste may be quoted against us, yet it would be impossible to maintain that such pictures are representations of real life.

THE HOUSE OF LORDS.

LORD SALISBURY continues his courageous and benevolent efforts to provide the Peers with occupation. Nor has he laboured in vain. The result of his exertions thus far is that six industrious gentlemen of the House of Commons are to meet a deputation from them, and see whether the poor peers cannot have a job or two found for them in the early part of the Session. Even the occupation, devised for labourers in some parts of Ireland during the famine, of having to make a hole and fill it up again for sixpence a day, would please the Lords. Left to themselves, they cannot get anything to do more interesting than to discuss Lord SHAFTESBURY's ecclesiastical Bills; and it is better to smoke a pipe under a haystack than do that. But better times are coming for them, and a joint Committee of both Houses will proceed to consider their hard case with a sincere desire to do something for them. The particular scheme which Lord SALISBURY devised in order to get a hearing, was a Bill for allowing Bills not passed in one Session to stand over till the next Session in the stage they had reached when the Session in which they were introduced came to an end. There was undoubtedly something plausible and taking in the proposal. It is impossible, however, to suppose that the House of Commons would agree to such a measure. It would entirely alter the relations of the two Houses to each other, and it would paralyse the Executive whenever the Cabinet did not belong to the Conservative party. There must be a supreme power somewhere, however its existence may be veiled, and however gently its action may make itself felt. At present the supreme power in the Constitution lies in the House of Commons, because it virtually determines the choice of the Executive Government. The Government so chosen by the Commons can in the last resort give effect to the wishes of the Commons, in spite of the opposition of the Lords, because it can raise the famous question, How the QUEEN's Government is to be carried on. If, for example, the Irish Church Bill, after being carried by a decisive majority in the Commons in pursuance of the wishes of the nation recorded at a general election, were thrown out in the Lords on the second reading, the present Government would either resign, or, if in face of the large majority they possess in the Commons they continued in office, they would only do so on the understanding that the resistance of the Lords should in the last extremity be overcome by a wholesale creation of peers. It will not come to this, simply because the Lords know that, if they resisted, it must come to this. In the case of the Reform Bill of 1832 it did come to this; and the Lords, having had their lesson, did not need that it should be repeated to them when, although Protectionists almost to a man, they were forced to adopt Free Trade. But if they could read a second time a Bill which they very much disliked, and then shelve it to another Session, the Government of the day would be paralysed. As it is, the Lords can often spoil a Bill they dislike by making a series of judicious amendments to it, some of which they trust the Commons will adopt rather than lose the Bill. This leads to a sort of game at brag between the two Houses; the Lords trying to throw the odium of the failure of the Bill on to the Commons, and the Commons trying to throw it on to the Lords. The game generally ends in what is called a compromise, which really means that the Bill is shorn of some of its strength, and passes as an imperfect and mutilated measure. But if the Lords could spend time in discussing amendments, and then defer the final settlement of the Bill till another Session, they could defeat and discredit the Government without giving it such a handle of complaint as would warrant it in forcing the Lords by threatening to use the extreme remedy provided by the Constitution. A thousand ingenious reasons might be found for letting the Irish Church Bill stand over till next year. It might be urged that the wishes of the Irish Church itself should be consulted; and, if we are to judge by the pace at which the Irish Church has hitherto moved in its deliberations, it would take much longer than from now to next July for it to have any wishes at all.

A member of the House of Commons, hitherto unknown to fame, has also contributed his mite this week to a reform of the House of Lords, and has suggested the introduction of a scheme of minority voting in the election of Scotch and Irish peers which would prevent the representative peers belonging, as they now do, almost exclusively to one political party. Mr. GLADSTONE, who seems to have learnt something from past experience, and to have awakened to the sense of the expediency of being civil to his supporters, complimented his new friend on having made a most valuable suggestion, and in fact laid on the butter a little too thick, perhaps, for good taste. But he pointed out that the Lords should be left, in the first instance, to reform themselves. It is certainly an abuse that all the Scotch and Irish peers should be Conservatives, and this bad result of the present system of election shows probably an inherent imperfection in the schemes for making the House of Lords representative. But practically none of the defects under which the House of Lords now labours really flow from the faulty election of Scotch and Irish peers. If there were a dozen more Liberal peers sent from Ireland and Scotland, the Lords would be still just where they are now. They would still have nothing to do for the greater part of the Session, and they would still be a Second Chamber forced to obey the First Chamber in matters of primary importance, and able to thwart it in matters of secondary importance. The Duke of MANCHESTER, again, expressed, at the Colonial banquet, his views as to the House to which he belongs. There is nothing like taking the bull by the horns, and the Duke's opinion was, that the House of Lords needed nothing whatever to make it absolutely perfect, except that it should include one or two persons of colonial repute. This is only an exaggerated and narrow way of putting the case on which the expediency of creating life-peers is rested. Persons of great public eminence, who have served their country or added to its fame in some conspicuous manner, should, it is said, have a place somewhere in the great council of the nation; and as the House of Commons is neither accessible nor suited to them, it follows that they ought to have seats in the House of Peers. But this, whether true or not, regards the House of Lords in its social, not in its legislative, capacity. It is quite true that for such men as Lord NAPIER of Magdala and Sir JOHN LAWRENCE there is, as things now are, no appropriate honour. Lord NAPIER accepted a peerage contrary to his private wishes, in order that he might establish a precedent putting Engineer officers, and what is more, Indian Engineer officers, on a par with the portion of the army hitherto more favoured. Sir JOHN LAWRENCE really deserves a peerage if he chooses to take it, and it is to be regretted that he cannot have so convenient an honour offered him as a life-peerage would give. But this is nothing more than a social arrangement, very much like devising the Order of St. Michael and St. George for the colonies. It would not reform the House of Lords, nor confer on it any appreciable benefit, except that of adding some additional lustre to its name. And as the creation of life-peerages is a mere social arrangement, the social argument that it would tend to create a higher and lower aristocracy is not without great weight. Distinguished life-peers might, indeed, on rare occasions give some increase of weight to the debates of the Lords. About once in three years, for example, the Lords delay dinner until they have had a little chat about India, and on such occasions Sir JOHN LAWRENCE would speak with force and be listened to with respect. But, in the first place, this would rarely happen, and in the next place, it is not strength in debate that the Lords want. They are rich in oratorical power, in acquaintance with affairs, and in varied experience. What they complain of is that, with all their aptitude for work, they have nothing to do; and the creation of life-peerages not only would not give them occupation, but would tend to perpetuate and strengthen the notion that their main function is to be as ornamental and as idle as possible.

It is not often that the word of wisdom flows from the mouth of Lord RUSSELL; but on this occasion we own that the remarks made by Lord RUSSELL on the business of the House of Lords seemed to us among the most pertinent and the most suggestive that were offered. The drift of what he said was that work was to be provided for the Upper House, partly by examining what spheres of political activity belonged most properly to the Lords, and partly by rearranging the course of business in the Commons. The Lords may be regarded as an initiating and as a revising legislative body, and it must be considered what they can properly initiate, and how they can properly revise. Lord RUSSELL said that the initiating functions of the Lords lay properly in matters ecclesiastical, diplomatic, and legal. As to ecclesiastical questions, the attribution to the Lords of a constitutional aptitude for dealing with them probably suggested itself to Lord RUSSELL as a compliment to the Bishops. It must be supposed that the Bishops sit in the Lords for some special reason; and as no clergymen sit in the House of Commons, the Bishops seem to have something specially to do with ecclesiastical legislation. But this was clearly a mistake. The Bishops are not meant to legislate for the Church, but to defend it. They initiate nothing; they remain passive, and see as far as possible that things are not changed to their detriment. The repeal of the Test Act, Catholic Emancipation, the suppression of half the Irish Bishops, disendowment and disestablishment of the Irish Church, are the sort of ecclesiastical measures carried by modern English Parliaments; and the rustic who waited till Bishops initiated them would gaze a long while at the river of time. In diplomacy, Parliament does not so much legislate as express opinions for the guidance of the Secretary of State, and here it is quite true that the Lords can, and often do, take the initiative with much success; and a debate in the Lords on any international or diplomatic question generally commands great attention and respect. But one evening every other Session is about all that falls to the lot of the Lords as an opportunity of showing their excellence in this department of public affairs. Diplomatic discussions, to be valuable, must be very rare. There remains the law; and here it must be owned that there is, as matters now stand, a lamentable waste of very valuable legislative power. The experience and the knowledge and the leisure of the Law Lords are not nearly enough utilized for the reform of those portions of the law which every one knows ought to be reformed, but which it is no one's business to reform. The only way in which the confused mass of the English law can be brought into shape is by having its several portions settled and revised by some competent body, the decision of which shall not, except in extreme cases, be altered by the House of Commons; and it does not seem impossible to constitute such a body and to associate it in some special manner with the House of Lords. The main duty of the House of Lords must, however, necessarily be that of revising the legislation of the Commons, and the Lords are fully justified in asking that they should have every possible facility given them for discharging this duty properly. Lord RUSSELL suggests that the best mode of securing this would be to alter the time of year up to which the Estimates are framed, so that the discussion in the House of Commons of these Estimates should be thrown later than it is now, and be put after the mass of their legislative work for the Session was done. Then the Commons would be discharging the complex and lengthy financial duties which belong exclusively to them, while the Lords were revising the Bills sent up to them. This suggestion deserves consideration, as also does that of Lord GRANVILLE that many Bills might be permitted to begin in the Lords which must now begin in the Commons, because they have some faint and remote tinge of a money Bill about them. The extreme jealousy of the Lords with which the Commons used to be animated in all money matters may perhaps be mitigated now that the supremacy of the Commons has been established.

AMERICA.

GENERAL GRANT'S brief Inaugural Address will probably be expanded in his Message to Congress. His avowed purpose of checking administrative corruption, especially in the Revenue department, will be generally approved. The new House of Representatives has passed by a large majority the repeal of the Tenure of Office Bill; and probably the Senate may reconsider its late determination to maintain, against General GRANT and future Presidents, the law which originated in Mr. JOHNSON'S conflict with Congress. Since the Act has been in force Republican functionaries have been safe from dismissal, because the Senate assumed that Mr. JOHNSON could only be influenced by political motives if he attempted to remove an opponent from office. General GRANT'S acts would be more favourably construed, but it is not certain that he would think it worth while to exercise his discretion under the constant supervision of the Senate. The question, except as far as members of the Cabinet are concerned, would become comparatively unimportant if the Civil Service were placed on a permanent footing. General GRANT'S independent position may enable him to disregard the claims of party; but an ordinary President must reward his supporters by the distribution of patronage. The practice which was introduced by General JACKSON of giving, as he said, the spoils to the conquerors, is wholly incompatible with a regard to ability or to character. A postmaster or tax-collector who represents election influence and expenditure naturally considers that an office bestowed as a reward of partisanship involves a right rather than a public duty. The consequences of General JACKSON'S system were tolerable as long as the administrative functions of the Federal Government were confined within narrow limits. When the large taxation which had been rendered necessary by the war for the first time required the organization of a large revenue service, the tax-gatherers were appointed with customary disregard to their qualifications and to their honesty; and it is consequently asserted, with more or less exaggeration, that one-fourth of the indirect taxes are intercepted before they reach the Treasury. If General GRANT is willing to reform the existing abuses by the exercise of wholesome severity, the Senate would probably be well-advised in removing the obstacles to his efforts. When the delinquents and idlers in the public employment were once dismissed, there would be little difficulty in reconciling general opinion to the institution of a regular Civil Service. If the United States remain at peace, the need of a large revenue will gradually diminish with the charge for the interest of the debt. General GRANT'S denunciation of the policy of repudiation, and the last votes of the outgoing Congress, have already strengthened American credit, and consequently facilitated the contraction of loans on easier terms.

The Cabinet has been already reconstructed, and few of the members past or present are known out of their own country. General GRANT'S first Secretary of State apparently owed his appointment to the personal friendship of the PRESIDENT. Mr. WASHBURNE, when he was a member of the House of Representatives, voted with the extreme Republican party, of which Mr. THADDEUS STEVENS was the principal leader. Mr. HAMILTON FISH, who is new to diplomatic business, will probably be influenced by Mr. SUMNER, who, as Chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee of the Senate, may almost be regarded as a supplementary Foreign Minister. Mr. FISH has the disadvantage of succeeding a Minister of remarkable ability. In accordance with custom, Mr. SEWARD was consoled for his failure to attain the office of President by the highest office in the Cabinet, and for two or three years he really administered the Government in the name of the inexperienced President, who had only visited Washington as an obscure member of the House of Representatives. It was to Mr. SEWARD that his countrymen were indebted for the surrender of MASON and SLIDELL, against the opinion of the rest of the Cabinet and the leaning of Mr. LINCOLN. The tone of his innumerable despatches, although it was sometimes offensive to foreigners, perhaps tended, by satisfying American taste, to restrain popular pugnacity. Even when he gave reparation for the Trent outrage, he thought it necessary to maintain the rightfulness of a seizure which he was practically repudiating as indefensible. After the death of Mr. LINCOLN, the Secretary of State, though he co-operated loyally with Mr. JOHNSON, contrived to avoid incurring any considerable share of the odium which attached to his chief; and if he continues to take part in public life, he will be acknowledged as a Republican, notwithstanding his connexion with a Democratic President. During his eight years of administration he has achieved several diplomatic triumphs, although much of the merit belongs to the Federal armies and to their leaders. Mr. SEWARD composed the remonstrances which induced the French to evacuate Mexico; and at the close of his term of office he concluded the singularly advantageous Convention with England which the Senate has nevertheless hitherto declined to confirm. His purchases of Russian America and of the island of St. Thomas were on the whole popular, although the bargain with Denmark is not yet finally settled. Mr. HAMILTON FISH's judgment will perhaps be tested for the first time by his firmness in maintaining neutrality in the insurrection in Cuba. Blockade-runners from the Southern ports are already conveying supplies to the rebels, and the House of Representatives has unanimously voted for the recognition of any Government which they may succeed in establishing. It is not forgotten that the recognition of Texas as an independent Republic was the first step in the process of annexing the great Mexican province to the United States.

The appointment of the wealthiest trader in the United States to the office of Secretary of the Treasury caused some surprise, as Mr. A. H. STEWART has neither political nor administrative experience. The ability which has been illustrated by his commercial success would probably have justified the PRESIDENT's selection; and it was understood that Mr. STEWART was opposed both to repudiation and to the maintenance of the extravagant tariff. The refusal of the Senate to repeal the law which prohibits the Secretary of the Treasury from being actively engaged in trade has compelled Mr. STEWART to resign his office before he had entered on its duties. By introducing for the first time, in place of Mr. STEWART, a prominent politician into the Cabinet, General GRANT will have gratified the Republican party. Mr. BOUTWELL is one of the most active members of the House of Representatives, and although he has always acted with the extreme section, he has sometimes come into hostile collision with Mr. BUTLER. The remaining Ministers have found many eulogists since the first publication of the official list, and as it happens that it is uncertain whether the Attorney-General is a Massachusetts judge or an advocate of the same name and family, the PRESIDENT's uncompromising admirers gallantly assert that either of the two brothers would be thoroughly qualified for the office. The appointment to the War Department of General SCHOFIELD, who had held the office under Mr. JOHNSON since the retirement of Mr. STANTON, was only temporary; but the report that General GRANT had declared that the Secretary at War ought to be a civilian has been disproved by the selection of General RAWLINS. Two civilians, Mr. STANTON and Mr. LINCOLN, at the very crisis of the war, resolved to supersede General GRANT, then engaged in the siege of Vicksburg, in favour of the incapable amateur, General BANKS. General GRANT himself made no objection to discharge the duties of Secretary for War; and it was supposed that General SCHOFIELD possessed his confidence. His appointment of SHERMAN to the rank of General of the Army is one of many proofs that the PRESIDENT is superior to any mean jealousy of his chief military rival. The promotion of SHERIDAN to be Lieutenant-General will be generally popular, though the claims of General THOMAS were thought by some persons to be preferable.

The enigmatic passage of the Inaugural Address which relates to foreign policy is not encouraging to the hopes of believers in Mr. REVERDY JOHNSON. General GRANT qualifies the truism that nations ought to be bound by the same moral rules as private persons by a hint that violation of international duties will be repaid in kind. In other words, the escape of the Alabama from the Mersey is on fit occasion to be avenged by the wilful connivance of the American Government at unlawful expeditions directed against English commerce. If this country had the misfortune to be engaged in a war lasting four years, the departure of a single hostile cruiser from an American port through accident or negligence would not be regarded as a heinous wrong. If General GRANT and the great community which shares his opinions would consult any legal or moral authority, they would find that one breach of the law was not properly met by another. If A., by carelessly leaving a trap-door open, causes damage to B., the proper remedy is an application to some legal tribunal, and not the establishment of a similar nuisance on the premises of the injured B. As the American Government has wisely abstained from resorting to the arbitrament of war, the threat of reprisals at some indefinite period is equally ungenerous and unjust. On some future occasion the PRESIDENT will probably express his intentions more fully; but for the present his language countenances the reports of his unfriendly disposition. It is not to be regretted that the negotiations terminated before his acceptance of office, and that the English Government is no longer bound to press for a settlement of the dispute. When General GRANT, in his acceptance of the Chicago nomination, uttered his aspiration for peace, he perhaps referred exclusively to domestic dissensions; but it is evident that he has no immediate intention of engaging in foreign hostilities. It would be idle to talk of economy, and of the reduction or discharge of the debt, if a war were impending which would involve unlimited expenditure. The lapse of time may perhaps gradually moderate the prejudices and the angry feeling which now induce the American Government and people to keep a useless quarrel alive.

ELECTORAL PURITY.

WE know by this time as much as we are likely to know how far the new system of trying election petitions is calculated to ensure electoral purity. To put the result briefly, we know that it will scarcely do anything at all to ensure it. Where there is real, open, unquestionable bribery, those who have detected it are able to expose it more quickly and more cheaply before a judge than they could do before a Parliamentary Committee; and if there is a clear case, attested by unimpeachable witnesses, of one of those very few acts for which, apart from direct bribery, the judge will unseat a candidate, then the petition will succeed on easy and cheap terms. It comes to this—where any sensible and competent Committee of the House of Commons would unquestionably have unseated a member, the petitioner can obtain that decision more quickly and cheaply now, without the risk of having a foolish Committee appointed. But this is all. The appointment of the judges to conduct election trials will tend hereafter to discourage petitioners; for the judges go, as they consider they ought to go, not by any vague idea of the general merits of the case, but by rules which they have laid down to protect the sitting member unless an incontestable case is proved against him. The sitting member is treated as if he were in possession of a freehold, and as if the petition were an action of ejectment. At first the judges seemed inclined to take a different view of their duties. Reckless expenditure, for example, was held in itself to show a frame of mind in a candidate which tainted all his proceedings, and Mr. Baron MARTIN unseated Mr. RIPLEY at Bradford because, in that large town, he had spent 7,000*l.* But this mode of regarding expenditure has been entirely abandoned. At Youghal it was decided that a candidate may very properly go to a constituency which he has never heard of before in his life and run through 5,000*l.* in getting 126 votes, may spend enormous sums in purchases at shops and in giving away in charity, and may employ bands of watchers for months. At Wigan Mr. Baron MARTIN said that he was guided by the oath of the sitting member, and if the sitting member swore that he had meant to conduct the election properly, the judge would consider it was all right, unless the indisputably corrupt act of some one indisputably an agent for him was proved beyond all doubt. A member was not to be ejected out of his Parliamentary freehold for anything short of this. The decisions of the judges will have the effect of showing a candidate exactly how to get hold and keep hold of this freehold. Giving actual sums of money before an election is really almost the only thing he need avoid. He may spend his money as freely as he likes in almost any other way. He may treat as much as he likes, so long as he does not treat corruptly; that is, so long as no one can prove that any particular voter sold his vote for so much drink and victuals. He may cover all the walls of every shop with boards at a shilling a day apiece; he may have roughs and watchers in abundance, for, although the judges will reprove him for doing so, they will not unseat him for it. He may even perhaps hire cabs for his voters, which is distinctly illegal, because he may speculate that he will be let off for a first offence on this head, as Mr. Baron MARTIN let off the sitting members at Salford, merely cautioning them not to do it again. The judges treat such things as these as they would treat a man who was constantly firing off guns, or who set up nasty-smelling works on his land. These are disagreeable ways of behaving on a freehold, but the freeholder is not to be turned out for them. Committees and associations on behalf of the candidate may do pretty well what they like for him, and he will not be responsible unless they actually give larger sums away in cash than a charitable judge would consider to have been spent in charity. If a new election were held next week the expenditure would probably be much more profuse than it has ever been, and much safer, for those who conducted it would have the decisions of the judges to tell them exactly what to do; and if any petitions were presented they would probably be of a very speculative kind, and the DODSONS and FOGGS who got them up would be most happy to withdraw them on reasonable terms at the right moment. The clauses in the Act of last year intended to prevent the collusive withdrawal of petitions have utterly broken down, and a petition may still be looked on as a nuisance which the freeholder may be made to buy off if he is properly managed.

Evidently, if electoral purity is to be attained at all, or if any considerable approximation to it is to be realized, the end is not to be gained by setting the judges to administer the existing law. The law itself must be altered, and the subject is important enough to justify the Cabinet in moving the appointment of a Committee to inquire into the best mode of conducting Parliamentary and municipal elections. Mr. BRUCE, in moving last week for the appointment of this Committee, openly professed his conversion to the Ballot; and when a Cabinet Minister has got as far as this, and carries, as Mr. BRUCE evidently did, the majority of the House with him, the time when the Ballot will be introduced cannot be far off. What every one who cares for electoral purity desires is some means of lessening the two great evils of our present mode of conducting elections —profuse expenditure and intimidation. It is not bribery, in the sense in which bribery is generally understood, that is the evil to be combated. A place which, as Mr. Baron MARTIN said of Beverley, is a mere nest of corruption is tolerably certain to vanish out of the electoral area even under the law as it now stands, and even large towns like Norwich and Dublin will probably pay some penalty for their evil habits. It is the profuse emptying of money-bags throughout a constituency in expenditure which the judges have now instructed experts how to make legal that is, if possible, to be put down. No legislation can entirely put it down, but a very few changes in the law might immensely reduce it. The last Parliament did not in its secret heart dislike this expenditure, for it considered it a weapon in the hands of gentlemen against democracy, and so it would listen to few of the many propositions submitted to it for reducing the outlay of candidates. But a Parliament sincerely desirous to effect the purpose might deal a few blows against this expenditure which would strike home. Mr. BRUCE dwelt on a way of doing this by forbidding the employment of paid canvassers. These terrible nuisances pester, bully, demoralize, and bestialize voters for weeks together before an election, in order to run up a little bill against the candidate. It would be equally easy to make all payments for roughs, watchers, and messengers illegal, and to make illegal acts on the part of the candidates void the election, and not merely, as at Salford, furnish the ground for a little mild reproof from a benevolent judge. Mr. HARCOURT pointed to a still wider and more efficacious remedy when, in asking that the decisions of the judges might be communicated to the House, he suggested that all treating whatever should be pronounced illegal, and not merely treating carried on corruptly. If the candidate and his agents were not allowed to treat any one under any pretence, and if paid canvassers, watchers, roughs and messengers were also forbidden, the expenses of candidates would be most materially diminished. Further, if Mr. FAWCETT's proposal were adopted, and all the expenses of the returning officer were paid for by the borough, a candidate would have scarcely any legitimate expenses. There would, indeed, remain the expenses of solicitors, of advertising, of printing, and of postage; but even these would be very much diminished, in proportion as the electors were less and less addressed personally, and looked more and more to the general expressions of opinion, at meetings and on public occasions, on the part of the candidate, as the main guide to their choice; and whatever may be the evils of the Ballot, it cannot be denied that it tends materially to lessen the amount of private appeals to individuals.

Intimidation is of two kinds, and against neither kind does the existing law provide any effectual check. There is first the intimidation of open violence at the time of the elections, which is nothing less than a great national disgrace, and against which we are glad to see Mr. GATHORNE HARDY uttered an indignant protest. The whole notion that at election times the law should go utterly into abeyance, and that mobs may go about bullying, terrifying, wounding, plundering, and sacking houses, simply because a writ has come down to the place for the election of a member, is perfectly monstrous. The Ballot might do something to remedy the mischief, but it would not do nearly enough. To begin with, the process of elections might be much simplified. If nominations and declarations of the poll were done away with, the mob would have much less excuse for assembling. Then the guardians of order ought to be much more efficiently protected than they are. Assaults on the police when a mob is assembled are most serious offences against public order, and ought to be severely punished. As it is, the unfortunate police are not protected at all, and a lot of blackguards are allowed to hustle them and pelt them with stones, and get off scot-free, because the proceeding is considered one of the humours of election time. An adequate term of imprisonment with hard labour would soon change the sentiments of the vulgar on this head. Lastly, damages for all personal injuries and for all injuries to property at an election time ought to be recoverable by an easy process from the rates of the borough or county where the election is held, and then the ratepayers might think it worth their while to save their pockets, and aid the cause of order a little. Too ready a use of the military force ought of course to be avoided; but if soldiers are used at all, they ought to be much better protected than they are now. It is in the highest degree improper that soldiers should have to stand and be pelted with rubbish while they are forbidden to strike terror into their assailants by a use of their weapons. Intimidation of the quiet sort takes all kinds of forms, but they all come to this—that the voter is threatened with a pecuniary loss if he votes as he wishes to vote. It is in human nature to exercise freely this power of threatening in order to gain a political object, unless the law comes to the aid of the weak. Men of every class enjoy the pleasure of being able to make their neighbours own their supremacy. Landlords threaten farmers, gentlemen threaten tradesmen, manufacturers threaten weekly workers; and, as Mr. BRUCE informed the House, even working-men themselves threaten the petty shopkeepers who depend on their custom. The feeling of alarm at the extent to which this intimidation has now spread is so strong, that the Committee which is now to consider the mode of conducting elections can scarcely be said to set out with having the Ballot reserved as an open question. Its real function will be much more to consider what particular form of secret voting shall be adopted than to decide whether secret voting shall, in some shape or other, be used as a remedy against intimidation. No men have done so much to prepare public opinion for the Ballot as the election judges; for they have shown that the existing law is futile against intimidation, and no other remedy, good or bad, has been suggested but the Ballot. It is with great regret that we see this; for, if men could but have been gradually weaned from the evil habit of intimidation by a change in social opinion, this would have been far better than to try to outwit petty tyrants by such a device as the ballot-box. But it is impossible to allow the intimidation that marked the last election to continue, and, as some change must be made, the Ballot will have the advantage of being the only remedy visibly in the field. Fortunately, it is not a question of political parties, for mob violence and petty tyranny are of no use to any party, and it will certainly be the respectable, quiet, and honourable classes—the friends, in every rank and every party, of order, decency, and independence—who will profit most by elections being conducted so that the brutal license of election mobs shall be done away with, and so that each voter can vote without pressure and without fear as he pleases.

THE BRAZILIAN SLAVE TRADE ACT.

THE House of Lords would have done well to consent to the repeal of the Brazilian Slave Trade Act without debate. The interval of three-and-twenty years which has elapsed since the Bill was passed has witnessed an entire revolution in national policy. In 1846 the long peace had not yet been interrupted, nor had English opinion recognised the possibility of abandoning the position which had been acquired at the end of the long struggle with France. Lord CHELMSFORD's inaccurate recollection represents the rapid oblivion which follows close upon great changes of political theory. In perfect good faith, Sir ROBERT PEEL's former Solicitor-General thought it impossible that in 1846 and in 1849 he should have defended a measure which now seems to him and to many others entirely obsolete. All who have reached middle life must occasionally have felt similar surprise when they have happened to look at prints of the forgotten fashions of their youth. For a moment it seems impossible that stiff neckcloths and high collars should within a not very great number of years have been accepted as matters of course. A high-handed mode of dealing with foreign Powers is not less abhorrent to modern modes of thought; and it is fortunate that Lord RUSSELL and Lord GREY retain, with more tenacity than Lord CHELMSFORD, the principles which prevailed in Parliament and in the country down to the eve of the Russian war. The ABERDEEN Act was one of the latest legislative assertions of a policy which had been for thirty or forty years strenuously pursued by the English Government. The slave trade was only abolished in 1807, after a long and obstinate contest; but as soon as the question was finally settled, all classes and all parties unanimously desired to procure the adhesion of foreign States to the same prohibition. The Ministers of that time were not ordinarily distinguished by any enthusiastic attachment to philanthropic novelties; yet, in the negotiation which ensued on the fall of NAPOLEON, Lord LIVERPOOL and Lord CASTLEREAGH exerted themselves as earnestly to obtain the suppression of the slave trade as to establish the balance of power in Europe. Their anxiety, like the agitation at home by which it was stimulated, in some instances defeated itself; for, as the sentiment of aversion to the slave trade was then confined to England and the United States, colonists and slave-dealers easily persuaded their countrymen that English benevolence was prompted exclusively by commercial interest. The efforts of diplomacy nevertheless produced considerable results in the conclusion of treaties with nearly all foreign States. In return for large concessions Spain and Portugal agreed to make the slave trade piracy, and to allow on terms of nominal reciprocity the right of search by English cruisers.

Brazil, on its subsequent separation from Portugal, inherited the liabilities which it had shared with the Mother-country, and the acceptance of a Convention similar to the Portuguese treaty was a condition of the acknowledgment by England of the new Empire. The obligations incurred by the Government of Portugal had never been supported by any moral scruple on the part of the people; and the Brazilians, as habitual purchasers of slaves on a large scale, were still less inclined to discourage the obnoxious traffic. The contest of activity and skill between the English squadron on the coast of Africa and the Portuguese and Brazilian traders continued for twenty years, till the special arrangements of the Convention expired. The Government of Brazil displayed no intention of renewing the treaty, and there was reason to believe that the slave trade might assume gigantic proportions. If the trade with Brazil had been left open, it would have been scarcely possible to maintain a general policy which was regarded with jealous dislike by almost every maritime Power. Not long before Mr. CALHOUN had proposed to the French Government an offensive and defensive alliance with the United States against England, on the express ground of the hostility of that perfidious State to the sacred institution of slavery. At that time there was as yet no Alabama, or recognition of belligerency, to serve as a pretext for American hostility; but the operations of the African squadron formed a sufficient excuse; and when at a later period the English vessels began to watch the coast of Cuba, Mr. SUMNER and the other Republican leaders were the loudest in their denunciations of English intrusion into American waters.

Although the Brazilian Government was no longer bound by a Convention to permit supervision by English cruisers, the general undertaking to suppress the slave trade, which still remained in force, was openly and systematically violated. The English Government accordingly determined to persist in visiting Brazilian vessels, and, finding that the right or power of search was practically inefficient, Sir ROBERT PEEL and Lord ABERDEEN, with the advice of Sir WILLIAM FOLLETT and Sir FREDERICK THESIGER, introduced the Bill for carrying into effect the Convention between the QUEEN and the Emperor of BRAZIL. When it was proposed by the authority of Parliament to follow slave-ships from the high seas into waters within the jurisdiction of Brazil, the plan could scarcely be reconciled with respect for the rights of an independent Power, but the Government and the Crown lawyers seem to have determined on meeting by a system of reprisals the open refusal of Brazil to fulfil its obligations. As it happened, there was no risk of serious Parliamentary opposition, for all statesmen of the older generation shared the national sentiment, and Lord PALMERSTON, who usually opposed Lord ABERDEEN's foreign policy, consistently exhibited a passionate antipathy to the slave trade.

It was easy for Lord CHELMSFORD and Lord CAIRNS to prove that such legislation would not be attempted by any Government at the present day; nor can it be denied that occasional bickerings with the Brazilian Government have been caused by natural resentment at the use which has been made of superior force. English sailors on shore have sometimes failed to receive due protection from the police; and now and then an officer in uniform has been affronted or arrested, with the result of much angry correspondence. On the other hand, the entire suppression of the Brazilian slave trade furnishes some compensation for the injured dignity of half a dozen midshipmen. Lord ABERDEEN's Act is open to much theoretical criticism, but, unlike many more plausible specimens of legislation, it effected the object for which it was designed. The doctrine of non-intervention is perhaps just, as it is undoubtedly convenient; but a man who is habitually indifferent to the concerns of his neighbours is not likely on any occasion to render them useful service. Notwithstanding the modern dread of intrusion, Parliament will not be disposed to share Lord CAIRNS's disapproval of the recital in the preamble of Lord CLARENDON's Bill. It is as well that, even when opinions have been modified, a formal consistency should be observed in legislation, and that the Act should be ostensibly repealed, not in consequence of the adoption of a passive policy, but because "the circumstances which led to "the passing of the said Act no longer exist by reason of the "cessation of the importation of slaves into Brazil from "Africa." Lord CLARENDON has never been accused of pugnacity or arrogance, but he belongs to the school of Lord PALMERSTON. If his successors commence the practice of introducing humble apologies into Acts of Parliament and diplomatic documents, they may possibly find that national pride is not an exclusively aristocratic prejudice. The cessation of the Brazilian slave trade is exclusively due to the operation of the measure which shocks the feelings of Lord CHELMSFORD and Lord CAIRNS; and it is not improbable that the prospect of the abolition of slavery in Brazil might be partly attributed to the same cause. In tropical or semi-tropical countries it is cheaper to import slaves than to breed them, because the traders supply the planters with a large proportion of able-bodied men, encumbered with comparatively few women and children. The Dutch farmers, indeed, of the Free Republic in South Africa kill the men in their incursions into the interior, for the purpose of enslaving their families; but they require domestic servants and agricultural drudges rather than gangs of field hands, and they know that a captive Kaffir warrior is not a manageable slave. Both in Cuba and in Brazil the stoppage of importation renders slavery less profitable; and other reasons perhaps incline the Brazilian Government and a portion of the community to favour ultimate emancipation.

The reduction and future withdrawal of the African squadron, while it relieves the navy from a painful and dangerous service, will complete the policy which is involved in the repeal of the ABERDEEN Act. The crusade against the slave trade has in the course of fifty or sixty years cost hundreds of valuable lives, and it has occasionally led to diplomatic embarrassments, but the sacrifices incurred will not be regarded in history as excessive or inglorious. The undeviating neutrality which implies frequent acquiescence in evil, although it may on the whole be dictated by prudence, is not an active virtue. A paradoxical reasoner might contend that the advantages of the slave trade have overbalanced its injurious results by transplanting a large number of Africans to lands in which they or their descendants have acquired the rudiments of civilization; but popular sentiment repudiates far-fetched speculations, and it was notorious that the slavedealers who conducted the traffic were among the worst specimens of the human race. The misery of the barbarians who occupy the continent of Africa has been perceptibly increased by the market for labourers which superseded the demand for the produce of labour. In England, if not in other European countries, the agitation which began nearly a century ago has left a permanent impression which is beyond the reach of argument or sophistry. Lord CLARENDON's Bill marks the virtual termination of the transmarine slave trade, and the commerce is now almost wholly confined to the Dutch and Portuguese settlements in South Africa and to the Valley of the Nile. As Cuba and Brazil proceed to reform their institutions and their practice, benevolent indignation will probably be concentrated on the atrocities of the Arab and Egyptian slave-dealers. Before the present generation has passed away one prominent form of iniquity will perhaps have disappeared from the earth.

MR. LOCKE KING'S BILL.

THE proposed abolition of the Irish Establishment, among its other recommendations to the favourable consideration of Parliament, furnishes an excellent excuse for postponing many troublesome questions. The alteration of the law of succession to landed estate in cases of intestacy is added to the long list of measures which the Government is to adopt or consider as soon as it has disposed of the Irish Church. Mr. GLADSTONE, with prudent reserve, only expresses the opinion that the present law is not insusceptible of improvement; but it is easy to foresee that he will at least approve of the modest instalment of change which has so often been urged on the House of Commons by Mr. LOCKE KING. It would indeed be possible to take an intermediate step by giving younger children a pecuniary charge on land which had devolved by descent on the heir-at-law, and the plan would have the merit of corresponding to the arrangement which a prudent freeholder would probably make by will. The settlements and wills of large landowners almost always provide for younger children by charges on the estate, while the middle class of proprietors seldom make an eldest son, and still more rarely die intestate. The only persons who can afford to own land in England are landlords of the rank of country gentlemen, yeomen farming their own estates, and monied men, connected for the most part with trades or professions, who have other sources of income. The freehold occupier himself makes a great pecuniary sacrifice to independence and to sentiment; and the merchant or lawyer who possesses land worth a few hundreds a year deliberately indulges himself in an expensive luxury. While Mr. LOCKE KING's undeviating consistency through a long course of years probably represents his personal belief that the law of succession to land produces great and practical evils, his opponents and his supporters, with few exceptions, regard his annual motion as an occasion for discussing a far wider issue. The more judicious representatives of the landed interest would willingly compound for the suppression of male heirs-at-law if it were not for the instinctive feeling that an ancient custom is more defensible than a modern enactment. For their own purposes, the landlords would probably exercise a sound discretion in accepting the proposal; but they are fully justified in their belief that concession would not end the controversy. A few years would prove the futility of Mr. BRIGHT's belief in the tendency of the law to regulate the practice of testators. The English aristocracy is not likely to add social and economical suicide to political abdication. When it was found that intestacy affected only an insignificant fragment of the land, a law of equal partition in case of intestacy would be quoted as a legislative admission that the principle of division ought to be more generally applied. If the theory were adopted by Parliament, it would soon appear that the liberty now possessed by testators must be abolished or largely restricted. As long as land produces an income of about three per cent., no permissive measure will check the process of accumulation.

In the debate of Monday last Mr. HENLEY and Sir LAWRENCE PALK expressed a well-founded opinion that Mr. LOCKE KING's plan, if it had any considerable effect, would accelerate the extinction of small freeholds. The practical unit of landed property is the smallest extent which, according to the custom of each separate district, is usually occupied by a single holder. The nature of the buildings, the rotation of crops, and the size of the fields are regulated by experience and tradition; and the division of the farm into three or four equal portions would involve the introduction of a new and less profitable mode of cultivation. On a hundred acres of land subdivided by legal compulsion it would become necessary to build additional houses, barns, and sheds, and in some instances manual labour would be unavoidably substituted for the use of horses. It is not impossible that such a revolution may at some future time extend over the whole surface of the country; but it would be difficult to introduce the change in a few scattered spots and patches. In the great majority of cases a sale would be preferred to a partition, and, as at present, the wealthy neighbour would be the probable purchaser. If eldest sons were abolished by law, there would no longer be any motive for adding adjacent farms to estates which would be doomed to subdivision. In a few generations the landed nobility and gentry would disappear, and large farms would follow the fortunes of large estates. An active and increasing party has persuaded itself that a community of small proprietors is the soundest and happiest form of society. The doctrine may be supported by plausible arguments, but it has nothing to do with a voluntary disposition of property. It is not too much to say that the country must choose between the English and French modes of distribution, and that the national system of agriculture must stand or fall with the present tenure of land. The state of law which is proposed by Mr. LOCKE KING is inoperative in the United States, because, in default of tenant farmers, no testator could dream of founding a family on a large landed estate. Economical reasons would similarly supersede the working of the law in England, with the opposite effect of promoting accumulation.

Mr. WALTER suggested one of the strongest arguments against the present law by quoting some of the extravagant misrepresentations for which it serves as a pretext. It may be easily believed that many foreigners imagine, with Mr. WALTER's simple-minded American, that the rule of primogeniture is compulsory and universal. The eldest son claiming under a marriage settlement may, in the great majority of cases, become absolute owner of the estate, if he declines to concur with the life-tenant in a fresh arrangement, and abstains from resettling the property on his marriage. Great estates would be more frequently broken up but that prudent heirs are careful not to dissipate their property, while spendthrifts have for the most part occasion to make terms with their fathers. The monopoly which creates jealous irritation at home and delusion abroad belongs in truth, not to pedigree, but to money. Land, being at the same time the pleasantest of possessions and the least profitable of investments, passes into the hands of rich men, or remains there, for the same reasons which enable the same class to ride the finest horses, to buy the best pictures, and to live in the largest houses. Many instances might be mentioned of large landed estates which have been collected within the present generation; and indeed a column of auctioneers' advertisements sufficiently proves that a capitalist may at any time assume the position of a country gentleman. Manufacturers and merchants are every day supplanting indigenous squires, with ampler means of extending their boundaries by successive purchases. It is idle to talk of the law of primogeniture as affecting the transmission of their property to their descendants. Unless the estate is exceptionally large, its value would almost always be diminished by subdivision, while the object which induced the purchaser to diminish his own income would be frustrated by an equal partition of his property amongst several children. It is only on the first, or at most on the second, descent that the cadets of a family, new or old, have the shadow of a grievance to allege. The grandchildren or great-grandchildren of the founder or testator would probably have been poorer under a law which practically prevented the foundation of large estates.

The removal of misconception would be the most valuable result of the legislation which, pending his further political education, Mr. GLADSTONE seems disposed to favour. It might be worth while to make the experiment of a change, although it would produce only a trifling effect, for laws ought in modern times to be intelligible and logically tenable, as well as practically just. The ancient belief in institutions as necessary and inscrutable mysteries has become nearly extinct, and if a law which does little harm or good is found to be unpopular, it may be prudent to remove the cause of offence. The more serious contest which lies behind Mr. LOCKE KING's project will not be indefinitely deferred either by the maintenance or by the abolition of theoretical primogeniture. The victory will depend in some degree on the arguments employed on either side, but it will be mainly decided by the comparative force of the combatants. The array of landowners and farmers will not be materially strengthened or weakened by the law of succession which may be in force at the beginning of the struggle; but if Mr. LOCKE KING's plan were embodied in the Statute-book the champions of the existing system would have to deal with one prejudice less. A democratic triumph would not be confined to a compulsory partition of land, for the progress of subdivision might be accelerated by taxation devised for the purpose of rendering ownership unprofitable except to occupiers. All owners of property will combine to resist legislation which would tend directly to restrict freedom of enjoyment and disposal; but political power will be found to have been already dissociated from land and from money as soon as an agitation arises which really interests the multitude. The more zealous advocates of peasant proprietorship fully understand that their object can only be attained by the adoption of the compulsory partition which prevails in many other countries.

FRANCE AND BELGIUM.

WHEN the French semi-official press began a crusade against Belgium, just a month ago, it was easy to explain away the unpleasant significance of the act. The journals in question had been over-zealous, and, in their desire to interpret the EMPEROR's mind to the public, they had not waited to understand it for themselves. It was pointed out that the most careful supervision cannot always prevent an inspired newspaper from making this particular blunder. Unless the authorities write it all themselves they must leave the editor and his staff some small latitude in the selection and treatment of topics, and an ardent journalist will naturally be eager to offer the graceful tribute of his unprompted homage in the shape of an article which he thinks will please his master, though it has not been expressly ordered. True devotion loves to anticipate the wishes of its object, and as long as piety and intelligence are not inseparable, it will occasionally go astray in doing so. The theory was certainly ingenious, while it had just that alloy of truth which made it equally impossible to accept or to disprove it. And as the excitement did, as a matter of fact, die out as suddenly as it had begun, those who believed that the relation between the French Government and the semi-official press is rather too intimate to admit of the latter devising a foreign policy for itself, had nothing left but to submit without being by any means convinced. Time, however, has brought them their revenge. Let it be granted that by a common hallucination all the semi-official organs fell into the same error, that it was found impossible for more than a week to let them know that they had made a false start, and that upon this intimation being at length conveyed to them they came back crestfallen to the post. Does this complicated hypothesis account for the manœuvre being repeated a fortnight later? We will allow that such a mistake might have happened once, but it is subjecting our credulity to an unfair strain to ask us to believe that it can happen twice. If the explanation given by some English papers of the original denunciation of Belgium had been the true one, the journals to which it related would surely have shunned for the future all reference to so unlucky an escapade. Instead of this, the subject has suddenly been resumed with no less fervour than at first. We presume it will not be seriously maintained that this time the French Government knows nothing about it.

The precise language of the semi-official journals on the "Belgian difficulty" matters but little. The particular forms of abuse employed by the several organs may only represent the individual taste of their conductors. It is not necessary to suppose that the Patrie took the opinion of a Minister before attributing the attitude of the Brussels Cabinet to Prussian instigation; or that the Peuple has hit the precise point which most occupies the EMPEROR's mind when it sheds tears of sympathising anguish over the sufferings of the Belgian democracy. Some allowance must be made for the exigencies of composition, and when several writers have to say the same thing every day they may fairly claim to choose their own way of saying it. What does matter is that there should be a Belgian difficulty at all. The opposition of the Legislature to the fusion of the Great Luxemburg and the Eastern of France Railways was a purely domestic incident, and when a great Power goes out of its way to convert it into an occasion for diplomacy, it is the fact itself, not the manner in which it is done, that is calculated to excite suspicion. We are now told that the questions at issue between the two Governments have been referred to a Commission, and a confident hope is expressed that the pending dispute will be amicably arranged. Whether this hope turns out well founded or not, the really ominous symptom will remain intact. A Government which is ready to take offence at the municipal legislation of a weaker neighbour need do nothing more to give ground for reasonable alarm. Such a policy cannot possibly bode any good. Its authors may not intend to follow it up seriously, but so far as they do intend to follow it up—and without some thought of the kind it would hardly have been launched into the world—their designs are altogether mischievous. The action of the Belgian Legislature justified neither remonstrance nor inquiry. It was a step which, as an independent State, Belgium had a perfect right to take, if indeed she were not, as a neutral State, bound, under the circumstances, to have recourse to it. The alleged wound to French susceptibility had no existence except in the patriotic imaginations of two or three inflamed—and inspired—editors. From first to last the whole discussion has been palpably got up for a purpose; and we repeat that, although that purpose may, and probably will, be abandoned, it is evil so far as it exists.

At first sight there may seem to be little or no connexion between the uneasiness thus wantonly created by the French Government and the larger question of peace or war in Europe. The very anxiety evinced by the official papers to attribute the vote of the Belgian Chambers to the dictation of Prussia makes it unlikely that NAPOLEON III. can have any hope of rectifying his frontier at the expense of a weaker neighbour without Count BISMARK having a word to say upon the process. If, on the other hand, the EMPEROR merely keeps this particular quarrel open as an item in his plans against Prussia, why should he excite the hostility of the other Powers by an unprovoked aggression upon Belgium? Of all possible ways of opening the campaign against Germany, the occupation of Brussels has apparently the least to recommend it. And yet it is not, after all, very difficult to devise an explanation of this seemingly unintelligible conduct. The key to the EMPEROR's recent policy is to be looked for in the fact that he regards war as at best an unavoidable evil. Every year he lives he has more to lose and less to gain by it. This fact affords no guarantee that he will not fight, but it does increase the probability that before he does so he will try every means that suggests itself of securing the advantages of war without incurring its dangers. The point about the recent changes in Germany which most troubles the minds of his subjects is not that Prussia has become stronger, but that France has remained stationary. It is the relative, not the absolute, greatness of their country that Frenchmen are so anxious to preserve. They could better have borne a loss if it had been shared by a neighbour, than to see Prussia strengthened without any proportionate benefit accruing to France. The EMPEROR's policy towards Belgium may perhaps have been suggested by his knowledge of this characteristic sentiment. If a considerable addition to French territory could be obtained without a conflict, it would do more than anything to lift the cloud which has lately hung over his management of foreign affairs. It might restore public confidence in the Administration, and give the popular imagination something else to occupy it than the issue of the coming elections, or the probability of M. ROUHER's resignation. Frenchmen would feel that the favours of fortune were not all reserved for their rival—indeed, they might even please themselves with the reflection that, in fighting for the aggrandizement of Prussia, Count BISMARK had been unconsciously paving the way for a corresponding aggrandizement of France. By what possible means can this happy stroke of policy be achieved? We can imagine how anxiously the EMPEROR would put this question to himself, and we can at the same time catch a glimpse of one or two considerations which might render him not wholly hopeless of success. He might perhaps reason somewhat in this fashion:—The constant expectation of war is becoming wearisome to the whole of Europe, and if France were once to make her pacific intentions unmistakeably evident, the sense of relief would be universal. If the neutral Powers can be induced to see that this consummation is only to be brought about by France receiving territorial compensation for the disadvantages she has sustained by the events of 1866, they may think the peace of Europe not too dearly purchased by the sacrifice of a petty State. Prussia, to be sure, would bluster a little, but, in spite of Count BISMARK's boasts, it is by no means certain that he is really anxious to go to war, and even if he is, the annexation of Belgium might enable France to withdraw her opposition to the extension of Prussian rule beyond the Maine. There would still be England to reckon with; but England has not of late years counted for much in Continental politics, and may probably be left out of the calculation. Some undefined notions of this sort may conceivably be floating in the EMPEROR's brain, and their presence there would entirely account for his obvious desire to nurse the flickering flame of an imaginary grievance against Belgium. The danger of such a state of mind is that, the more the design is brooded on, the more feasible it is likely to appear. The real obstacles to its accomplishment may only become apparent when a creditable retreat has become impossible.

THE NAVY ESTIMATES.

MR. CHILDERS had his orders to knock off 1,000,000*l.* from the Navy Estimates, and it is most creditable to him that he has done it with as little detriment as may be to the public service. Some considerable portion of the money is really saved by retrenching expenditure which was of comparatively little use. Another large portion of the economy merely represents outlay postponed to future years, when the hot fit may have succeeded the cold fit in the matter of warlike preparations. The three great heads under which Mr. CHILDERS classifies his projected changes are—first, administration; secondly, personnel; and thirdly, material. In each of these departments some saving is promised; and in each, when the propriety of reduction is once admitted, Mr. CHILDERS has shown judgment in the choice of the items which he has attacked. We cannot, however, entirely concur in the course proposed in any of these three departments.

Perhaps the most important field for a naval reformer is that of administration, and here we find that Mr. CHILDERS, though undoubtedly moving in the right direction, treads with feeble steps. He does not deny the inefficiency of the old Board, but instead of remodelling the machine on a sound and workmanlike footing, he is content to patch it up with an alteration here and a modification there, so as to get it to work a little longer with perhaps a shade less of friction and waste than we have been accustomed to witness. The old Board system was—so Mr. CHILDERS tells us—to place the administration "practically in the hands of four distinguished "naval officers, assisted by a Minister, those naval officers "dividing the business between them"; and we may add, what Mr. CHILDERS forgot to mention, that these departmental chiefs of administration were political sailors going out with the Ministry of the day. Mr. CHILDERS tells us also that no one knew in whom the financial control vested; and he might have added that, for purposes of patronage, the Board was superseded by the direct action of the First Lord. Nothing could be much worse than such an organization, the primary essentials of good administration being, first, that the heads of departments should be permanent officers selected for their special capacity, and not as a reward either for political or naval services; secondly, that there should be distinct financial control; and lastly, that the Minister should be, not an "assistant" of his subordinates, but their absolute master.

All this is in effect admitted by Mr. CHILDERS, for, though he says that the Board was incompetent only in matters connected with the dockyards, he forgets that he is himself condemning and reversing the policy of the Board and the Sea Lords in maintaining excessive squadrons in every ocean; and that, as to patronage, the Board could not well go wrong, inasmuch as no patronage was left at its disposal. The work that really remained to the Board was mainly the dockyard work, and in that it is conceded that its action was eminently unsatisfactory. The logical conclusion would have been to sweep away the Board altogether, converting the Sea Lord into a sort of permanent High Admiral, strictly subordinate to the Minister—as the Commander-in-Chief of the army ought to be, and is curiously enough sometimes said to be to the Minister for War—and replacing the other Lords by permanent well-chosen administrators of the dockyard machinery. The present First Lord stops short of this reform, and for reasons of a very singular kind. He says that a Commission in the year 1860 reported dead against the Board in all matters relating to the dockyard. Next he tells us that a Committee appointed in 1861 was allowed to drop without reporting, and after hearing the evidence only on one side; and that the official evidence was in the main favourable to the official system, as might reasonably have been expected. Then Mr. CHILDERS has the courage to refer to Mr. SEELY's Committee, and says that counter reports were prepared by Mr. SEELY and the then Secretary of the Admiralty, and that this Committee also abstained from reporting on the principal subject referred to it. Mr. CHILDERS' modesty prevented him from saying that, although the evidence entirely proved Mr. SEELY's case, the Committee were induced by Mr. CHILDERS himself to withhold their judgment, which, if given at all, could only have been given one way.

Strangely enough Mr. CHILDERS thinks that these facts supply a reason, not for abolishing, but for retaining a Board which no one of the three investigating bodies ventured to acquit, and which one of them unreservedly condemned. At the same time, however, an attempt is, it seems, to be made to mitigate the evil working of the Board. In the first place, Mr. CHILDERS insists on his own undisputed supremacy. In the next, he entirely modifies the policy pursued by the Sea Lords. Then he intends, if it will work, to make the Secretary a real financial officer; and, finally, he proposes to consolidate the dockyard work and commit it to managers who are to be regarded as quasi-permanent officers, under a single chief responsible to the Minister alone. This officer is also to be permanent, though to keep up the fiction of the Board system he is to be called a Lord of the Admiralty. And economy is to be effected besides by abandoning the Deptford and Woolwich dockyards. These are evidently honest, though clumsy and timid, approaches to a sound organization, and in these days of an omnipotent Government we must be content even with partial amendments of proved abuses. In the general regulation of the fleet Mr. CHILDERS will give effect to a policy which he announced long since in opposition. He will reduce the foreign squadrons by 16 ships and more than 3,000 men, which, coupled with the steps taken by the late Government in the same direction, will complete a total reduction of 6,600 men, almost exactly what Mr. CHILDERS had proposed when he sat on the other side of the House.

The Estimates also show a considerable reduction in dockyard expenditure. Repairs are to cost less, partly because fewer ships will be commissioned, and those for longer periods; partly, it may be hoped, from more effectual supervision. Another saving will be obtained by a reduction of the Marines, which is justified on the only ground on which a reduction of that admirable force could be justified—namely, that the numbers are too large to admit of each man having the share of sea-service necessary to insure efficiency.

Finally, money is to be saved by reducing expenditure on stores and on the construction of new ships. Two new ships only of any importance are to be laid down, and these are to be enormous turret ships, with 12-inch armour, and low free board, carrying the heaviest metal, and having stowage for twelve days' consumption of coal. Every ship of course is a compromise, and in this case, in order to get stowage and offensive and defensive strength, Mr. CHILDERS has given up masts altogether. The new ships will not therefore be cruisers in the proper sense, neither will they be coast ships, for they are intended to draw twenty-five or twenty-six feet water. Mr. CORRY objects on principle to any ship which cannot sail when called upon; but he has yet to show that the tremendous power of the proposed turret-liners can be attained in any other way than that proposed by Mr. CHILDERS. Turret cruisers we must have, and shall have when the obstinate opposition to them has been conquered by the now imminent success of the Captain. But this is no reason why we should not also have turret-liners as Mr. CHILDERS proposes, in the face of which no known ship or fort will long be able to escape destruction. The step is a step in the right direction, and though we should have been glad to see more decisive action on the part of Mr. CHILDERS, it cannot be doubted that he proposes to apply the limited sums which he asks for much more advantageously than any naval vote has been applied for years, and that even where his plans are most defective, the changes which he does make are all in the right direction.

MR. BRIGHT AND THE BRITISH TRADESMAN.

AT the celebrated, we had almost said the notorious, dinner which the Fishmongers gave to the present Ministers, Mr. LOWE delivered himself of a somewhat hard and fast principle to which he seemed to pledge the Government, and to be desirous of committing the House of Commons, on whose behalf he was returning thanks. He hoped "that when any "question is brought forward between the public and small "classes of individuals, the House of Commons would range "itself on the side of the public, and not of individual "interests." Good orthodox teaching this—the greatest happiness of the greatest number, as BENTHAM would express it; the weakest goes to the wall or into nothingness, as the Darwinian law illustrating the struggle for life would enunciate it. Mr. LOWE went further, and announced that it was the duty of Ministers in charge of departments to represent economy, while he feared it would be—at any rate it always had been—the part of the House of Commons, as representing the chorus of profligate expenditure, to resist economy. All this was to be changed. In spite of any taunts about cheeseparing, the Government was resolved to compel a rigid system of pen-nibbing in all the public offices; and whatever the sympathies of a soft-hearted public might be, or whatever the justice of the case might be, the staff of clerks must be reduced. Whatever results may have attended the edict about pen-mending, Mr. CHILDERS has set to work with the Admiralty; and though a Commission has reported that the selection of certain clerks to be dismissed or placed on "the redundant list" is arbitrary and unjust, on the 31st of March at least a dozen clerks will be reduced. As most, or at any rate many, of these gentlemen must have been attracted to the QUEEN's service by the Civil Service Commissioners, no doubt this piece of economy will do much to increase the popularity of competitive examinations, when it is known that a clerk who fancies himself permanently attached, say to such an office as the Admiralty, may find after some years' service that his choice lies between a total extinction of his professional life, and transference to such offices as those of the Post Office or Customs. Well; we at any rate, as the taxpayers, cannot complain, whatever the civil servants may think about it. Fiat parsimonia, ruat justitia. We believe that every taxpayer who has an income of 500*l.* a year may, if he nibs many pens in making the calculation, bring out the consoling fact that by the dismissal of the eleven Admiralty clerks he may perhaps be saved something like an appreciable fraction of three farthings a year by the fearless adoption of the principle of "public as against "individual interests." But the worst—shall we say?—or the best of these broad and abstract principles is their generality. They are so very general that generality is their beauty, and nobody likes them in practice. Mr. LOWE admits and complains of this generality; and whatever may be the case with Mr. LOWE, one, and a very distinguished, colleague of Mr. LOWE seems to see this too. Now here is Mr. BRIGHT, who was at the Fishmongers' dinner, and whose special duties were included by Mr. LOWE in this definition of the function of a Minister. Mr. BRIGHT presides over the Board of Trade; the business of the Board of Trade is "to range itself on "the side of the public, and not of individual interests," and of course, when they come into contact, to uphold the general against the special. During the last week two occasions have turned up in Parliament to test, in Mr. BRIGHT's person, the working of this noble principle. Last Friday Lord EUSTACE CECIL called attention to the matter of false weights and measures and adulteration, and Mr. SELWIN-IBBETSON called attention to the number of railway accidents arising from the enormous traffic on the principal lines.

We shall not follow either Lord EUSTACE CECIL or Mr. SELWIN-IBBETSON through their statements. They may have been, which we do not think, exaggerated; but at any rate they only express a large and deep feeling on the part of the public, and, further than this, they were advanced in the public interest. Lord EUSTACE held a brief for the public against the special interests of retail tradesmen; Mr. SELWIN-IBBETSON appeared on behalf of the public against the dealers in railway accommodation. In either case Mr. LOWE's law applies—the public against individual interests. Part of Mr. BRIGHT's reply we shall not take much notice of, because it refers merely to matter of fact. Mr. BRIGHT answered Lord EUSTACE, first, by saying that weights and measures were, as a fact, seldom short or defective against the purchaser; and that, as to adulteration in articles of food, there was very little of it, and what little there was, was rather healthy and salutary than otherwise. Mr. SELWIN-IBBETSON was met on the same tack. As to railway accidents, there were none worth speaking of; and as to the remedies which the law enforces against the Company in the matter of Lord CAMPBELL's Act, it was Mr. BRIGHT's firm opinion that the law is of a very questionable character; and the PRESIDENT of the BOARD of TRADE went on to hint not obscurely that, in his view, if there was to be a change, it ought to be made in favour of the individual railway interest as against the public safety. This was pretty strong speaking, but it did not embody much of a principle. No doubt if Lord EUSTACE and Mr. SELWIN-IBBETSON were merely inventing their facts, and if there were no such things in existence as false balances, adulteration, or railway accidents, it was simple folly and waste of time to ask Parliament to legislate against these non-existent crimes and evils. But Mr. BRIGHT went further, and really distinguished himself. To be peddling about mere questions of fact is poor work; never mind the minor premiss if you can dispose of it by a good broad, sweeping, exhaustive major. This is the philosophic mind; and Mr. BRIGHT delivered himself of a major which rises to the dignity of a maximum. His reply was substantially this:—If this is all true, and even if your statements are not exaggerated, which I believe they are, still I am bound to say that "adulteration arises from "competition in business," and therefore, as you cannot stop, and indeed ought to encourage, competition, it is useless to attempt to interfere with adulteration; for if you attempted to interfere with it, "life"—that is, the tradesman's life—"would "not be worth having, and I should recommend them"—the tradesmen compelled to sell honest goods by honest weights, and groaning under the terrors of inspectors and Government prosecutions—"to remove to another country where they would "not be subject to such annoyance." And so with regard to railways:—You cannot and must not interfere with railways. To talk of compelling separate lines for goods traffic, and separate lines for passenger traffic, is all very well in the interests of human life and the public. But "a question like that" is absurd. And as to telegraph signals, "to interfere with a "matter so delicate and minute, and to make it compulsory," it is not worth wasting breath upon it. Now if this is not precisely and accurately what Mr. LOWE denounces as the profligate view of preferring private interests to public ones, words cease to have a meaning. The retail tradesman must be defended against the ignorant clamour of the public, so must the railway interest. The public asks for economy in the shape of just weights, and goods being what they pretend to be, and economy in the matter of life and limb. The tradesman and the Railway Board plead their private interests, and Mr. BRIGHT, to use Mr. LOWE's language, "ranges the Govern-"ment on the side of individual interests, and not those of the public."

As to the matter of fact, though we just now said we should not enlarge upon it, we must say a word or two. Let any one of our readers weigh the meat, bread, and groceries which come into his house during the next week, and note the result; and further, we ask how comes it that in the parish of St. Pancras the inspectors state that the crying evil of the day is that the parish authorities screen and conceal "the numerous cases of "deficient weights and measures brought under their notice"? How comes it that a sort of telegraph is worked announcing the approach of the inspectors? how is it that they detect "a "famous tea merchant with his 2 lbs. weight 6 oz. deficient," and find the retailers hiding their false balances? Most likely the telegraph workers were those described by Mr. BRIGHT whose weights were always wrong, but wrong in favour of their customers, and who, pious Christians as they are, would not have their good deeds known to incredulous inspectors. If we were disposed to take Lord EUSTACE CECIL's side, we should also inquire what right has the Vestry of St. Pancras to guard with this jealous care the list of tradesmen fined for having deficient weights? and further, if this precious Vestry, composed as it is of small retail tradesmen, has this power to screen these thieves and robbers, why should it retain the power? Why is not the supervision of weights and measures made a matter of police, and not of municipal regulation? and why should not the magistrates be compelled to publish these lists? The whole thing ought to be taken out of the hands of these wretched Vestries. No, says Mr. BRIGHT; trade would be impossible if we interfered. They interfere in France, they interfere in Prussia, they interfere everywhere where it is admitted to be one of the first duties of Government to protect the poor and ignorant and starving; and even where law is halting, and it is difficult to reach offenders in a thinly populated country such as America, the law of Lynch supplements the statutes. But in England the British tradesman ought not to stand this. Better shut up his shutters than submit to the degradation of honest dealing. Mr. BRIGHT at the Fishmongers' Hall said that, in his own person, he had in the public interests so far neglected business that he was almost in the condition of Mr. SHEIL, who was, according to his own account, sent to the Board of Trade because he knew less about trade than any other man in Parliament. We make Mr. BRIGHT a present of this extenuation of the character which he is pleased to give of the British retailer. We trust that Mr. BRIGHT is, as he seems to suggest, ignorant of the real character of his clients. His picture of them is scarcely engaging. POPE talks of the "tradesman meek and much a liar." Mr. BRIGHT describes him as much a liar, and bound to be so by the stress of competition, but anything but meek. Mr. BRIGHT's retailer not only cheats, but must cheat, and must not be interfered with in his cheating. We regret to say that there is much truth in this. The lower you descend in trade, the less economical and the more unsound is its working. The small retail tradesman has no capital, or only such as he borrows at an extravagant price; the retail publican is much in the same condition. They deal in perishable articles; they are bound to give credit; they are open to competition; the money that they have is not enough to pay interest, to remunerate their own labour, and to keep their families; and adulteration and false weights are their only resource. Humanitarians will say that, if you throw additional difficulties on the small retailer, you are suppressing a useful element in society. This is just what we deny. We believe that the public good, and the true interests of trade, would be advanced by diminishing retail trade as it is now carried on in poor neighbourhoods, and that both vendors and consumers would be benefited by improving a good many retailers from off the face of the town. If, as Mr. BRIGHT says, the retailer's life is not worth having if he is to be interfered with, and compelled by law to forego cheating and robbery, we need not deny this. But we add that this same small tradesman may as well be made to understand that, while it is a great hardship to be compelled by an inquisitorial law to be true and just in all your dealings, there are other people, and the great majority of us too, who feel that life is not worth having if the Government of the country will not acknowledge the first and elementary principles on which society is founded, and for the sake of which alone we submit to Government at all.

CROSS QUESTIONS AND CROOKED ANSWERS.

WE must defer to a future occasion the discussion of the many important questions raised by the Army Estimates, but the conversation which preceded the Committee was much too curious an illustration of Parliamentary government to be passed over in silence. A remarkable controversy has been raging for months on the simplest of all simple issues. Is it, or is it not, the fact that, by virtue of a solemn document, the Horse Guards is established as a distinct centre of administration from the War Office? On four several occasions the War Minister has been called up to say whether this is so or not. He knows, and every one who has inquired into the subject knows, that precisely such a document as we have described was signed as a Royal Warrant, and ought to be, if it is not, in the custody of the Minister for War. And yet, with this knowledge in his mind, four times has Mr. CARDWELL spoken on the subject without hinting at the existence of the document which would solve the whole controversy, and suggesting, as strongly as he could suggest without direct assertion, that the whole statement is founded on imagination, and that no warrant exists which defines the separate functions of the two officers between whom the government of the Army is divided.

That this should be possible only shows how difficult a thing it is for the House of Commons to compass any kind of administrative reform. If a Tory Ministry is in, it is hopeless to move in such a matter. If Liberals are in power, the very men who would lead the attack, were they permitted, are gagged by the discipline of office. And yet, even with every allowance for these formidable obstacles, it is infinitely creditable to Mr. CARDWELL'S—what shall we say?—tact, that he has been able, after four questions, so to deliver himself as not to confess, and even, by implication though not in terms, to deny, the existence of a document with which he ought to be perfectly familiar. It is worth noting, if only as a curiosity of Parliamentary government, how this result was brought about. The first inquiry was made on February 23 by Lord ELCHO, who inadvertently misdescribed the document which he was inquiring for, by calling it a warrant appointing the Commander-in-Chief, instead of a warrant defining the relations between this great officer and the Secretary of State. Mr. CARDWELL was able to say that there was no such "appointing" warrant, and adroitly mentioned a letter of service in a way that seems to have led some members of the House to believe that that was the governing document. So the difficulty was tided over once. Then came another question from Sir P. O'BRIEN, which, in consequence evidently of what had fallen from the Minister, was directed to this letter of service, which had nothing to do with the question. Sir P. O'BRIEN having thus been led on to a false scent, got no more information than Lord ELCHO had done, and once more Mr. CARDWELL sat down without having acknowledged the existence of the paper on which the whole dispute turned. A third question by Mr. WHITE, framed on the same kind of misconception, on March 12, still failed to draw out a categorical answer to the question whether the all-important document had any existence. The inquiring mind of Parliament was not, it appeared, to be baffled, and at last Mr. O'REILLY gave an explicit notice of his intention on Thursday last "to ask questions relative to documents now in force upon the subject of the respective duties "and authority of the Secretary for War and the Commander-"in-Chief." At last the chase appeared to be at an end. A question directly pointed to documents of which Mr. CARDWELL was the proper custodian could scarcely be answered without saying whether such a warrant as was suggested was a reality or a fiction. It did seem at last as if every earth were stopped, and we confess we waited with some curiosity to see in what terms an experienced Minister would admit his acquaintance with a paper as to which on three previous occasions his mind had appeared to be a perfect blank. But the game of politics has as many surprises as the game of war. Just when matters had at last been brought to a crisis, every one let drop his weapon, and the curtain fell upon one more fiasco. And all this came about in the simplest and most natural way in the world. Mr. O'REILLY, having occupied the ground by his notice, accidentally omitted to ask his question, and by a hair-breadth escape Mr. CARDWELL was still able to avoid rendering up his secret. Oddly enough too, after his attention had been called to the specific point by Mr. O'REILLY'S notice, the Minister again addressed himself to the subject on Mr. WHITE'S motion, and again took his double line of defence, which was in substance, first, that the dual government did not exist; and, secondly, that the dual government had been approved by Sir JAMES GRAHAM'S Committee and ought not to be changed. And then, for the fourth time, the Minister sat down without committing himself to any statement whether the document existed or not.

Perhaps the most extraordinary thing of all was that Mr. O'REILLY, in the course of the same evening, delivered a glowing panegyric on Mr. CARDWELL, without so much as hinting that he would like an answer to the question which he had so unfortunately forgotten to put. The remarkable and interesting result is that, after a fortnight's hard questioning, the House of Commons is unable to find out from one of the Ministers whether an important State paper exists or not.

THE THEORY OF SOCIETIES.

THERE has been considerable discussion of late respecting the theoretical status of the Church of England. Such inquiries, indeed, can never be entirely laid aside; but there are obvious reasons why at the present moment they should attract more than usual interest. And naturally, together with this interest, a corresponding diversity of opinion is elicited on the part of different inquirers. There are people, for instance, who identify the Church with the State; there are, it is said, people who identify the Church with the clergy; and there are people who affirm that the Church is something different from either of these two. Professor Bonamy Price holds that the Church of England is a society created by the English Government at the era of the Reformation. Dr. Pusey holds that the Church of England at the present day is the same society as that which existed under the same name in England in the reign of Henry II. Some hold the Church of England to be an independent society; others hold it to be a part of a larger society.

For the full settlement of these questions a good deal of historical, and possibly theological, research is required. But there is a source of disagreement anterior to any dispute on matters of history or theology, in the fact that the terms used in the discussion are still in need of a definition perfectly accurate and clear. More especially, the fundamental term, Society, has never yet been so carefully explained as to render it possible to say when any collection of men is, or is not, a society; or when any given society, in the progress of things, has been so far altered, either in its principles or its construction, as to make it incorrect to speak of it as the same society which it had been some time back. These topics will, we think, admit of a great deal more examination than they have hitherto received; and we wish to attempt something of the kind in these remarks.

What is a society? A society, in the most general sense of the word, is any collection of men who have a purpose in common, understood by the whole body alike; that is, a collection of men, each of whom undertakes for his own part to act in some more or less definite way, and has a reasonable expectation that the other members will likewise act in a manner more or less determinate. It will be seen by this definition that a society does not, ipso facto, imply a government; it does not imply any delegated body taken out of the rest to carry out and enforce the purpose of the whole society. And though, as a matter of fact, nearly every society has a government, whose power over the other members is greater or less according to circumstances, yet there have been, and are, societies without such an appendage. To take a very trifling instance; we have known a society, each member of whom bound himself or herself to get up and be dressed before eight o'clock in the morning, or else, failing to do so, to pay a fine, proportionate to the lateness of the hour, into a certain common fund. At the end of the year the whole of this fund was divided among those members who had been most regular in their early rising. It is plain that this society was truly a society, and yet it had no government; the sole constraining force upon each member of it was his own honour. Again, to pass from the very small to the very great; the nations of Europe may, not metaphorically, but with perfect correctness of phrase, be termed a society. That is, there are certain general rules which each nation for its own part undertakes to abide by, in the reasonable expectation that the other nations will abide by them also. It is true that these rules are comparatively few; they are of modern date; yet both by reason of themselves, and by reason of the more numerous tacit and unexpressed agreements which go along with them, they suffice to render the words "Society of Nations," as applied to European countries, a strictly accurate expression. Yet Europe as a whole has no government. So again, the Christian Church, from the time of the Apostles to the time of the predominance of the Papal power, was a society without a government. That is, the different Christian Churches had governments; but the whole body had none; though the different Councils which, at periods of any great difficulty, met from diverse portions of the Church were the rudiments of a government.

But though a society may exist without a government, it cannot exist without compulsion, in some form or other; it cannot exist without the anticipation of pain, on the part of each member of the society, in case he should act in a contrary manner to that which is supposed by the fact of his membership. The compulsion exercised on each member of a society may be purely mental; it may be simply the feeling of an ill conscience produced by the breach of an engagement; it may be fear of the disapprobation of the rest of the society; but whatever be its form, it cannot be entirely absent. Material compulsion in a society almost necessarily implies a government; for material force implies a definite act, and this will always, for convenience sake, be entrusted by the whole body to some chosen members of it. It is true, that in the case of the "Society of Nations" which constitutes Europe, that which impels each nation to abide by such rules as those established in respect of maritime warfare is the fear of material loss in the case of their being disregarded; but this is probably the only exception that could be adduced.

It is evident that there are all degrees of complexity in societies. The organization of some is intricate to the last degree; that of others can be understood at a glance. In this respect, a parallel may be drawn between societies and the forms of animated beings. Without disrespect, we may compare clubs, philosophical and debating societies, temperance societies, and so on, to polypi and jelly-fish. You may cut a polypus about, or even turn it inside out, and leave it as cheerful as ever. Just so, the Oxford or Cambridge Union might lose the whole set of its officers, and be no whit the worse for it; it might in an instant resolve to change its government throughout, and be regulated on totally different principles, and the society go on as merrily as before the operation. But this is not possible with an animal or a society of at all delicate organization. If you cut off a man's head, there is an end of him; and if the Parliamentary government of England were abolished, the whole of society would be convulsed.

This analogy may be pursued even further. We put forward at the beginning of this article, as one of the most interesting and important questions that often meet us in respect of societies, Whether any given society has, after the lapse of time and the processes of change, retained its identity? is it the same society that it was before? Now, curiously enough, this question does sometimes, though rarely, meet us in the case of animated life. There are creatures each of which will, if cut in two with a pair of scissors, become incontinently two creatures. What are we to say of this? Are both creatures that result from the scission identical with the single creature which existed before? It is a puzzling question, and may serve to show, by analogy, that in the identification of a society more difficulties may meet us than we are at first aware of. But this is observable; the doubt as to the identity of any creature (a doubt arising not from our own imperfect observation, but from the character of the creature itself) cannot possibly arise except in regard to creatures of a low order—that is, of extreme simplicity of organization. No one can doubt as to the identity of any given man, from the day of his birth to the day of his death; and so, with the increase in complexity of any society, increases the ease with which that society is identified. A huge, overgrown Eastern empire, with its few and homogeneous parts, and its low organization, may very probably furnish matter of dispute as to whether it is the same empire that existed in nearly the same place five centuries before. But no one can dispute the continuity of life which binds together the England of to-day with the England of Edward I.

But here a consideration meets us of the highest importance. We saw that those societies which exercise a merely mental compulsion on their members, and rely on this for the continuance of their being, have much less need of a government than those whose action and objects are more material. It may be added, that they have also less need of a complex organization altogether. Now the Christian Church is an institution that relies for its existence on the mental influences that co-exist among its members. It cannot, indeed, avoid having, in every part, some definite organization; but its objects are so general, so loosely connected with the manifold material phenomena of the universe, involving so few fixed modes of action, that it is necessarily a simple and not a complex society. Its organization is of a low order, and in saying this, let us not be thought to say anything irreverent of it. It might quite conceivably have had no organization at all; Christianity might have been left to spread itself, as mathematics and philosophy spread themselves, by books, or by casual oral instruction. As it is, in organization it is one of the most simple of societies; and this forms great part of the reason why it is so difficult to say whether, in any case, and in any sense, different Christian bodies can be said to form a single society; or whether a Christian body of the present day can be said to be one and the same society with a Christian body of some centuries ago. Undoubtedly, the difficulty of the former question would be much diminished were it not that certain Christian bodies actively anathematize other certain Christian bodies. It seems hard to affirm societyship between bodies one of which, if not both, vehemently repudiates the connexion. And yet the statement may not in all points of view be so absurd as at first sight appears.

The most highly organized by far of Christian communities is, unquestionably, the Roman Catholic Church. And no less unquestionable is it that a great part of this comparatively high organization is due to the fact that the Roman Church has, far more than any other Christian body, mixed itself up with secular matters. The gradations of rank, the cardinals and bishops, and numerous religious orders, the military service (as it were) and instantaneous obedience which, unknown among other Christians, is paid as a matter of course by the priesthood of the Roman Church to their superior authorities, the centralization of the whole, could not have arisen unless that Church had been used to enter as a combatant into the field of warring powers, of governments, and States, and empires. And no doubt this is the principal reason why the Church of Rome has maintained a permanence of form, a strength of resistance against enemies that have again and again seemed about to crush her utterly, which is her own most impregnable boast, and by which Protestants, far enough removed from her doctrines, have often shown themselves fascinated and even overawed. Yet it is not, after all, so wonderful that a power which took its rise in the infancy of modern Europe, and was moulded in the midst of violent assaults, and trained to employ against earthly monarchs weapons to which those monarchs were unused and unaccustomed, should show a greater vitality than societies which, however born of convulsion, soon glided into a period of rest and quiet, if not of obscurity and insignificance.

CLERICAL CELIBACY.

A CONSIDERABLE sensation appears to have been created in Italy by a recent decision of the Court of Appeal at Naples in favour of the legality of clerical marriages. The Times' Correspondent informs us that about forty priests, in or near that city, were already married, but this is stated to have been the first case brought under the official notice of the supreme civil tribunal. It had, indeed, been decided in an opposite sense by the local courts of Salerno, on the ground that a priest was always a priest, and bound, as such, by the obligations incurred at ordination. A similar decision, if our memory serves us, was given, and on the same ground, by the civil courts in France two or three years ago. Of course the advocate of Luigi Treglia, the young priest who appealed against the prohibition of his marriage, had little difficulty in answering this argument on the accepted principle of "a free Church in a free State." The law, he said in effect, knows nothing of ecclesiastical obligations, which can only bind the conscience. No doubt the Church may prevent a married clergyman from officiating, and there the State cannot interfere to protect him. But it will secure to him all his rights as a citizen, any ecclesiastical regulation or impediment notwithstanding. So far the matter is of little interest to any but those immediately concerned. A Roman Catholic priest, for instance, might marry any day in England—some few have actually done so—and his marriage, if contracted under legal conditions, would be valid, and his children legitimate. But he would have to leave his Church, or at least to retire into "lay communion," as the French priests did who married during the first Revolution, and were afterwards absolved and readmitted to the Sacraments. It seems, however, to have been felt on all sides that wider issues were ultimately involved. Certainly the advocates both for the appeal and the defence, if we may trust the reports in the English newspapers, travelled into considerations lying far beyond the immediate legal bearings of the case. On the one hand, the "traditions of centuries and the feelings of the multitude" were urged against allowing the validity of such unions. "What would they think of a priest who said mass in the presence of his wife and family?" This was clearly to raise the whole question of clerical celibacy as a law of the Church. On the other hand, it was observed that this law was "in perfect contradiction to the nature of man, to the Divine word revealed in the Scriptures, and to the example of Christ, who selected married men for Apostles." It was a device to serve the ambition of mediæval Popes, "killing the soul, the heart, and the moral sentiment." This, again, was quite beside the merely legal aspects of the question. It was to challenge directly, not the civil force, but the moral expediency of the existing rule of the Church. And the Attorney-General evidently intended to give this enlarged scope to the inquiry, for he observed that the popular prejudice against the marriage of priests would die out when people saw them respectable heads of families, and that for his own part "he would infinitely rather hold out his hand to a priest who took his wife to his house than to one who took his concubine"—rather a startling comment, if there is any foundation for it, on the average standard of clerical morality in South Italy.

With the particular case ruled by the Court of Appeal at Naples neither we nor our readers have any concern. It seems to us, as we remarked before, inevitable that it should have been ruled as it has been, on the existing principles of the relation of Church and State in Italy. But the wider issue thus indirectly but very prominently raised is one vitally affecting the condition of a Church which includes more than half the Christian population of the world, and it can therefore hardly be regarded with indifference by any thoughtful man. The fact that an Œcumenical Council has been summoned to meet in Rome at the close of this year no doubt gives it an additional significance, though we should be curious to hear on what authority it is [illegible] le intimation has yet appeared on the list of agenda with which the Roman Catholic organs have rather copiously supplied us. But, whether or not it comes before the Council, there are not wanting signs that the question is rapidly becoming ripe for discussion before the tribunal of public opinion, within as well as without the Roman Communion, and that is a tribunal which the authorities both of Church and State are sooner or later constrained to listen to. It may not, therefore, be out of place to say a few words here on some of the general bearings of the question. And we shall do so without attempting to reopen the controversy, on which we have more than once lately had occasion to speak, as to the relative merits of the celibate and the married life in the abstract. The point at stake here is not the "virtue of chastity," but the compulsory rule imposed for life, and that from a very early age, on a large body of men. The force of what we have to say therefore will be unaffected by the truth of any theories about the "counsels of perfection" and the spiritual superiority of the unmarried life. Neither, again, are we at all concerned to deny—what most reasonable persons, whether Catholic or Protestant, would readily admit—that a single life voluntarily undertaken and persevered in for the purpose of more entire self-devotion to ministerial work—say in missions to the heathen, or among the half-heathen population of our vast cities—is a noble and useful exercise of Christian philanthropy. That is quite another thing from a lifelong engagement, usually entered into at the mature age of twenty-one, and required as a sine quâ non of holy orders, which may be, and as many have declared often is, felt afterwards as an intolerable yoke, while yet it can never be laid aside without the complete sacrifice of position and career, too often also of character. The question, we repeat, is not of celibacy in the abstract, but of compulsory celibacy, imposed on the whole clerical body, as in theory it has been in the Church of Rome since the days of Gregory VII. The main arguments urged in its favour then and since have been the example of our Lord and some of His apostles, the necessity or fitness of those charged with the ministry being free from family cares and distractions, and especially the requirements of the confessional. It is obvious for many reasons, which it would hardly be suitable to dwell upon here, that the example of our Lord will not bear to be dwelt upon in this connexion. It could at most only prove celibacy to be the higher state, not that it is obligatory on the priesthood. As regards the Apostles, several of them seem to have been married; and marriage, as we gather from St. Paul's Epistles, was ordinarily required, in the apostolic age, as a condition of ordination. This was no doubt chiefly for reasons of a temporary nature, and seems to afford no adequate justification for the permanent retention of the rule in the Eastern Church. Still it does not point to the expediency of an opposite rule. But it was not in fact from these motives, nor even altogether from the more practical consideration of their greater fitness for the work of the pastoral ministry, that one of the ablest pontiffs who ever sat on the Papal throne resolved to enforce absolutely and universally, on the whole priesthood of the Western Church, the rule of celibacy. Pope Siricius had censured clerical marriage at the end of the fourth century, and it had long before the eleventh been made "irregular." But it continued to be extensively practised, and Hildebrand was the first to take the bull by the horns when, at a Council held at Rome in 1074, he positively forbade it and made it invalid, with a prohibition to laymen from confessing to married priests or hearing them say mass. The enforcement of his decree, as was natural, was strenuously resisted. There was much, however, in the circumstances of the age to excuse, if not to justify, it. Hildebrand perceived, no doubt, that a celibate priesthood, cut off from domestic ties, and comparatively independent of social and secular interests, would prove a gigantic instrument of spiritual power. And the event ratified his anticipations. But it would be no less an historical blunder than an injustice to ascribe to such a man the mere selfish aims of a vulgar ecclesiastical ambition. There was an imminent danger of Church property under the feudal system becoming, like lay property, hereditary in the hands of a married clergy, and of their sinking into a mere sacerdotal caste, degraded beneath the moral and intellectual level of the rude barons among whom they lived, and whom it was their business to elevate to a higher life. This, however, does not at all prove that what was excusable or requisite for one age is necessary for all times. A recent writer in a Roman Catholic periodical says, "Imagine the Anglican clergy, as a body, bound to celibacy, and what would be the result?" The Roman clergy have been so bound for eight centuries, and we may ask what has been the result? What is the verdict of history on the experiment of Hildebrand?

We have said that the attempt to enforce the new law was from the first met with strenuous opposition. This was especially the case in France and Britain, and from that day to this it has notoriously been the constant source of grave moral scandal, which is alone enough to throw the onus probandi on the shoulders of those who advocate, not on those who deprecate, the retention of the rule. In the century after its establishment we have the testimony of Giraldus Cambrensis, a Welsh archdeacon, that the Welsh clergy lived in habitual concubinage, and that Pope Alexander III. would have rescinded the law but for the opposition of one abbot, afterwards Gregory VIII. Peter Manducator, Chancellor of the University of Paris, publicly declared it to be the greatest evil ever inflicted by the devil on the Church of God. In 1212 a Council of Paris had to prohibit Bishops from taking bribes for condoning the secret marriages of their clergy, and several local Councils were held about the same period to restrain clerical irregularities. At the General Council of Vienne in 1311, memorials from two Spanish Bishops were read, urging the repeal of the law of celibacy as the only effectual remedy for the moral evils entailed by it. The question was brought forward at all the General Councils held during the fifteenth century. At the Council of Trent the ambassadors of the German Emperor urgently demanded permission for the marriage of priests, as well as the use of a vernacular liturgy, and the restoration of the chalice; and all these demands were supported by the Cardinal of Lorraine and the French Bishops. Since that period matters likely to give offence or lead to discussion have been carefully screened from public view, but it may well be doubted if on the whole there has been any material improvement in the average of clerical morality. There have always been countries where it has been at a low ebb. We have Blanco White's mournful evidence about Spain in his own day, and it is worth remembering that Dr. Newman has assured us that his honesty in the statement of facts may be relied on. Unless common report is greatly at fault, the state of things is no better, to say the least, now, in Spain and Portugal, than it was thirty or forty years ago. There is a passage in Mr. Ffoulkes's now famous pamphlet, which we lately reviewed, pointing to a similar conclusion. Nor can it well be supposed that the bitter recriminations exchanged between the Ultramontane and Liberal clergy in Italy are altogether destitute of foundation. Since the Italian clergy have been subjected to the jurisdiction of the civil courts, cases of the very gravest nature have been tried at Milan and Turin, affecting the character of religious orders charged with the education of boys. The Roman Catholic clergy of Würtemberg and Baden openly petitioned the Holy See some years ago for the abolition of the law of celibacy, and of the large number of suspended priests in France the great majority are said to have been deprived for immoral conduct. The state of Mexico and South America in this respect is but too notorious. These facts—and they are but specimens of what might be adduced—prove thus much at all events, that the enforcement of a rigid rule of celibacy for life, on a large body of men, is very dangerous to morals, and thus the burden of proof is thrown back on those who defend it. Can they sustain the burden?

There is, of course, the stock argument from the greater freedom and leisure of an unmarried clergy for devoting themselves to their spiritual labours, which, however, tells more in favour of voluntary than of enforced celibacy, for bringing the horse to the water is a very different thing from getting him to drink. Nor can it possibly be maintained that the confessional necessarily requires the services of a celibate priesthood. Roman Catholics at least will not wish to deny that private confession existed in the Church from the beginning, yet the rule of celibacy was not, as we have seen, enforced till the end of the eleventh century; and the opposite rule of compulsory marriage has always prevailed in the East, where nevertheless confession is quite as rigidly required as in the Latin Church, and parish priests are confessors as well as monks. It has indeed been said, we know not how far correctly, that women generally prefer going to the former. Nor can it be maintained that a celibate clergy are exempt from temptations to avarice, for all the mediæval Councils ring with charges of clerical simony and nepotism; while it would hardly be an exaggeration to say that the Anglican clergy of our own day, who are mostly married men, spend as much on the Church as they take from it. On the other hand, if the arguments in favour of the law are far from conclusive, there are serious arguments against it, besides the obvious one already dwelt upon, which cannot fairly be ignored. It is the merest truism to say that a bachelor life, unless undertaken and carried on from the highest and purest motives, has a natural tendency to foster selfishness, while there is much in the duties of a husband and father to evoke that refinement and chivalry of character which are valuable in all, but especially valuable in those whose mission it is to minister consolation to the sick, the sorrowful, and the erring. The law of celibacy again exercises an important reflex influence on the whole method of clerical education, by at least suggesting, if it does not necessitate, that narrow and caste-like system of seminary discipline which has been pursued during the last three centuries in the Roman Church, and in many respects, as a late trial in this country showed, with such unprepossessing results. After making full deductions for prejudice and exaggeration, the clerical author of Le Maudit must be regarded as an important witness, both conscious and unconscious, on this point. And the separate system of training of course perpetuates itself through life in all but men of decidedly superior mark—who are a small minority in every large body—by creating a caste-like habit of mind, and going far to destroy personal independence. A celibate clergy are far more apt to become the willing tools of ecclesiastical despotism, and to identify the cause of religion with the advance of their own order. The whole history of Ultramontanism illustrates this. To a certain extent every order must have, and ought to have, an esprit de corps; but it may easily be developed to such a degree as to clash with that broader human sympathy expressed in the old saying, Homo sum, nihil humani a me alienum puto. And this, while it may help to further sacerdotal aggrandizement, diminishes the legitimate influence of the individual priest. These are but some of the objections which will readily occur to any thoughtful observer of Church history. It will be seen that we have purposely confined ourselves to such considerations as might commend themselves, and indeed appear to be commending themselves, to the judgment of orthodox and intelligent Roman Catholics. The notion .. Italy and Spain, for instance, being converted to Protestantism, notwithstanding the well-meant but rather amusing schemes of Mr. Meyrick and Lord Shaftesbury, has always struck us as one of the wildest of chimeras. But it needs no gift of prophecy to foretell—or, as the Times would say, to "pre dicate"—that important changes in matters ecclesiastical are looming in the distance from which "the most dogmatic Church in Christendom" will not be able permanently to hold aloof. The institution of clerical celibacy, as a law of absolute and universal obligation, will probably be found to lie at the root of al or nearly all that is distinctive in the disciplinary system of Rome, as contrasted with that of other episcopal communions; for instance, the Eastern Church. Any attack upon it is naturally regarded by Ultramontanes as an assault on the fortress which is the key of their whole position. Others may perhaps be disposed to see in it the promise of a new and more hopeful era in th spiritual destinies of their Church.

THE FUTURE OF THE WORKING-CLASSES.

IN the last number of the Fortnightly Review Professor Beesly discusses the social future of the working-classes in an article which has at least the merit of containing much forcible plain-speaking. It is superfluously easy to ridicule the pretensions of the Positivist school, and to wonder how men who begin by rejecting all our most sacred doctrines can venture to set up a faith or a fanaticism of their own. Faith or fanaticism, it cannot be denied that, like all other creeds believed with great intensity by even a small number of enthusiasts, it represents a force with which we shall have some day to reckon. Given the fact that a certain number of able and cultivated men have the most profound conviction that they possess the key by which the mystery of the future is to be unlocked, and in consequence preach a coherent body of doctrine with singular zeal and unanimity, and more contempt or aversion becomes out of place. The school may die out, but even in perishing it will modify to some extent the convictions of its opponents. Every heresy owes such vitality as it exhibits to some partial view of the truth; and there is something to be learnt, when we are tired of denunciation, even from Mr. Brigham Young himself. The Comtist ideal of the world may be unworthy of anything beyond bare toleration; but it is well to ask what are the charms by which it attracts the zeal of a small body of faithful disciples. We are in the habit of drawing some important conclusions from the nature of the Mahommedan paradise; the Positivist heaven, being of a strictly terrestrial variety, will enable us the more easily to estimate the value of the aspirations which it excites.

One point may be observed at starting. Professor Beesly does not, like some other theorists, underrate the difficulty of the task which lies before us. Socialists and Utopians generally suffer from the delusion that, by altering the mere mechanism of society, they can remove all its inherent evils. They fancy that, by shuffling the cards sufficiently, they can make them all turn up trumps. Selfishness and tyranny are to be suppressed by arranging men, like the fragments of a Chinese puzzle, so that there may be no room for evil passions. The Positivists, on the other hand, frankly accept the necessity of the case. They would not have fallen into the error committed by the philosopher of the German poem, who twisted round and round in the vain hope of persuading his pigtail not to hang behind him; they would adopt the more radical cure of cutting the pigtail off. In other words, they admit that to regenerate human society we must begin by altering human nature. Neither can we say that the means by which it is proposed to effect this end are obviously insufficient. If mankind were converted to the Positivist religion, we should all be subjected from our youth to a training which might be confidently expected to obliterate a good many of our instincts. Whether we should be the better for the process is quite another question, which is partly illustrated by Professor Beesly's picture of the future.

Meanwhile, however, the recognition of this principle gives an advantage to the Positivists in their controversy with certain rival schools. Thus, for example, the success in certain directions of co-operative societies has probably led to an exaggerated view of their influence. Some enthusiasts talk as if the world was to be entirely regenerated by the universal substitution of co-operation for the present machinery of industrial employment. They anticipate that the quarrel between labour and capital will reach its final solution by converting all the labourers into capitalists. To these rather extravagant enthusiasts Professor Beesly can reply, with great force, that there are certain inherent advantages in the present system which can never be secured by its rival. "Special skill in training, unity of purpose, promptitude, and occasionally even secrecy, are necessary for a successful direction of industry just as much as of war." Co-operation, moreover, has the disadvantage of forcing the labourer to share in the risks as well as in the profits of capital; and so far neutralizes one of its most important functions. And his objections are summed up in the statement that co-operation requires certain qualities of unselfishness and devotion not to be found in average men, and does not attempt to create them, nor to supply their place by an "organized religion." The considerations thus noticed show, we think, very conclusively, that the field within which co-operation can be expected to work must be very limited. There are many varieties of business to which it can never be applied at all, or only if the general level of virtue and intelligence is materially raised. As a matter of fact, co-operation applied to productive industry has not yet succeeded in establishing itself, in spite of many experiments; and, as compared with individual management, must necessarily suffer many obvious disadvantages. As a moral and social panacea, we readily admit that, like other panaceas, its merits have been absurdly overrated. Professor Beesly indeed holds, not merely that co-operation cannot succeed to any large extent, but that, if it did succeed, its results would be disastrous. The natural consequence would be the creation of a large number of small capitalists as bigotedly conservative as the peasant proprietors of France, and probably ruling those who continued to be labourers in a more tyrannical spirit than the present capitalists. If, as he imagines, the manufactures of the country were to "get into the hands of a number of small shareholders," the rein might probably, as he says, be tighter and the hand heavier. This, however, is to assume that co-operation must fail in its main purpose of giving the labourer a share in the capital. Assuming success to be possible, it is reasonable to suppose that a shading off of one class into another would rather diminish than stimulate animosities. If it were comparatively easy for labourers to pass into the capitalist class, and if there were a large number of these in an intermediate stage, it would be more easy for both sides to recognise a community of interest. Every facility for saving money, moreover, necessarily tends to stimulate the prudential virtues, and to discourage the great fault which, more than any other, tends to lower a man's position in the world—that of a total want of self-restraint. A savings-bank does not directly make a man virtuous, and certainly does not amount to an "organized religion," but it facilitates the development of foresight and prudence where they exist in a rudimentary state, and gives an advantage, in the struggle for existence, to the men who are furthest from the savage state of hand-to-mouth existence. Therefore, as an educating agency such things have their value, though they do not preach the highest kind of virtue. An ideal condition of industry from this point of view would certainly not be one in which co-operation had entirely supplanted individual management, but it would be one in which co-operation had received a large development, simply because the increase of prudence and intelligence had made it possible. "A co-operative society," says Professor Beesly, "is at best a joint-stock company with a large number of small shareholders." Be it so; yet we cannot doubt that joint-stock companies have increased with the increased civilization of the upper classes, and have done much by a natural reaction to develop the virtues to which they were due. If they do not amount to a new religion—and they are certainly far enough off from that—they are, with all their faults, a valuable element in society, in which the working classes may some day share.

Here, however, we have fallen into that crying heresy of individualism, against which it is the special mission of Positivists to protest. Professor Beesly praises trades'-unionism for the very reason which lead some men to be prejudiced against it. The merit of co-operation is in his eyes limited to this, that it enables a few "sharp, shifty" men to creep out of the working-class, whilst doing little or nothing for the great body of that class. It helps the model working-man of a certain party to become, as he expresses it, by a happy quotation from Lord Shaftesbury, "a good and even affluent citizen"; but for the average workman—the easy-going man, content to live and die where he was born—it is of no particular use. Trades'-unionism, on the contrary, attends to this easy-going person, finds him work, strengthens his good resolutions, "in short, it regulates him generally, and looks after him." The offences generally charged against it of reducing the best men to the level of the average, or even of the worst, are condoned in Professor Beesly's eyes by the advantages thus conferred upon the great body of workmen. It encourages, he thinks, the high kind of virtue which leads a man to sink his interests in those of his class, instead of the lower virtue which leads him by hook or by crook to scramble above their heads. And his ideal is summed up in the future assimilation of the industrial class to an army. The rank and file should receive uniform pay, and trust implicitly to the guidance of their leaders. The leaders should have before their eyes as the first object the welfare of their followers, not the accumulation of fortunes for themselves. A stern public opinion would summarily put down that heartless display of wealth which at present embitters more than anything else the existing prejudices between different classes. The whole human race is to be thoroughly and effectually drilled till individualism is crushed out of our constitutions. A spiritual power will be organized whose moral influence will be sufficient to check any abnormal deviations from the path.

There is a force and vigour about this conception of the future of society which is not without its charm, and, we may freely admit, not without its practical value. The apostles of the laissez-faire school have certainly something to learn as to the value of disciplined and harmonious action, and we may even grant the claim to apparent moral superiority in a school which appeals to comparatively unselfish instincts, and proposes to the workman rather to labour for the benefit of his class than to try to elevate himself by deserting it. Yet this extreme anxiety for universal drilling has its weakness even in this point of view, and it is strange to find trades'-unions advocated on the ground of unselfishness; they, we might perhaps urge, only appeal to the selfishness of the many instead of the few, and are prejudicial to the highest ideal of society, which would reconcile with the general advantage the most complete development of the individual. Even in an army it is easy to push discipline too far. The discipline under Grant or Sherman was as stern, says Professor Beesly, as under Frederick or Napoleon. We rather doubt the fact, though it is probable enough that Grant or Sherman would have been very glad to make it so. But the advantage of the United States armies, which in some degree counterbalanced their defects of discipline, was the high degree of individual intelligence. It was probably owing in part to this fact that, though the Northern armies were frequently beaten, they were seldom completely routed. The native troops, at least, had an interest in the cause for which they were fighting, and were not mere fighting machines, held together by a bond of discipline. In proportion as an army combines a certain degree of freedom of action with the necessary strictness of discipline, it becomes a useful and effective instrument; and an army, though according to Professor Beesly's parallel it has many points of similarity with an industrial enterprise, has more need of blind obedience in proportion as the object for which a campaign is carried on is more remote and more in need of concealment than the object of an industrial enterprise. The difference in the particular requirement of secrecy is enough by itself to measure the vast difference between the two cases. It was essential that Napoleon's troops should not prematurely know that he meant to cross the Alps, but there is no similar need in the case of the tunnel under Mont Cenis. Now the object of co-operation is to stimulate this element of free intelligence and interest, which, if highly important even in an army, is of far more importance in an industrial enterprise. To do so requires undoubtedly a moral and intellectual training which co-operation cannot give by itself. But that is no reason why some of the required training should not be applied in this direction. On Professor Beesly's plan, the capitalist has to be trained to take more interest in his workman's happiness than his own fortune, and the workman to feel an implicit confidence in the unselfishness of his employer. The co-operative enthusiasts certainly will require, for their success, that the workmen should be trained to higher prudence, and also trained to submit to discipline in all cases where discipline is required—in short, to leave, without undue jealousy, a fair share of authority to their employer or chief partner. It is difficult to see why one process should take longer than the other. We may certainly be obliged to Professor Beesly and his friends for insisting upon the imperative need of a spiritual improvement taking place simultaneously with an improvement in organization, although the end to which they propose to work appears to us to imply a decidedly one-sided conception of the most desirable type of character, and the means seem calculated to lower a man some degrees in dignity and independence of character.

CONFISCATION.

ONE of the subtler processes of the abuse of language is first diligently to use a word in an inaccurate sense, and then, when people have got pretty well used to that inaccurate sense, to turn about and employ it as an argument. Such a process is indeed directly opposed to the sound rule of law that no man may take advantage of his own wrong; but rules of law do not stand much in the way either of the corruptors of language or of the propagators of sophisms. "Give a dog a bad name and hang him," says the proverb. But it is a twofold triumph when, before you hang the dog, you have, so to speak, hanged the name—when you first pervert some very harmless word into a bad name, and then use the bad name so formed to hang the dog. This sort of thing has been very diligently done throughout the controversy which is now raging about the Irish Church. No one is a greater master of the art than Mr. Disraeli. In his speech when Mr. Gladstone brought in his Bill for disendowment, he solemnly told the world that the measure was "sheer and mere confiscation." The words were of course received with cheers, as the same words, or words like them, have been received with cheers on the Conservative side of every hustings at the late election. The words sound well; they have a good roll; the order is well chosen; two rhyming monosyllables lead the way to a big Latin word to wind up the sentence. And no doubt many people have thought that so artfully contrived a cadence must conceal something in the way of meaning. Now this word "confiscation" has been going about the country during the whole of the election time, and there is no doubt that it has done good service on the Conservative side. People were everywhere told that the disestablishment of the Irish Church was "confiscation," and, as the word "confiscation" sounded big and ugly, people were led to infer that the disendowment of the Irish Church was something very dreadful. The bigness and vagueness and outlandish sound of the word made it admirably suited either to wind up a period of the orator's own, or to put a captious question to an adversary. If a man was dishonest enough to play the trick, he could always make a point by the transparent, yet often effective, dodge of demanding a categorical answer to a question to which no categorical answer can be given. An impudent lawyer, for instance, interrupts a Liberal candidate with the question, "Are you for the confiscation of the revenues of the Irish Church? Answer, Yes or No." Of course no answer of Yes or No can be given to a question which, so far as it has any meaning at all, is simply dishonest. Attempts to explain or define are cut short with the repeated demand "Answer, Yes or No." The lawyer has of course his packed train to cheer him, and the incapacity of the Liberal candidate to give a categorical answer to a question to which no categorical answer can be given is at once blazed abroad as a "Conservative triumph."

Now one is not surprised that so low a trick as this should be ventured on upon a platform in Little Peddlington, though even on a platform in Little Peddlington there will always be people sharp enough to see through it. But it seems that it tells not only in Little Peddlington, but in the House of Commons. Mr. Disraeli does not indeed ask Mr. Gladstone for a categorical answer to a question; but he uses exactly the same sophism when he says that the disendowment of the Irish Church is "sheer and mere confiscation." In a certain sense the saying is a truism. Any transfer of the property of individuals or corporations to the Crown, the Nation, the Public, or whatever we may choose to call it, may, without much abuse of language, be called Confiscation. Only Confiscation is in itself a word perfectly neutral and colourless; it expresses a certain process of law, and says nothing as to the justice or injustice of the process in any particular case. Confiscation may be either just or unjust, but in either case it implies the semblance of legal procedure. In most ages and in most parts of the world private property has, in certain cases—in the case of certain crimes for instance—been liable to forfeiture to the King, the Commonwealth, or whatever the sovereign power may be. Such property may, with very little abuse of language, be said to be confiscated. We say with very little abuse of language, because in strictness "confiscatio" means seizure for the benefit of the "fiscus," the prince's privy purse, as distinguished from the "ærarium" or public treasury. Now most certainly neither Mr. Disraeli nor his supporter the attorney of Little Peddlington meant that Mr. Gladstone had any notion of transferring the estates of the Irish Church to Her Majesty's privy purse. We do not suspect either of them of knowing what "fiscus" or "ærarium" means. But, leaving this subtlety, we may understand by confiscation any legal transfer of private property to the public service without compensation. We think this last qualification must be added. Confiscation seems to imply that the public officer seizes on the private possessions without any regard to the consent of their owner. The forfeiture of the goods of a traitor or felon is an obvious case. So is the seizure of the gun of a poacher or of the nets of an unlawful fisherman. Now these processes are perfectly legal; most country gentlemen at least would add that the seizure of the poacher's gun was not only perfectly legal but inherently just. In Bailey's Dictionary the word "confiscation" is not found, but the verb to "confiscate" is explained to mean "to seize upon and take away goods as forfeited to the King's Exchequer, &c." Johnson has both the verb and the noun, and the verb is explained "to transfer private property to the publick, by way of penalty for an offence." The noun is explained "The act of transferring the forfeited goods of criminals to publick use." This being the meaning of the word, it would be no great flight of metaphor to apply the word "confiscation" either to the suppression of the lesser monasteries or to the proposed suppression of all Irish ecclesiastical corporations. Either process is the transfer of private property to the public, and, at least in a rhetorical way, it may be said to be the penalty for an offence. The corporations in question, in the sixteenth century and in the nineteenth, stand charged, if with no worse crime, at all events with the crime of uselessness, and confiscation is part of the sentence pronounced against them.

Now if Mr. Disraeli and his Peddlingtonian supporter meant only this, there would be nothing to say against them. But, if they meant only this, their words would be wholly without force. They would be stating an undoubted fact, but a fact that proves nothing. For "confiscation" in this its proper sense is, as we said, a word perfectly colourless, and to say that this or that is an act of confiscation proves nothing as to its justice or injustice. But the word "confiscation" has gradually got an odious meaning. The confiscation of a man's goods is, in any case, one of the less pleasant processes of the law, and it is one against which modern feeling has, in most cases, come to run stronger and stronger. In a great many cases confiscation harms the innocent rather than the guilty. If a man forfeits his life for treason or murder, it seems needless that he should also forfeit his goods, which are in fact taken not from him but from his children. And, though confiscation may be perfectly legal and perfectly just, yet of all the confiscations which have ever been done either in England or in other parts of the world, the larger proportion would probably be found to have been morally unjust, and no small proportion of them to have been formally illegal. Hence the word confiscation has become odious; it calls up pictures of tyrants putting people to death and seizing their goods, or, in the mildest shape, of reducing them to beggary and banishing them or shutting them up in islands. It makes one think of Nero and Domitian and the Visconti and Philip the Second, and any other unpleasant sovereigns that one likes to name. Altogether it is a good, big, ugly word, just fitted to become a word of reviling on proper occasions. Also it is a Latin word; so, by the way, is "forfeiture" also, if one comes to think of it; but "confiscation" is much more palpably Latin than "forfeiture"; it ends in -ation, and it has all the grandeur and bigness of a Latin word ending in -ation. As such it is just the word for penny-

-a-liners, and penny-a-liners have not been slow to use it. It has gone the way of "ovation," "inauguration," and all the rest. In penny-a-liners' talk "confiscation" has quite lost its real meaning of forfeiture, whether just or unjust, to the public treasury; it has ceased to be colourless, and it always expresses the idea of an unjust seizure of something or other. It has also lost its sense of a public seizure; we now constantly hear it applied to perfectly private transactions. To take an example from our own craft, we remember a contributor to a periodical whose editor failed or refused—as most editors, by the rule of their office, must refuse—to return an unused manuscript, who indignantly said that the editor had "confiscated" it. In short "confiscation" has got simply to mean the act of "him as prigs what isn't his'n." And, though this is certainly an abuse of language, we are bound to say that the abuse is not so great as the kindred abuses of "ovation" and "inauguration.".

"Confiscation" then having ceased to mean confiscation, and having got the meaning of "robbery" instead, the word stands ready to be used as a word of abuse. As such it was used both by Mr. Disraeli and by his Little Peddlington follower. The local attorney most likely did not know but what it was the right word, or he used it simply because it was a big word. The ex-Prime Minister no doubt uses it with a special eye to bamboozlement. To be sure a few nights later we find Lord Redesdale talking in the same strain, telling us that disendowment is "pure confiscation," and, as he told us once before, that it is "sacrilege." Now we are sure that every word that Lord Redesdale says comes from the bottom of his heart. We are sure that Lord Redesdale thought that the words which he used had a meaning and a very solemn meaning. We are sorry to have to tell him that his most awful anathemas are really nothing more than an uttering of truisms. Mr. Disraeli we can hardly let off so easily. We recommend to him, the next time he wishes to frighten us, to copy the plain English of one of his late colleagues. Compare Mr. Disraeli in the House of Commons and Sir Stafford Northcote at the Middlesex Conservative dinner. Sir Stafford Northcote, we have no doubt, says what he means and means what he says. He calls the Irish Church Bill "robbery." This sort of talk may be violent or silly, but it is honest. Mr. Disraeli cannot stoop to use a plain word like "robbery"; "confiscation" is bigger and grander and vaguer and therefore more effective. And it has also the advantage of being true per accidens. If Mr. Gladstone were asked, as his supporters were, whether his measure was a measure of confiscation, he could hardly say No. It is a measure of confiscation in the natural and etymological sense of the word, though not a measure of confiscation in the sense of the penny-a-liners. Mr. Disraeli very likely knows this, and this is very likely why he chose the word. The sophism is paltry enough, but there is a kind of small cleverness about it which makes it serve his purpose. But it is an odd chance of language, an odd cycle, one might say, when to call a thing by its right name gives the falsest impression of its real nature. The act really is an act of "sheer and mere confiscation"; but "sheer and mere confiscation" is not necessarily, as Mr. Disraeli would have us think it, sheer and mere robbery. If we were ever asked, "Are you for the confiscation of the property of the Irish Church?—Yes or No," the nearest approach to the required answer that we could give would be, in the style of Euripides, "Yes and No."

THE MARTYRS OF YANG-CHOW-FOO.

JUST now the public mind, or the public purse, which practically amounts to much the same thing, is rather sensitive about missionaries, and their manners and customs. The Abyssinian Income-tax—the actual twopence and prospective nobody knows how many pence, which after all must be traced back to a fervent desire on the part of a small knot of sincere, but imprudent, people to improve Abyssinian Christianity—makes us wince. We all know the duty of sowing the Gospel seed in heathen lands, and many of us think that, so long as it is sown, the sower and his tools, the times and seasons for sowing, are very immaterial; indeed to inquire about them at all is often considered to be the sign of the faithless, if not of the scoffer. Still at this moment, like Cowper's tithe-payers, down drop our chins as we bring out our bags, and we mutter as we review the cost of our Abyssinian sermons:—

> . . . A rarer man than you
> In pulpit none shall hear;
> But yet, methinks, to tell you true,
> You sell it plaguy dear.

This nervous and irritable state of the public mind accounts for the interest felt in a debate in the House of Lords on Tuesday, on certain Chinese despatches respecting "the attack on British Protestant Missionaries at Yang-Chow-Foo," last August. We now learn that we have escaped another Chinese war literally by the skin of our teeth, and all to avenge a little popular brawl, in which certain persons—nobody knows who, but calling themselves missionaries—lost their books and furniture and certain female fallals, and one of them got a bad black eye. It seems that in the poly-mono-syllabic town above mentioned, in the interior of the country, a domestic party of English folks styling themselves the China Inland Mission have planted themselves. Who or what the China Inland Mission is nobody seems to know. The Missionary Societies disavow them; Lord Shaftesbury speaks of them with contemptuous ignorance. The China Inland Mission is unknown to London, and, if we might conjecture, it is some offshoot of some small Dissenting community existing in one of the Chinese consular cities which has planted itself; for nobody seems to be responsible for its origin or existence. The Mission seems to consist of a large domestic party—one Mr. Taylor, Director, with his wife and four little children; another married couple; two single gentlemen, and three single ladies; and nineteen teachers and servants. It does not seem that this party did anything very active in the way of missionary work. They rented a house under the provisions of the treaty, but they were not popular. As has happened ever since Christianity existed, they were suspected by the barbarians of being cannibals. The old scandal raised against the primitive Christians reappears in China; and the missionaries are suspected of keeping children for the purpose of cooking and eating them, scooping out eyes, and ripping up women with child. The literary notables and gentry of Yang-Chow disseminated these atrocious reports; the consequence was a popular riot, the mission-house riddled, and the missionaries robbed and ill-treated. No lives were lost, but one eye was reported to be missing, though it seems afterwards to have been recovered, not however without, it is said, possible permanent injury. This was the utmost result of the riot. Mr. Director Taylor immediately appeals to Consul Medhurst, and, as the name Medhurst is familiar to us in connexion with Chinese missions, we are not surprised that this official personage looked favourably on the case. He at once proceeds to vindicate the wrongs of the missionaries with a very high hand. He summons H.M.'s ship Rinaldo, and, with an imposing force, demands all sorts of penalties and redress. He was determined to assert the treaty rights, determined that the missionaries should be well paid for their wrongs, determined that every humiliating apology should be exacted from the Chinese authorities, &c. Chinese authorities demurred. Mr. Consul Medhurst was firm, very firm. The captain of the Rinaldo was, much to his credit, rather lukewarm. Sir Rutherford Alcock was appealed to; the admiral on the station was appealed to. Each and everybody backed up Mr. Medhurst with the whole force of the British name and British navy. Captain Heneage was despatched by Sir Henry Keppel with the Rodney and 300 men, and after seizing a most innocent Chinese steamer, private property, the missionaries' demands were of course acceded to. A large sum in the way of compensation was paid by the Viceroy, and we are not at war with China. Indeed, we have performed a glorious feat of arms, and achieved a commercial success which runs second, if second, only to that which we won on behalf of Don Pacifico.

This great victory of the Gospel and the Union Jack seems to have been received somewhat coldly at the Colonial Office. Lord Clarendon has acknowledged the latest triumph of British diplomacy by sending out instructions to British Consuls in China "to remember that the interference of naval force, either on their representation, or on the part of naval officers acting on their own estimation of facts before them, will alone receive the approval of Her Majesty's Government under very exceptional circumstances"; and, further, "that the Government cannot leave with Consuls and Naval Officers to determine for themselves what redress or reparation for wrong done to British subjects is due, or by what means it should be enforced. Nor can they be allowed to determine whether coercion is to be applied by blockades, by reprisals, by landing armed parties, or by acts of a more hostile character"; in fine, "that the Government cannot delegate to Her Majesty's servants in foreign countries the power of involving their own country in war." In other words, Consul Medhurst, Sir R. Alcock, and the naval authorities have been snubbed, and their inconvenient zeal unmistakeably censured, inasmuch as, one and all, they have done those very things which the Government declines to sanction or approve. This is so far satisfactory, as is the whole tone of the debate in the Lords. It is some satisfaction to know that we have barely escaped a great peril, but it is no satisfaction to know what a contemptible and trumpery incident it was which, to use Lord Shaftesbury's phrase, has caused all this fuss.

The ideal of a missionary is very noble, and this ideal has been often and fully realized in the annals of the propagation of the Christian faith. A missionary advances into the howling wilderness with his life in his hand; goods he has none, or such as he has, he cheerfully submits to their spoiling for his Master's sake. He bears the cross, and with the cross its burdens. He asks not an eye for an eye, and certainly not, as this Inland Mission did, hard cash for an eye, but turns the left cheek to him who smites the right. He does not demand an indemnity for his ravished coat, like Director Taylor, but cheerfully surrenders his cloak also. To the simplicity of the dove he adds the prudence of the serpent, and when persecuted in one city, he scarcely asks the assistance of an ironclad and Armstrong guns to reinstate him. Such were the Bonifaces, the Xaviers, and even the Swartzes of history. Such was the martyr spirit of missionaries who converted Europe, and who in other days planted the Gospel in this very China, and in further Japan. We have changed all this; and while we are told by the Duke of Somerset that missions should follow trade, the China Inland Mission has anticipated the maxim and conducted missions on a sensible practical trading system. The missionary of the period preaches the Gospel when backed by treaty provisions. He is spreading that Kingdom which is not of this world, only it happens to be stoutly represented by consuls, diplomatics, and the British fleet. He fights the servants and emissaries of Satan from the strong entrenched camp of a war-steamer, and the evangelists of the gospel of peace are reinforced under persecution by an armed party of marines. This might be all very well, for modern manners require a change from primitive methods, were it not that the details of missions, such as they are, are not only complex, but very expensive. Mr. Taylor sends in his little bill for damages, and it is certainly one which would have made Xavier, to say nothing of apostolic men, stare and gasp. As we have said, the Inland Mission consisted of four men, five women, and four children. The damages, as assessed by Mr. Director Taylor, amounted to 1,128 taels=366*l.* 12*s.*; a sum which this suffering servant of the Cross proposed, through the Consul Medhurst, to raise to 2,000 taels=650*l.*, the additional figure being for compensation for medical attendance and unappraised sufferings generally. The details of the alleged loss were disputed by the Chinese authorities; the dubious loss of an eye was disproved; and in fighting out the details the Chinese and the missionaries repeated the edifying disputes with which we are familiar in English trials between alleged sufferers by suspicious fires and questionable railway accidents and Directors who think themselves imposed upon. The upshot was that the épicier and missionary mind, backed by the Rodney, got the best of this wrangling and chaffering; and the indemnity actually extorted from the Chinese reaches the respectable sum of 585*l.* 10*s.* The polite Chinese never disputed Mr. Taylor's original valuation of the actual losses of his party in goods=366*l.* 12*s.*; and to this they were compelled to add 162*l.* 10*s.* for compensation of injuries, 31*l.* 15*s.* for loss incurred by two Chinese servants, and 24*l.* 10*s.* for rent.

The details of the alleged losses incurred by the Mission, and so cheerfully paid by the Chinese, are curious; and they have this value, that whatever results this armed negotiation on behalf of the Martyrs of Yang-Chow may have on the spread of the Gospel in China, and whatever impression may be made on the intelligence of the disciples of the most ancient faiths of Bouddha and Confucius by this peculiar exhibition of the spirit and practice of living Christianity, the incident will do much to reassure those timid souls, the failing greengrocers and their wives and daughters, from whom such a body as the Inland Mission with its noble army of martyrs and female saints must have been recruited. Let them take courage, we say; not only shall not a hair of their head fall unavenged, but not a hair ornament of a she-missionary shall perish which shall not be paid for even to the uttermost farthing. In his plaintive and particular enumeration of the losses sustained by the Mission, and in his little bill for the same—we will not recall the contrast of St. Paul and his scourgings, stonings, and perils by the heathen, and the taking joyfully the spoiling of goods, knowing of that better and enduring substance—Mr. Taylor, Director of the China Inland Mission, sets down as a part of the indignities and losses endured by these servants of the Cross, "money taken from Miss Blakesley, and a pocket and hair ornament from Miss Desgraz." In the bill of costs Miss Desgraz's property destroyed is valued at 25*l.*, which, considering that the injury done to the house is appraised at only 14*l.* 10*s*, leads us to the conclusion that Miss Desgraz ought, as a lady missionary, to be rather grateful to the heathen robber who, in this somewhat emphatic way, must have reminded her of a certain apostolic counsel against that outward adorning of plaiting the hair and wearing of gold and of putting on of apparel. We make no doubt whatever that Miss Desgraz was adorned with all the inner adornment required by apostolic precept, but she found it, which the holy women of old did not, quite compatible with this valuable "pocket and hair ornament," priced and paid for at the modest figure of 124 dollars. Far be it from us, as it was far from the gallant Chinese, to inquire into the particulars of Miss Desgraz's "hair ornament," which sounds significantly like a chignon; but it was evidently a costly article, twice as valuable as a sacked house. A "concertina" and a "sedan chair" too are rather odd instances of what are, we believe, styled Instrumenta Ecclesiastica; but they show, not unsatisfactorily, that the arts and elegancies of civilization are not despised by the modern soldiers and daughters of the Christian regiment as necessities in preaching the Gospel. Minute political philosophers have traced French Revolutions and Thirty Years' Wars and the like to etiquettes violated, or tea-cup politenesses neglected, in the person of Queens or concubines, royal or otherwise. We shall begin to believe these authorities now that we have seen how nearly the British Empire was plunged into a war with an Empire of some hundred millions to avenge the Rape of the Chignon perpetrated on that fervent missionary Miss Desgraz, or on her "pocket and hair ornament."

DEBATE ON THE HABITUAL CRIMINALS BILL.

When a question of practical legislation comes before the House of Lords, it is debated with a clearness, thoroughness, and precision which it would be well for the House of Commons to imitate. The debate on the Habitual Criminals Bill was no exception to the general rule. The peers who took part in the discussion were neither as extreme partisans nor as rabid opponents of the Bill as would have been evoked by the same measure in the House of Commons. There was a preponderating inclination to support the principle of the Bill, but there was an entire absence of heat and passion in its favour. The convict and the ticket-of-leave man were not left without some one or two to say a timely word in their behalf. Those who were the most strenuous advocates of stringent measures spoke without any of that vindictiveness which sometimes alloys the best devised samples of criminal legislation: and those who deprecated the proposals of this measure did so, not on grounds of sentimental tenderness, but of legislative expediency.

The main points of exception were to the exclusion of certain misdemeanants from the operation of the measure, and to the hardship of the contemplated surveilliance. Lord Portman repeated in the House an objection which had been made out of the House, that the limitation of the proposed conditions [to convicted felons exempted a body of misdemeanants who were as criminal as any felons—the coiners and issuers of false money. It is quite an open question whether misdemeanants of this class may or may not be included in the provisions of the Bill. We rather incline to the notion that they may be, as they hitherto have been, safely excluded. The object of the Bill is to deal with that class of crimes which most endangers human life and inspires most wide-spread terror. Now that class consists much more of thieves, burglars, and garotters, than of coiners. From all that can be learned, coiners are mostly a distinct and exclusive band of criminals. They do not generally associate with the vulgar run of magsmen and cracksmen. They are for the most part—for the peculiar comfort of the Bishop of London—men of some education. This education has inspired them with æsthetical tastes, and with an equal distaste to the commoner forms of industry. They have cultivated a certain refinement, for the continued enjoyment of which Fortune has denied them the necessary conditions precedent. To adjust the balance and redress the injustice of Fortune, they employ the talents given by nature and the education given by Government to circulate monetary portraits of their sovereign, and live upon the confidence of her subjects. In all this there is no violence, no outrage on persons, nothing to inspire terror; none of those things which this Bill is specially intended to punish or prevent. At the same time it must be confessed that the continued impunity of any criminal class from restrictions which press upon other criminal classes is prejudicial to society. It acts as a direct encouragement to the crime in favour of which the exception is made. Therefore it may perhaps be decided that coiners and certain other misdemeanants ought to be included in the same category as felons.

With regard to the hardship of certain details in the provisions of the present Bill, two things must be borne in mind. The Bill is purposely and intentionally hard. Public justice and public suffering have called for hardship, not for lenity. There has been more than enough of lenity. The Bill now under consideration must be made as hard as it can be consistently with the feasibility of carrying it into effect. If its provisions are so severe that it cannot be executed, then it is both wise and just to mitigate their severity. Now we understand Lords Romilly, Shaftesbury, and Houghton to object to it as too hard. Lord Romilly, moreover, wishes to give to every apprehended convict or ticket-of-leave man the power of proving his probity on oath. This is, after all, not a great matter. If a notorious criminal had to purge himself before a magistrate, any number of oaths would not impose any restraint on his protestations or add to the credence of the magistrate. All that the latter could do in any case, he virtually can do now. He can put any questions to the prisoner, he can let him tell, or encourage him to tell his own story in his own way. An intelligent magistrate, familiar with petty and quarter sessions, will have no difficulty in coming to a just conclusion on the circumstances of the case and the prisoner's story. It is superfluous to complicate a plain situation with factitious inducements to perjury. As to the hardship and difficulty of exercising supervision, these are questions which must have been considered before the Bill was introduced. It is a Bill of supervision. If the notion of supervision is too revolting, let it be given up; but then the best part of the Bill must be given up too. Now, before this is done, the members of either House who oppose it should bear in mind that for the last six months the whole world has been c ying out for supervision. Supervision of old offenders and ticket-of-leave men has been the one thing pronounced absolutely indispensable. And with great justice. There is not one of the peers who is not a magistrate. Many of them are Chairmen of Quarter Sessions, and very admirable Chairmen too. None know more than they do the statistics of provincial crime. From what comes before themselves, and from all that happens at the assizes, they know that with a certain assignable ratio of prisoners crime is "not accidental, but a trade." They know that the men who reappear on charges of petty theft sessions after sessions are living on petty crime, and that they only disappear from the Sessions Court to reappear at the Assize Court on heavier charges. Naturally, necessarily, inevitably, crime is with a certain proportion of these men a trade, a profession, a subsistence. They cannot shake it off, even if they would. It sticks to them as tightly and indelibly as holy orders to English clergymen. There is not only the one question to be considered, in how many cases of convicted criminals does this occur; but also, the other question, how strong is the tendency to its occurrence? If only two per cent. of convicts were convicted a second time, and of these only one per cent. a third time, there would be good grounds for deprecating supervision. But notoriously the case is very different from this. Beyond the statistical fact lies another. Not only does a certain number (and that the greater number) of convicts relapse into crime, but the temptation is for all to relapse. There are old associates, difficult to shake off; old haunts, difficult to forego; there are new courses, difficult to take to; new occupations, difficult to obtain. Under all these difficulties, official supervision strikes us not as a hindrance or incumbrance, but as a help and stimulus to an honest life. All policemen are not inveterately malignant or incurably mischievous. An average policeman will more probably try to do a good turn to a man who is struggling to be honest than to thwart him. Even if the policeman's supervision were as harassing as convicts and the friends of convicts represent it to be, it would throw impediments on dishonest and criminal courses which would be equally beneficial to the criminal and the public. But notoriously there is and has been as yet no such supervision.

A memorandum issued by Colonel Henderson informs us that discharged prisoners who wish to abandon a life of crime have always had the assistance of the Prisoners' Aid Society, and that the police will continue to co-operate with this society in helping reformed convicts to get honest employment. The conjoint action of the police, the society, and the Central Registration Office will facilitate rather than obstruct the endeavours of the few who are reclaimed. On their behalf additional supervision is a safeguard and a shield. How weak and slight it now is for the restraint of notorious offenders we gather from recent letters in the Times, which reveal the license now enjoyed by the criminal profession, the impunity with which its members may meet and plan their little tactics of offensive war against society, and the liberty which is accorded to their oft-convicted hosts. Under the eyes of the existing law, men who have passed half their lives in going to prison and preparing themselves to go again, may freely assemble in hostelries kept by ex-convicts, may there mature their conspiracies against property and life, may issue forth in company to execute their purpose, without being subject to question, much more to arrest, by the police. Does Lord Houghton wish to see this state of things made permanent? In ten years we shall have 5,000 ticket-of-leave men at large. Of these the great bulk will honour the metropolis by making it their residence. The great bulk, too, will, by a necessary law of their being, remain thieves, burglars, and ruffians of some kind. Do Lords Houghton and Shaftesbury wish to see them enjoying the same immunity, and society exposed to the same dangers, as now inflict such scandal on our law? If they do not, why object to the only feasible suggestion hitherto made to obliterate the scandal, and give protection to the public?

If there were any sufficient grounds for believing that policemen would universally abuse their powers to harass and worry penitent ex-convicts, we would gladly assent to the suggestion that the duty of inspection should be taken out of the hands of the police and placed under a separate department. But two difficulties interpose themselves in the way of this arrangement. Who and how many are these penitent felons who dread the system of license, registration, and description? How many of those who have been convicted twice, and, à fortiori, of those who have been convicted thrice, are inclined to take to a course of honest diligence and industry? Does the number bear such a proportion to the aggregate of criminals that for their sake the provisions of the Bill should be modified? And, if we establish another department distinct from the police, will it not be liable to the objection that, while professing to work independently of that force, it would in reality be dependent on the aid of policemen for doing its work?

There was one suggestion thrown out by Lord Romilly which deserved more consideration than it received from the House. He proposed that the son of every convicted felon should be adopted by the State and educated by it. This naked proposition provoked laughter; and certainly it has its grotesque side. Hard economists could hardly refrain from laughing at the idea of lavishing the revenues of the State on the education of young felons while honest men's sons are forced to go without it. But there are other phases of the question than the ludicrous. What is to become—what actually does become—of these young gaol-birds, nestled in crime? Are they not, from the moment that they can walk and talk, proficients in the ancestral profession? Do they not follow the career and repeat the fate of their fathers? Do they not, too, disseminate a moral taint and corruption among the children of the neighbouring poor? Is it not one of the sharpest and most piteous of lamentations among the industrious poor, that their fate compels them to live in places where their children are necessarily infected by the language and example of vicious and criminal companions? It is hard, we admit, that a man should, by a life of habitual rascaldom, obtain for his children privileges which the families of the honest and industrious poor often fail to obtain. On the other hand, which is better for the State itself—that, wanting as it does soldiers, sailors, good colonists, it should appropriate these infant waifs and strays, manipulate them to its own purpose, and use them as its servants, or leave them, unnoticed and unaided, to work out their own fate, to perpetrate crime, go to gaol, and consummate their destiny on the gibbet, as their fathers did before them?

Whatever else may come of this and other debates, one thing is tolerably clear. The fons et origo of felony will be dammed, if not dried up. There will be no longer the wonted impunity for the marine-store dealer, the dishonest pawnbroker, the low beer-shop keeper, and other bankers of burglars and magsmen. The capitalists of crime will find their wings clipped. And roughs will no longer be able to maim policemen for life at the cost of one month's imprisonment. If the Bill fail on all other points, but succeed in these, there will be ample cause for rejoicing on the part of honest men. We only hope that Parliament will be bold enough to add flogging to the punishment proposed for the last-named offence.

OCEAN-RACING.

We are glad to learn that the youngest of our national sports is finding influential patrons. We think we have reason to congratulate ourselves on the very promising prospects of an amusement that is sure to recommend itself to a people who despise as tame everything that has not a dash of danger. It is much to be regretted that the match between the Cunard Royal Mail steamer Russia and the Inman Company's City of Paris did not come off a few weeks earlier. Had it only been reported when there was nothing in the papers but election trials, we should have had whole columns consecrated to what may one day be looked back on as an era in the sport for which we confidently predict a great future. As it is, the story of the race has unluckily met nothing like the attention it merited, and the public-spirited owners have been baulked of the tribute they so well deserved. We fear we cannot claim for England the original conception of the sport, although she has improved upon it and adapted it. We are but Anglicizing an American institution that was cradled and nursed on the broad grimy bosom of the father of waters. It was suggested perhaps to the early apostles of steam enterprise on the Mississippi by the vast distances that had to be hurried over, by the precarious tenure on which Western life was held, and by the scarcity of excitements in a half-settled country. With its violent currents, its sunken "snags," and its general perils, the Mississippi offered unusual advantages. The owners and captains had hit off the tastes of their customers, who so thoroughly entered into the spirit of the thing, that grave citizens took their seats on the safety valve, conjuring the captain to "rip" rather than be passed, while dollar-loving pork-dealers from Cincinnati heaped their choicest hams by armfuls on the furnaces. Unluckily the water privileges in our Lilliputian island are too limited to admit of our closely imitating a pleasure which the Americans have found so animating. Something we might perhaps do with our penny boats between Westminster and London Bridge, but the distances are almost too short to generate enough of either steam or excitement, and in the frequent stoppages and changes of passengers the races would be stripped of half their charm. But, if we have to content ourselves with outriggers on our rivers, the waters of the world are free to our ships. Ocean-racing becomes almost a matter of duty with the nation that aspires to the empire of the seas. If we encourage horse-races to improve the breed of our horses, it is clear that steam and ship races should be good to improve the different classes of our steamers and ships. Moreover, while horse-racing cannot be said to develop the physique of the jockey, and is supposed to be unpropitious to the morals of the hangers-on of the studs, ocean-racing must infallibly foster a wholesome indifference to danger in our crews, who will cherish behind teak or iron plates the spirit that used to animate our hearts of oak. In England individual enterprise generally shows the way to the Government departments. As yet ocean-racing is entirely in the hands of private firms, but we do not despair of seeing the day when the Admiralty shall regard itself as a sort of naval jockey club—a tribunal to manage the conditions of the racing, and to preside at the distribution of liberal prizes to the mercantile marine. The Americans and ourselves nearly monopolize the great ocean highways of the world, and there are our courses ready made. The races are run from point to point, and between these you leave the competitors absolutely to themselves. All that will devolve on the authorities is to see fair play at the start, and then wait in the hope that some or all of the vessels entered will turn up at the finish.

We trust that the strange immunity from accident which has hitherto attended the sport may be taken to be of good augury for it. A single catastrophe might have been apt to scare us back to caution, had it come before we were well warmed to our work. Men must gradually break themselves into familiarity with danger, and the novice who works his first day in a powder magazine in fear and trembling, comes in time to light a pipe in it, in contravention of the rules, and just after an explosion, with the most supreme indifference. Honour where honour is due; and the first promoters of ocean-racing were, we believe, the great houses in the tea trade. Of late years, season after season, the Taeping, the Ariel, the Fiery Cross—a dozen, more or less, of Aberdeen-built clippers—have been started together from the shores of China for the London Docks. Season after season, on completing their course half round the world, they have been towed into the docks within a very few hours of each other. The arrival of the earliest cargo of the year means actual money value to its fortunate owners and carriers, although that, we believe, counts for little in comparison with considerations of professional honour and rivalry. As is very natural, the captain throws himself heart and soul into the race. The crews do the same, for sailors are the most reckless of men; and, to say nothing of welcome relief from the monotony of a protracted voyage, the men would not be worth shipping if they let the danger outweigh the fun. The prudent owner hedges by insurances, and makes his book so safe that, while he may win heavily on his ship, in no contingency can he be out of pocket. What the underwriters think of it all is a mystery to us. Possibly they cover additional risks with increased premiums. On board we may be certain that in no case is there any timid shortening of sail. The ship is forced ahead, careening over almost to her scuppers, struggling along under every inch of canvass to her sky-scrapers. To say nothing of the chance of being struck of a heap by a squall, we may be very sure the men are not ordered aloft to take in sail until rashness is trembling on the brink of foolhardiness. Each moment makes lying out in the slippery yards more dangerous, as the gale goes blowing up into a hurricane. We have no doubt, however, that the sailors like it; and, after all, the risks of the China race are nothing to what their mates have every day to face nearer home in deck-laden Baltic boats and rotten coal-tubs. But now that the more spirited of the Atlantic Steam Companies have taken the hint, they seem determined to offer their passengers similar attractions, and to enliven the tedium of their voyage by making a perpetual race of it.

For a first attempt, the match from New York to Liverpool was exceedingly creditable. The two steamers, in a run of eight days and eighteen hours, finished almost neck and neck, the Russia landing herself a winner by five-and-twenty minutes. When either one or the other came so near to a victory, we may rely on it that we shall see a perceptible difference for the shorter next time they meet, and that, although, as we have seen it gravely asserted, "no risks are allowed to be run in racing," the respective captains will continue "to exercise every art of seamanship to ensure a triumph." The reputation of running the fleetest steamers is clear profit to a company whose customers are go-ahead Americans and busy Englishmen who have a sympathy with energy, and to whom time is money. A captain who, in his over-prudence, let himself be habitually beaten would soon be coldly looked on by his employers, and the ambition of being made a favourite in the Liverpool betting would of itself prevent him from blundering into excessive caution. Heavy bets were flying about on the race of the other day, and we may soon see the ocean odds quoted regularly in the sporting column of the Liverpool press. If you once educate your passengers to an enthusiastic identification of themselves with their ships, you get a solution of the problem which puzzles the stewards of suburban steeplechases—that of procuring the spectators the maximum of excitement by concentrating the dangers of the race under the grand stand. In a packet you are always sure to find yourself at the critical point, safe to witness any accident that is going, or to be in at the deaths, if there are any. From first to last the Transatlantic companies have a perfect course ready to their hands—nothing but "hazards" from beginning to end. You go racing speed through the fogs on the Newfoundland banks, boiling up defiantly an extra cloud of steam. You go driving fast in sleet and darkness through the icebergs, leaving yourself as little time as may be to profit by any warnings of the glass. If you run the gauntlet safely, good and well; but if you do have a collision at your top speed, of course your bows shiver like pasteboard, and down you go by the stem before you have time to lower a boat. Then the road you travel is covered thick with ships, which, it is to be trusted, will sooner or later take to following your example. It will be a marvel of luck if you thread the many racing pairs you may meet without a mishap, which may cost you the match, if it does not send you to the bottom. Running anything down when you get among the fleets of fishing-boats in the English or Irish seas is one of the unconsidered trifles that need count for little one way or other. A shock like that could scarcely make itself felt abaft the funnel. Surrounding them continually by danger in every conceivable form, you provide your passengers with constant subjects of conversation, and the time need never hang heavy upon their hands. The more timid, who are half frightened as well as pleased, may take to living in life-belts, like James of Scotland in his iron one; and cork jackets and crinolines will be advertised as travelling necessaries which no lady should be without. But for those adventurous persons who find vent for their love of excitement in the American voyage, the attractions offered by the rival companies will only be beginning when an accident happens in mid-ocean. Then comes the scramble for places in the boats. Some of them are sure to have been swamped in the launching, and there is only room for one half of the passengers. You have the overcrowding, the cold, and the wet; the shortening rations, dwindling into sheer starvation; the pangs of thirst, and all the sufferings that were brought home to us the other day by the survivors who came back out of the jaws of death when the Hibernia went down. The reflections of the castaways may be those of the steeplechase rider, who lies under his horse with a shattered collar-bone and a fractured thigh; but those who play at bowls must sometimes meet with rubbers. They may find comfort in the thought that it is the possibility of a fate like theirs that gives ocean-racing its zest to the multitudes of their fellow-travellers who are at that moment enjoying it. If you really have no weakness for incidents of this sort, don't take your passage in the steamers that court them.

Except under one of the paternal Governments that regulate everything down to the weather in which their subjects are to bathe, the lives of passengers are of course their own personal concern; their deaths so many commercial transactions, to be arranged between them and the steam and insurance companies. But then there are Her Majesty's mails. What we are half afraid of—although perhaps it is ridiculous to feel any anxiety in the matter—is that the authorities of the Post Office in a burst of energy and red-tapeism may step in and say, "When we subsidized you handsomely to carry our mail-bags, we never intended that you should expose them to wanton risks." Fancy if the managing partners of Rothschilds and Barings had a taste for sport, and were in the habit of matching the messengers who carry their correspondence in a daily race to St. Martin's-le-Grand through rain and darkness, cabs and carriages, knowing all the time that, if one of them were to come to grief, his valuable charge would be scattered to the mercy of winds and thieves. Mr. Dilke and Mr. Dixon's experiences of the care the American Government take of their Pacific mails show that the companies have little to fear from its interference. The chief drawback we see to ocean-racing is that, however favourite an amusement it may become, the enjoyment of it must be necessarily confined to the few. Some steerage passengers, and an occasional shipload of emigrants, may partake of it for once in their lives, but the bulk of the people must be content to read of it. The best chance for the masses seems to be, that our trains may come to follow in the wake of our steamships, and that the practice may be followed out generally on our competing lines of railway. If it is good at sea, there is no reason why it should not be adopted on land. The London and Chatham will race the South-Eastern from Dover to town. The suburban network of railways is extending itself fast, and we can imagine few things more thrilling than a couple of express trains shooting along on parallel lines, in derision of Parliamentaries, cross-traffic, and danger-signals. True, the risks would be little more real than those of racing at sea, but then they would be more obvious. All praise in the meantime to the Cunard and Inman lines. We would only suggest that in fairness they should warn the small craft whose business lies in the same seas to "clear the course," and then, if accidents do happen, it will be their own fault.

THE ENDOWED SCHOOLS BILL.

THE Ministry could not have given a better pledge of their desire to turn their Parliamentary strength to account than by introducing, within less than a year from the appearance of the Schools Commission Report, a measure which claims to embody the most important suggestions made by the Commissioners. Short as it is, the Bill is one of great interest, and Mr. Forster has judged wisely in bringing it in at the very beginning of the Session, and so securing ample time for the discussion of its provisions. Of these we shall now endeavour to give a summary, premising that the objects which it aims at are two—the reform of existing abuses in endowed schools, and the establishment of a new body under whose authority schools may in future be inspected and teachers examined.

About the importance and urgency of the first of these objects there can be no two opinions. The Report of the Commissioners has revealed a state of things equally surprising and disgraceful to the English people—wealthy schools without any scholars, large and growing populations without any schools, in some places lazy and incompetent masters, negligent trustees, bad methods of instruction, immense sums of money spent to no purpose. Such scandals undoubtedly call for stringent remedies. The Bill creates an executive Commission of three persons, who are to hold office for three years, and to receive full power to alter (by the schemes they are to frame) the trusts of existing foundations and the application of their revenues, to change the constitution of governing bodies, or create new bodies instead of those which now exist, and to transfer to the Queen in Council any visitatorial authority which may now be vested in any person or corporation. The details of the reforms to be introduced into the trusts are for the most part left to the discretion of the Commissioners (subject to the approval of the Privy Council and of Parliament), but in several points specific directions are given them respecting the regulations which the schemes framed by them are to contain. Thus every scheme is to provide for the dismissal, at pleasure, of the teachers of the endowed school to which it relates. In all schools which do not appear to the Commissioners to have been originally intended for, and still to belong to, a particular religious denomination, no scholar is henceforth to be required to attend any religious lesson or service to which his parent or next friend shall object in writing, no person shall be excluded from trusteeship on the ground of his religious opinions, and no person shall be ineligible as a teacher on the ground of his being a layman. Finally, if the Charity Commissioners shall certify to this Executive Temporary Commission that it is desirable to apply to education the whole or a part of a charity now devoted to some one of certain specified purposes—such as doles in money or kind, loans, the redemption of prisoners or captives, and the like—those charities may be dealt with by schemes drawn up by the Commission as if they were educational endowments.

The exercise of these powers is fenced round with restrictions which we proceed to describe. All existing vested interests are reserved; and the jurisdiction of the Commission is not to extend over any foundation less than thirty years old, nor over any school which is part of a Cathedral foundation, nor over any school or exhibition forming part of the foundation of a college (except with the consent of such college), nor over the schools dealt with by the Public Schools Act of 1868. Further, the schemes framed by the Commission have to run the gauntlet of the Privy Council and of lying on the table of the House before they can pass into law. When the draft of a scheme has been prepared, it is to be published and circulated in such a way as to give full notice of its contents to all persons interested, and copies are in particular to be sent to the governing body and the head master of the endowed school to which it relates. When two months have expired from the date of such publication, during which period objections and suggestions are to be sent in, the Commissioners are to reconsider the scheme, weighing such suggestions, and sending down, if they think fit, an Assistant-Commissioner, who shall hold a public inquiry in the place where the endowment in question is situated. They are then to settle the draft scheme, and submit it to the Committee of the Privy Council on Education. Then another period of two months follows, during which petitions may be presented to the Queen in Council by the governing body of the endowment, or any person interested therein, praying Her Majesty to disapprove of the scheme, or of any part thereof. When a petition is presented, the Privy Council are to take it into consideration, admitting, if they think fit, counsel to be heard on both sides; and, if any valid objections are raised to the scheme, they are to remit it to the Commissioners to be amended. If no petition is presented, or if the Privy Council disallow the prayer of the petitioners, the scheme is to be laid before Parliament. Forty days are to be allowed, during which an address may be presented to the Crown by either House against the scheme or any part of it; and if within these forty days no address is presented, the scheme may be finally approved by an Order in Council, and will then become legally binding. In this way it is proposed to give security for the protection of all interests affected, and for the expression of the views and wishes of all persons who can claim a right to be heard.

All this machinery, it will be understood, is temporary and provisional. The permanent body which the Bill proposes to create is altogether distinct from the Executive Commission, and will have its action confined within much narrower limits. It is to be called the Educational Council for England and Wales, and is to consist of twelve members—six named by the Queen, with the advice of the Privy Council, and the rest elected by the Universities of Oxford, Cambridge, and London, two by each University. This Council is to provide for the examination of teachers, granting certificates of competence to those who pass, and entering their names in a public registry; and is also to organize and superintend a system of examination for the scholars in all endowed schools, and in those private schools which choose voluntarily to present their scholars to be examined, and to submit to the rules which the Council may frame.

As respects the general object of the Bill, and the propriety of legislating on the matter, every one is agreed; nor can there be much doubt that the reform of our educational endowments, and their adaptation to the needs of the time, must be carried out by an Executive Commission acting in the direction indicated by the Bill. But the exact character of this Commission and the nature of its powers are of course points upon which difference of opinion must be expected. So much will turn not only upon the ability and diligence of the persons appointed to serve as Commissioners, but also on their temper and fairness of mind, that we think these persons ought to be named in the Bill; and, moreover, it will be desirable to have their number increased from three to five or six at least, so as to provide for a careful consideration, by differently constituted minds, of the perplexing educational questions they will have to deal with. As to the extent of the powers to be allowed them, that is a question to be settled by inquiring how far the schools can be expected to reform themselves without extraneous guidance and suggestion, and how far it will be necessary to give them a stimulus from without. The truth seems to be that local trustees are seldom averse to reform when the reform is put before them in a judicious and amicable way; and therefore we do not anticipate that the Commission will experience much opposition if it approaches the local bodies in a conciliatory spirit. On the other hand, these bodies are often so inert and so uninstructed, so little aware of what a school ought to be and how its endowments should be used, that little can be hoped for from them in the way of origination. Hence it will be needful to give the Commission adequate powers of modifying trusts and drafting schemes, while at the same time the exercise of these powers must be subject to a strict and impartial review by the Privy Council. That this review may be more than a form, that it may inspire confidence in the public and give full opportunity for the discussion of points where the Commission is at issue with the local bodies, some further provisions ought to be introduced into the Bill, defining more exactly the procedure in these matters before the Privy Council, and specifying the composition of the Council when it meets to hear appeals from the Commission. At present we find nothing to show that the tribunal of review will be competent to deal with questions requiring, as these questions do, a great deal of experience and special knowledge. Moreover, the Bill fails to prescribe any means by which endowed schools, once reformed, shall be kept from again lapsing into abuses. The evidence published in the Report of the Schools Inquiry Commissioners established conclusively three propositions—that the Court of Chancery is utterly unfitted, by constitution and character, to deal with endowed schools; that the Charity Commission has neither wide enough powers nor a large enough staff to superintend their management; and that it is most important, in organizing and directing these schools, to treat them not individually but collectively, looking upon each as a part and member of a great whole. Now the Bill, if we understand it rightly, does not propose either permanently to curtail the jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery, or to increase that of the Charity Commission, or to call into being any new permanent body with powers equal to the work to be done. The Education Council, it is true, will act as a check on bad schools by exposing their defects, and its examinations will in course of time clear away the race of grossly incompetent masters. But it will have no power to interfere with the actual working of endowments, and so far as appears, the schools, once recast by the temporary Commission, will thenceforward be left to their own devices, and to the good pleasure of the local governing bodies. Two or three other points in the Bill which strike us as blemishes are of less consequence. The period of three years allowed to the Temporary Executive Commission will be found scarcely long enough for the heavy task before it. The exemption from the authority of that Commission of non-classical endowed schools receiving Government grants will prevent it from dealing with a set of foundations whose number, if not their wealth, makes them very important, and which are, in many instances, exceedingly ill administered. And it may be doubted whether the provision that all head-masters of endowed schools shall be henceforth dismissible at the pleasure of the local governing body, without any appeal to some external authority, may not prove objectionable in practice. Where a governing body is under the control of public opinion, as is the case in large and important schools, there need be no fear of its acting hastily, or from motives of personal spite; but with small foundations in country towns it is quite otherwise, and many a good teacher would refuse to place himself absolutely at the mercy of the trustees by whom such foundations are administered. In the case also of graduates in honours, a good degree might well stand in place of a certificate as a qualification for a mastership; a good classman may well feel repugnance to seeking a recognition of proficiency from a Board in London.

These and other matters of detail will have to be carefully considered when the Bill goes into Committee, and it may be hoped that no difference of opinion upon such matters will prevent the friends of education from uniting in the endeavour to secure a sound and effectual reform of middle-class education. To those who complain that the present Bill does not contain all that could be wished, we would say that, however desirable it may be to create an organization for the superintendence of endowments and of public education generally—such as was recommended by the late Commission—the enterprise is one of too much importance to be entered upon hurriedly, and may possibly be better undertaken when the discussions of the next two or three years have shown us what precise form such an organization ought to take. Meantime, any reforms which may be successfully carried out by means of a temporary Commission will be so much clear gain. If those who are entrusted with the work are men not only of administrative talent, but of open and unbiassed minds, men wise enough not to seek to impose one type upon all schools, and bold enough to be deterred by no opposition of influential local people from proposing in their schemes whatever the interest of the bulk of the inhabitants requires, they may succeed not only in vivifying the existing foundations and greatly raising the tone of their instruction, but also in evoking a public interest in education which is now sadly wanting, and without which the best-organized system of public schools must languish. Should the work, however, unhappily fall into the hands of doctrinaires and men of one idea, the result of their labours would be general discontent, and a fatal discouragement to all that private zeal has hitherto achieved, under many difficulties, for the improvement of middle-class education. Let us add, that in a case like this there is really no conflict of interests. The interest of the whole nation, and of every class in it, is to have a good education provided, and public charitable funds administered in the most economical and most generally useful way; and the only question which Parliament has to discuss is as to the best means of attaining that object.

KING COLE'S PARLIAMENT.

A CURIOUS example of the imperium in imperio has been lately exhibited in the metropolis, at no great distance from the spot where the older Estates of the Realm hold their deliberations. An assembly which, according to Sir Charles Trevelyan, has been irreverently styled "King Cole's Parliament," was convened in the hall of the Society of Arts, to deliberate on army reform, and to hear Mr. Henry Cole deliver his ideas thereon. It may be thought by some that the subject scarcely lay within the province of a Society whose business is the promotion of the arts of peace, and that the potentate to whose mild sway in his own dominions we cheerfully submit could scarcely claim to treat the topic with authority. But that is a point on which there may be differences of opinion, and in answer to some such objection, Mr. Edwin Chadwick, one of the debaters, explained how great is the blessing conferred on the army when civilians will kindly undertake the management of its affairs, and how utterly incompetent military men are to manage those affairs for themselves. It must be held, therefore, that the officers present, some of them of high rank and considerable experience, enjoyed unusual advantages in being lectured on the subject of their profession by a gentleman whose military opinions have been ripened in the unwarlike atmosphere of the South Kensington Museum, and in listening afterwards to a discussion on the same, in which several gentlemen took part whose qualifications, judged from the Chadwickian point of view, were no less exalted than Mr. Cole's. Now, though we are very far indeed from asserting that civilians may not with great propriety and benefit to the public service interest themselves in military affairs, yet we do assert that nobody who listened to the discussion was likely to be rendered more desirous than before of entrusting the destinies of the army to the gentlemen who took part in the debate. The army has suffered many things of many men, but we can imagine no greater crowning misfortune that could befall it than to have its affairs regulated by Messrs. Cole, Chadwick, and their compeers; and we fear that we should continue in that belief, even though they could produce testimonials of their fitness from Mr. John Stuart Mill. We fully admit that a great deal was said which deserved consideration. Many projects were descanted on, many changes advocated, which we should be glad to see submitted to a fair trial. Much, both of objection and suggested improvement, that was uttered, was true; but what was true was not new, and we might even go the whole length of the epigram, and say that what was new was not true. Whatever was urged which was judicious and sound and practical has been long before the public, and originated, not with the speakers who uttered it, but with those military men whom they pronounced incompetent to manage their own affairs. For proof of this we appeal to the blue-books containing evidence given before Commissions on military questions; to the great changes made in foreign armies, under the administration of eminent soldiers, from which most of our new ideas on organization have been derived; and to writings in the press, in which experienced officers have borne a full part.

Considering that all which a volunteer reformer generally seems to think necessary for setting up in business is a turn for objecting, and a full belief in his own infallibility, Mr. Cole may be pronounced a fair, and even a favourable, specimen of the class, for he joins to the ordinary qualifications a good deal of cleverness. Of the degree of research and inquiry with which he prepared himself for his task, he gives us a lively idea when he says:—

> I will venture to say that the cost of the Indian army, be it little or much, ought not to be charged upon the tax-payer of this country, but should be supported by India, whatever the cost may be.

There is something to admire in the boldness of the man who, knowing no better than that the cost of the Indian army is supported by the British tax-payer, undertakes to lecture an intelligent audience, including Indian officers, on the subject of army organization. Describing our army as he believes it to be, he says that it is not only very expensive, but very bad of its kind. The men are "the outcasts and roughs of the people," and the officers know nothing of their profession, giving one hour of the day to duty and the other twenty-three to idleness and dissipation. Now on these points we venture to differ very decidedly from Mr. Cole. Considering what our army is, and what it does, we think the country has a very cheap bargain in it so far as the troops are concerned, and it is a perpetual marvel that officers and men should be found for the money to do the work, and to do it so well. The comparison which he draws and seems to think so effective, in respect of expense, between our own army and those of foreign Powers, is altogether beside the question, because the conditions are totally different. They have conscription, and no colonial empire; we have vast colonial possessions to garrison, and we must get our recruits by competition in the labour market. And there is this to be said of our Army Estimates, that large as they are they let us know the worst—there is nothing behind; whereas in France or Prussia there is a vast untold, unestimated item of lost industry in the background. Every landowner and employer of labour, every artisan and peasant whose industrial enterprises or pursuits are interrupted by "the tax of blood," could bring his item of loss to swell the total; and if these could be turned into figures we might find that, even in expense, our army could compare not unfavourably with those of the Continent. Not only does Mr. Cole think our army dear and bad, but the existence of any standing army at all is, he tells us, on the authority of "old Judge Blackstone," an offence against the laws of the land; and this he insisted on so much, that his hearers were left to infer that the two sentries in Whitehall are formidable engines of tyranny, and that every time the guard is relieved at St. James's an outrage is committed on the British Constitution.

But Mr. Cole is not merely an objector—he can build up as well as pull down, and he has his remedial measures ready; the first of which is, it seems, that the expenditure of the army is to be placed under his control, a matter which he is quite ready to undertake at a moment's notice, as no doubt he would be to assume any other important function of the State. His first operation is to be a very decided exertion of economy, and is to consist in at once reducing the annual cost of the army by seven millions. "I assert," says the lecturer, dogmatically, and somewhat illogically, "that at least half is an unnecessary expenditure, and therefore a tax upon industry." Why the necessary half of the expenditure is not, equally with the other, a tax upon industry he does not explain. Such a diminution of revenue implies a corresponding reduction of the forces. "I have been assured," says Mr. Cole, "that the best number for a corps d'armée is about 16,000 men. . . I believe one such real corps d'armée would suffice as a model for the United Kingdom." On these grounds, then, of Mr. Cole's assurance and belief, we have the numbers of our future army fixed with exactitude; and as 16,000 men is certainly a small number with which to confront the hosts of the Continent, even granting that "upon one pair of English legs do march three Frenchmen," Mr. Cole is ready to supplement them with an army of reserve. This is the most romantic and picturesque part of the whole scheme. The entire youth of the country are to be trained to arms. Fond of their warlike calling, and perfectly skilled in it, they will be, Mr. Cole tells us, the surest friends of peace; and thus every man will do his own soldiering at a cost of next to nothing to the country. And not only will the youth be trained, but at every infant school in the kingdom drill is to be a branch of education; an idea which so kindled Mr. Chadwick's enthusiasm, that he went further in the same direction than Mr. Cole, fixing on five years old as the proper age for a recruit, who at ten is to be discharged from the service as an accomplished veteran. Such were some of the features of a scheme set forth airily and agreeably by Mr. Cole, without, as he says, pledging himself to precise details. In fact, the great defect of the lecture, next to total unacquaintance with the subject, was the absence of those particulars which impertinent practical people will insist upon having, and which are the bane of great projectors. On the whole, the unfortunate result on the mind is to create an uncomfortable doubt whether a man who can deal thus imaginatively with one subject can be prosaically sound upon any other, and whether the cloud-capt towers of the South Kensington Museum itself may not turn out to be the baseless fabric of a vision which will some day dissolve and leave not a wrack behind.

When the field was left free, several debaters entered it, and expatiated therein on plans and views of their own, which had not always a very perceptible relation to the matter in hand; and Sir Charles Trevelyan, with characteristic zeal in the cause, availed himself of the opportunity to speak several times at considerable length, and to read the greater part of his own pamphlet—a process which the audience did not submit to without frequent, though ineffectual, remonstrance. Mr. Chadwick insisted that professional soldiers were far surpassed in their own business by clergymen, and quoted several divines as the authors of improvements in war; after which he took a somewhat discursive flight into the middle ages and expatiated on the method of training men to the use of bows and arrows. Everybody had his fling at our military system, but nobody said, as might have been said, that, after all, its defects must be mainly due to civilians, who have had almost the entire control of its administration. This must be obvious to anybody who considers for a moment how the affairs of the army are managed. At the head of it is placed a gentleman who has generally distinguished himself in some other career, but who, it is no scandal to say, knows nothing of military matters, so that the officials of the War Office may be presumed to be largely occupied with what Mr. Lowe calls "educating their masters." But the Minister by no means enters on his duties without ideas to guide him. He always brings with him a strong desire to distinguish his administration by some great reform, and an equally strong desire to cut down the expenses of the army to meet the exigencies of the Budget. Putting together the three elements of desire to effect reform, desire to economize, and ignorance of the subject, we certainly have the elements of considerable mischief. Then, in the House, there is no subject which calls forth a less creditable display of information and ability than a military question, and the inefficiency with which the army is represented in Parliament is a calamity to it and to the country. Out of doors public opinion is largely influenced by those who can lend it only a dubious enlightenment; volunteer statesmen out of employ, pamphleteers without a subject, and stump orators without a stump, all turn to the army as their natural topic. Seeing then the share which such influences have had in moulding our military system, it may be matter of wonder that it is so good as we find it, and that, through all vicissitudes, it has continued to supply us with troops who command the respect at least of their enemies.

Our readers will be in no danger of supposing that we are desirous of representing our military organization as faultless. Nowhere has the expediency of comprehensive reforms in the army been more strongly insisted on than in these columns. A short term of service, the latter part of which is to be passed in the reserve—separate colonial troops—localization of corps—with their consequences of abolition of pensions and increased pay, of obviating all the evils which soldiers' marriages entail, and of attracting a superior class of recruits—these are matters which we have often dilated on, setting them forth with some detail, and supporting them by argument till they took shape as a coherent and practicable system. It is with great satisfaction that we see the thoughts of the country inclining the same way; and as it can scarcely be expected that a War Minister, new to his office, would set about comprehensive schemes of change unless strongly supported, we are glad to find that the subject is earnestly pressed on his attention. Parliament, people, and press must all unite to carry any such measures as those we have indicated. But we are unable to see what possible good can result from such discussions as that which Mr. Cole has invited. It was evident that he was no more entitled to lecture on military reform than any other gentleman who reads the newspapers. The discussion that ensued (except so far as that was repeated which had been often and better said elsewhere) was merely a field for the airing of crotchets and the remorseless riding of hobbies. When we consider what the institution is that these gentlemen are trying their prentice hands on, and how nearly the honour and safety of England are concerned in its efficiency, it is evident that such empirical attempts at reform are not merely a farce, but a mischievous and dangerous farce. Let us urge reform, by all means, since it is so manifestly needed, but let us see that it is committed to fully competent hands. The whole Continent is just now bristling with arms; we know not how soon we may be called on to enter the arena. Let us take care that we do not in that case grasp a weapon which will break in our hand from having been ignorantly tampered with.

RATING AND ASSESSMENT.

THE Compound Householder may be compared to that hospital patient who disregarded the predictions of the doctor, and declined to die until God pleased. He was killed entirely in 1867, and now he is more alive than ever. The House of Commons grew weary of his name, and decreed that he should be obliterated and extinguished, and behold here he is again! He heard sentence of death pronounced upon himself, and yet he no more intended to die than did the gentleman who threatened the directors of the company in which he insured his life that if they did not settle promptly with his executors he would shoot the lot of them. But it is considered decorous in the House of Commons to speak of him as our late lamented friend, and although his vitality is irrepressible, it is hoped that, out of regard to the delicate susceptibility of Conservatives, he will consent to disguise his person and change his name.

The personal payment of rates, as we all remember, was proposed by Mr. Disraeli as a test of fitness for the franchise. Glowing descriptions were given in the House of Commons of the moral and intellectual qualities which would be developed in small householders by imposing on them the liability to pay rates. We regret to state that in the district of Bethnal Green this liability appears to have developed, in those subject to it, a tendency towards the use of profane oaths. According to a witness who appeared before Mr. Ayrton's Committee of last Session, a man who has paid his rate finds that his neighbour has not paid, "and he meets the collector with the imprecation that he will see him damned before he pays again." It is, however, stated by other witnesses that the virtues which Mr. Disraeli led us to expect have actually been produced in several boroughs. We find, among the proceedings of the Committee, that a draft report was prepared by Sir Michael Hicks Beach, who with dutiful allegiance to the leader of the Conservative party proposed that the Committee should report itself to be convinced "of the importance of the social advantages likely to result from personal assessment." The Committee, however, declined to go this length, although a witness from Hulme, near Manchester, assured them that very great social benefit had resulted from making people pay their rates in person. They are now being taught a lesson that will be very salutary to them in future. The witness could perceive a very great benefit already, and, considering that he was speaking within seven months after the Act came into operation, we must conclude that the inhabitants of Hulme, near Manchester, possess a capacity for social improvement, and for turning disagreeable incidents into moral lessons, which must inspire all right-minded beholders with admiring confidence in the destiny of Lancashire. In Bethnal Green they curse and swear, for 'tis their nature to; but the visits of the rate-collector produce in Hulme only "the habit of saving, and of preparing for payments at short intervals." Indeed the faculty of Lancashire for ethical development is positively marvellous, for while one set of witnesses tells us that the character of its people is improved by having to pay rates, another set of witnesses tells us that the same result arises from having rates paid for them. A witness from Liverpool thinks that the practice of compounding "has a tendency rather to elevate the tenant." He is conscious then that the demands made upon him have been met, and he occupies his social status as though he had paid in full. This evidence was given with perfect gravity, and was not intended, as might be supposed, as a burlesque of the evidence given on the other side. The same witness described the pitiable position of the magistrates at Liverpool, surrounded by a crowd of women who had come to answer the summonses issued against their husbands for non-payment of rates. We cannot help wishing that the leaders of the Conservative party could have taken a week's turn of the duty of these magistrates in hearing summonses. Their desire for the inculcation of moral lessons would, we think, have been considerably mitigated. It surely was a wonderful caprice of Mr. Disraeli to meddle with this system of compounding. It was, as everybody knows, optional; and if in any place moral improvement was preferred to convenience, the system could be avoided, and rates could be exacted from all tenants. But the system was adopted very widely, and it had the sanction of the late Sir George C. Lewis when he was at the head of the Poor Law Commission. It is perhaps surprising that, in disregard of this high authority, as well as of the outcry which arose upon the abolition of compounding, Mr. Ayrton's Committee reported against the system. They stated the clear result of the evidence taken before them to be that, as a general rule, parishes were likely to benefit in a financial point of view by the abolition of composition. It appears, however, that at Birmingham and some other places this financial benefit has been counterbalanced by grievous hardships inflicted and loud complaint excited by the change of system. But it is nevertheless true that if the recommendations of the Committee were adopted to their full extent, composition might be abolished with general advantage.

The Committee propose that all local rates should be assessed on the same basis and collected by the same hand, and that the collections should be made at frequent intervals. The weekly tenant might without inconvenience pay his rates monthly, and the expense of frequent collection would be compensated by the employment of the same collector for all rates. Mr. Goschen has partially adopted this idea in the Bill which he has brought into the House of Commons. He proposes that the overseers shall not be entitled to collect more than a quarter's rate from weekly tenants, and that such tenants shall not be required to pay more of the rates than will be covered by two weeks' rent. He also proposes that such tenants shall be allowed to deduct the rate they pay from the rent due, or accruing due, to their landlords. Thus the Reform Act is not to be touched. The controversy of 1867 is not to be re-opened. Weekly tenants are to be rated, and to be liable to pay the rates. But then they may deduct the payment from their rent. This is in effect, however it may be disguised in words, a transfer of the liability for rates from the tenant to the landlord, and thus one-half of the system of compounding is to be restored. But then it will be said that the owner of property let by the week is subjected to a liability from which the owner of other property is exempt. Mr. Goschen admits that there is some force in this argument, because such a landlord might have to pay rates for property that was not let during the whole of the period for which the rate extended. As a fresh charge would be placed on a certain kind of property, the Bill would propose that that circumstance should be taken into account in determining the rateable value of that kind of property. Here we seem to get the other half of the system of compounding; for whether you rate high and then make a deduction, or whether you rate low in the first instance, comes practically to the same thing. We do not know, nor do we care, what will become, under Mr. Goschen's proposal, of the moral improvement of weekly tenants, and perhaps it would be well that that figment of Mr. Disraeli's brain, having served its purpose, should be forgotten. If only it could be agreed that the assessment and collection of rates should be regarded purely as an economical subject, there might be some hope of attaining to a rational and intelligible system. But the determination to treat this subject from a political point of view threatens to involve it in inextricable confusion. It is not our present purpose to express any opinion upon the political value of what are called the rate-paying clauses of the Reform Act; but, for the sake of simplicity of legislation, it would be desirable to make a clean sweep of them, or else to adopt the recommendations of Mr. Ayrton's Committee to nearly their full extent.

The first operation in local taxation is to ascertain the property which is to be the subject of rating, and the value which is to be set upon it. This operation is now generally performed by Assessment Committees of Boards of Guardians. The valuation rolls prepared by these Committees are only applicable to the assessment of poor-rate, but it has been proposed to make the same rolls applicable for all purposes of local rating and taxation. The authorities by which rates are imposed are many and various, and the greatest diversity of procedure exists among them. There is not any certain time for which rates are to be assessed. In some parishes they are made yearly, in others half-yearly, thrice yearly, and quarterly. Rates for different purposes are made at different periods. In some places one collector collects several rates. In other places several collectors are employed. It is suggested that one consolidated rate should be imposed to answer all charges for a year. The officers employed to collect this rate might also be employed to collect the assessed taxes and the income-tax. The power of excusing persons from payment of rates should be transferred from magistrates and overseers to Boards of Guardians, and the owner of every tenement the occupier of which has been excused payment of rates on the ground of poverty should be liable to two-thirds of the rate. The foregoing are the principal recommendations of Mr. Ayrton's Committee, and, without adopting them entirely, we may say that they propose a system which would suffice to lay for ever the ghost of the compounder. But the result of the passing of Mr. Goschen's Bill will be, not a system, but confusion. However, it may suffice for the present year, and further experience will decide whether it will be possible permanently to abolish composition. There is no doubt that even in places where the loudest outcry has been raised, the produce of rates collected since the passing of the Reform Act has been greater than it was before. It may, indeed, be said that the collection of these rates has caused more misery than it has relieved; and certainly it would not be possible to persevere in a system which involved the periodical summoning of many thousands of ratepayers before magistrates. The system of compounding was not perfect, but it would have very well borne letting alone.

MADAME RACHEL AGAIN.

WE had—shall we own it?—from the first, rather a sneaking liking to the woman Levison, who was pleased to call herself Madame Rachel. Supremacy in anything subdues, and there was such a perfection in the matchless and superb impudence of the purveyor of the Beautiful for Ever that there was no resisting her. She had taken her measure of human kind—that is, of female kind, for we remember the American authority which denies even the humanity of woman—and as she meant to succeed she succeeded. Surely to have the dash and go in her to announce the Cosmetic Water distilled from magnetic rocks in the Great Sahara, and brought fresh every morning on swift dromedaries by special arrangement with the Emperor of Morocco, and to price it at two guineas a bottle, and to sell it too, showed no common mind. And then she really was ill-used. If we believe in the Recorder's law, she ought never to have been found guilty of the offence of which she was convicted, and which she is now expiating, how many soever were the sins against society in general, or Mrs. Borrodaile in particular, which Mrs. Levison may have committed. And then since she has been down she has struggled and screamed as loud as Prometheus, and with as good a will. She has tried for a new trial, or rather she has got hold of a view, and there may be something in it, that the judge who convicted her, Mr. Commissioner Kerr, was either no judge, or pro tanto no judge, or that the Court presided over by Mr. Commissioner Kerr was not duly or sufficiently constituted. Anyhow, she has tried a good many dodges since her conviction, including, among others, an action against her attorney for mismanaging her affairs, or appropriating or misappropriating her assets. In other words, she has contrived to let us know that she was not only alive, but kicking.

Madame Rachel's last move is characteristic. She is going to sell off her furniture and effects. This again shows how well she is up to the heights, or depths, of our human folly. Nothing so pleases that particular class of folk in which she has found what we should call her dupes, and Levison herself would call her patronesses, as an auction, and a little personal memorial of, or proximity to, what is just verging on, or has nearly stumbled over, the bounds of the strictest propriety. Advertise the elegant furniture and chaste effects of some St. John's Wood villa, and let it be generally circulated that there are on view the belongings of somebody's cast-off mistress, or the broken-down Nancy Dawson of the day, and the poor creature's traps and gilt trinkets are sure to be sold for twice their weight in solid gold twice refined, and maid and matron will squabble, or at any rate bid against each other, for the very dubious honour of possessing a vulgar Aspasia's combs and brushes. Madame Rachel's sale will answer; at any rate the catalogue is characteristic, and almost worth the shilling which—for we are much as silly in these matters as other folk—we were actually fools enough to give for it. When we sent for it from the respectable auctioneer, the messenger had to wait two hours for it till it was duly scented; and thus, reeking with patchouli or vitiver, or whatever the fragrance or frowziness is, there is the inventory of the contents of No. 50 Maddox Street to be had by anybody else who is equally flush with shillings and folly. We must own to some disappointment with the contents of the "Private Residence." Like some other curious persons who are said to have ordered what they hoped to find spicy literature, as they call it, and received a packet of dull tracts, so we. Mrs. Sarah Levison, from something we remember of her trial, used to deal in china as well as Arabian and other waters—at least Lord Ranelagh spoke of buying some crockery of her; and her house—or at any rate this sale—seems to be made up of china plates and Indian bronzes. These very ordinary items exhaust the list of this curious woman's collection, or stock in trade. If people are prepared to accept the authenticity of "a rare ebony Indian table, inlaid with silver and buhl, and presented by Nana Sahib to the King of Delhi," or a "handsome fire-screen, describing the acts of Garibaldi, presented by his daughter to Madame Rachel," or sundry other souvenirs from Lady Blessington, Count D'Orsay, Madame Soyer, and the present French Emperor, they may do it on the same guarantee which satisfied the buyers of the Circassian gums, magnetic rock-dew, and Jordan water. There is a good deal of wine to be sold, and we are rather surprised that, as there is a sale at all, there is not a good deal more to be sold. One thing is rather, if not very, curious; we mean the sort of books which we are expected to believe occupied Levison's hours of lettered and studious leisure. Among the contents of "Madame Rachel's library" we find—besides forty-two French novels, the genuine possessorship of which no one will be disposed to dispute—Mill on Liberty; Xenophon's Opera; Colenso on the Pentatruch; Thucydias, 2 vols.; Molière's Ouvres; Rant's Critique of Reason; Keble's Christian Year; Compte's Philosophie Positive; and Butler's Analogy. We preserve the spelling. Either the story that Levison could not read or write is not true, or the purchasers who are going to give long prices for genuine memorials of this notorious woman are as abounding in faith as the customers of the Arabian Perfumer to the Queen and the Royal Courts of Europe; or—which is the more charitable conclusion—we have misunderstood our Rachel all along. The world knows not of its greatest men. The choicest saints are hidden. Far from spending a worthless life on essences, grease-pots, and enamels, Levison was, if we are to judge from her favourite authors, a hard student. Her lamp at midnight hour was not burning philtres and love potions, but was out-watching the Bear with Butler's Analogy, and unsphering the spirit of Immanuël Kant—whom the auctioneer calls Rant—unfolding the mysteries of Auguste Comte, and studying, and we dare say refuting from her own Hebrew standpoint, the maligner of the Pentateuch. The Rachel Library opens up quite a new view of our old friend's character. Anyhow, we congratulate Madame Rachel that in her sorrowful estate she has still sufficient reliance on herself and on the British public to venture on this extremely audacious and, in its way, amusing venture for notoriety, and, which is much more to the purpose, solid pudding. We always said that she would make no bad thing of her collapse; and we wish her sale, what it is sure to find, all success.

REVIEWS.

GUICCIARDINI.*

(Second Notice.)

GUICCIARDINI began and ended as an historian. His first youthful work—unpublished till the other day, when it was printed from his autograph in the archives of his family—was an unfinished History of Florence under the "tyranny" (in the old Greek sense) of the first Medici, then under the restored popular government, down to the first great blow struck by the League of Cambrai at the battle of Agnadello or Ghiaradadda—a history in part of his own times, and a remarkable effort for a youth of twenty-five. His last employment, on which death found him still intent, was the great History of Italy by which his name is chiefly known. But active public business, not literature, was what he set before himself as his aim, and what was, in fact, the main occupation of his life. He was not an observer looking on at a distance, to whom to be occasionally conversant with the details and responsibilities of action is a novel and curious change to his ordinary habits. He wrote a great deal, and was fully conscious of his qualifications as a writer; but the object and purpose of his life was not to write and record and pass judgment on what was going on, but to play a leading and important part in it. He and, like him, Machiavelli, were writers because they were ambitious and practical politicians, and they wrote out of the abundance of their very real and varied experience. His first literary attempt, his fragment of Florentine history, was probably intended, in part at least, for a practical end. The young advocate, who was diligently training himself, in the exercise of his profession and of the various civil functions which attended it, for the public career on which he had set his mind, and who had shocked his cautious father by laying a foundation for it in a marriage alliance with one of the most powerful houses of Florence, used his time of comparative waiting and leisure, before the stress of real work came upon him, in reviewing the circumstances amidst which he had to begin to act; in tracing back recent events and changes, as far as they were connected with the emergencies of to-day, and practically affected them; in collecting distinctly before his own mind the best judgments he could make about the men, some lately dead, some still alive, who had shaped the present with which he would soon have to do; in clearing and fixing his thoughts as to the tendencies which he saw at work, the dangers and obstacles that were either inherent in things or the legacy of past mistakes, and what in them was inevitable and insuperable, what admitted of resistance or remedy; the conditions which a citizen of Florence, desirous of her welfare and greatness, must take account of, in the state of the world in which he found himself, and the principles on which he might most wisely and hopefully deal with them.

But, with whatever view written, the sketch is the most interesting account which we have of perhaps the most interesting crisis in the history of Florence; the crisis which determined the fate of free and rightful government, and the chances of political improvement in Italy for three centuries to come. The seeds and germs of t were in the city of Florence alone; there only men had the intellect to imagine it, and the head and spirit to aspire after it, in however imperfect a manner. In that republic alone, perhaps, on the Continent, the idea survived and was seriously entertained, that government is for the governed, and should be, to secure this, by the governed. And the struggle at Florence in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries was to ascertain whether this was practicable. The verdict of events was against it. The power of the world, in vast and overwhelming and accumulating forces, was in the hands of those whose only notion of government was that it is for the advancement, the pleasure, the glory of those who could get hold of it. To an Emperor of the Romans, to a Vicar of Christ, to a King of France or of Spain, and to those who served them, the political ideas which prevailed at Florence seemed simply the height of impertinent and ridiculous childishness; and in the terrible shocks of war among these mighty and ruthless Powers, these ideas were crushed and perished. But the chimerical ideas which were current with the multitude in Florence, and which interested its public men, are now in substance the ideas of civilized society. With all their gross faults, and their incredible and grotesque blunderings, and with all their fruitless and tragic efforts to accomplish the impossible, Florence and Venice—alas, hating and jealous of one another—were spots in a world of selfish fraud and brute force in which public spirit really lived, and in which reason and justice were allowed to go for something in ordering the civil relations of men; and it was so in Florence more than in Venice. This will always give an interest to their history out of proportion to the smallness of the stage on which it was played, and unaffected by the complete and disastrous eclipse which for a time seemed to pass judgment on the principles which they prematurely sought to realize.

* Opere inedite di Francesco Guicciardini, illustrate da G. Canestrini. 10 vols. Firenze: 1857–1867.

Guicciardini's sketch follows the course of the last two of those alternations which were continually succeeding one another at Florence, between the "Governo stretto" and the "Governo largo," the "close" and the "open" system of government. Under the first Medici things were far from having yet arrived at the gross despotism of the later ones or of the Dukes of Milan, or even at the arbitrary rule of the men who became upstart "Signori" at Lucca or Bologna. The liberty of Florence, within as much as without, was not an idea without meaning, even to the mind of Lorenzo. But the eternal problem which the statesmen of Florence were revolving was, how the city might be free, and yet the wisest and fittest men govern it; and the eternal oscillation was between freedom on the one hand, with the chances and results of ignorance and confusion, and ability and wisdom on the other, tempting to ambition, usurpation, and violence, and provoking conspiracy or revolution. With the "Governo largo" power was, it seemed, sure to come into the hands of unfit and incapable men, and fit men would decline it or be excluded. With the "Governo stretto" there might be the rule of the most competent; but it seemed equally inevitable that they should turn their power to their own advantage, and ruin the rights and freedom of the rest. These are the two sides of the question which Guicciardini illustrates, with keen penetration and grave and relentless impartiality, in the τυραννίς of Cosimo and Lorenzo (they knew the old Greek term as well as thing), in the restoration of popular government by Piero Capponi, Francesco Valori, and Savonarola, and in the modified democracy with a Gonfaloniere for life under Piero Soderini. The history is a proof of what the civil education of Florence was. The work of a young man of twenty-five (we have the date incidentally given us, when he was writing, 1508), it is not only a vigorous narrative, but it is full of that keen discrimination between appearance and reality which it takes reflection and experience to give, and of delicate and subtle appreciation of motives, and still more, of the whole of a complicated and varied character. And, except in the direction of cautious distrust of all things human, it is difficult to discern any bias; on each side he is free of criticism, but he is not afraid to praise. Such a work seems to presuppose great and active discussion of public matters among men of strong and free sense and keen wit, and an early familiarity with such arguments and such company among the younger men; and it illustrates what he says of the difficulty of governing a city like Florence:—

> Massime sendo questa una città liberissima nel parlare, piena di ingegni sottilissimi e inquietissimi, e uno imperio piccolo, di non potere cogli utili pascere tutti i cittadini, ma sendo necessario che contentatane una piccola parte, se altri ne fussino escluso.—Vol. iii. 84.

The narrative is written simply, easily, and succinctly; there is movement in the story as it unfolds itself; and it is written also with a kind of sly archness which reveals a great deal that is not directly shown. We have a companion picture to put beside it, the more mature work of Machiavelli, which goes over much of the same ground; and it does not seem to us that the work of the younger writer, younger not merely in date but when he wrote, suffers by the comparison. Compare, for instance, the account in each of the conspiracy of the Pazzi, or of the administration and character of Lorenzo. Machiavelli is fuller, and perhaps tells us more; but Guicciardini, with just as much subtlety, keenness of insight, and vivid sense of reality, is more rapid and more readable; he is, as yet, less studied; and there is the charm of fresh and personal experience which belongs to a man who is writing in the midst of the things which he relates, who has lived in the midst of the recent actors in them, and reflects what he saw in the scenes he describes, and heard in the circles which discussed them. Many of his passing remarks and criticisms seem the very echoes of the talk of Florence; such a sentence as this, in his character of Savonarola, whom he judges with curious impartiality:—

> Dottissimo in molto facoltà, massimo in filosofía, la quale possedeva sì bene e se ne valeva sì a ogni suo proposito, come se avessi fattala lui.

Or in his concluding remarks on the Pazzi conspiracy:—

> E questo è il fine delle divisioni e discordie civili: lo sterminio di una parte; il capo dell' altra diventa signore della città; i fautori ed aderenti sua, di compagni quasi sudditi; il popolo e lo universale ne rimane schiavo: vanne lo Stato per eredità; e spesse volte di uno savio vieno in uno pazzo, che poi dà l' ultimo tuffo alla città.

The history breaks off abruptly in the midst of Soderini's government, the failure of which—as Guicciardini, when he was writing, clearly foresaw—was inevitable, though it need not have been ignominious. Four years afterwards, while Guicciardini was in Spain, endeavouring to satisfy Ferdinand for the alleged offences of the Republic in standing aloof from the Holy League against France, and reporting home the fair words which the King gave him, the King's Viceroy in Italy surprised the Republic, upset the popular Government, chased away Soderini, who fled without trying to strike a blow, and with a Spanish army replaced the Medici in Florence. Long afterwards, in another and very different time of distress, when Clement VII. was trying to bargain with the Constable of Bourbon who was marching on Rome, Guicciardini seems to have been remembering the fate of the Republic, and the way in which it was lost, when he gave the warning that the time of negotiation was in those days often the time for dealing the deathblow—"ricordandosi che spesso si danno i colpi mortali tra la guerra e la tregua." But the issue of the long experiment, the recent course of which was the subject of the historical sketch which we have been noticing, decided his political views and his course. Soderini's government was the last chance for popular government, and he evidently thought that there was a chance of it if Soderini, who was an honest man, had been an abler and more energetic one. But Soderini shrank equally from what was violent, and what was wisely bold and strong. Guicciardini recounts his father's advice to Soderini, to let the exiled Medici come back and live like citizens at Florence, instead of like fugitive princes in foreign Courts, stirring up intrigues and exciting pity; but Soderini's timid jealousy shrank from it. In a diary of the time Guicciardini thus writes of him:—

> Siamo nell' anno 1512, ed è Gonfaloniere a vita già il nono anno Piero Soderini, ed è la città nelle cose di drento in questi termini; che lui si trova con grande podestà; gli uomini di qualità e a' quali pare convenirsi riputazione, depressi; ed i magistrati e onori si distribuiscono molto largamente e spesso in uomini che non gli meritano, o per ignobilità di casa, o per valere poco ed essere cattivi. Di questo nasce che essendo gran parte degli uomini prudenti quasi alienati dalle cure pubbliche, ed avendo si può dire abbandonata la città; e il Gonfaloniere facendo deliberare le cose ne' numeri grandi, perchè gli uomini savi vi abbino meno parte, e che le si deliberino più a suo modo, rimane la città quasi in sul governo di lui solo. Di che seguita che le cose pubbliche e dello Stato non sono ben governate, e si vive in molte cose quasi a beneficio di natura: perchè lui non può reggere tanto peso essendo solo, o non avendo tale parte, come la esperienza ha mostro, che si potessi meritamente chiamarlo uomo savio e valente.—Vol. x. p. 87.

He made up his mind, when Soderini fell, that popular government was an impracticable and hopeless attempt; and under the circumstances of the time, and in the condition of Italy and the world, there can be little doubt that, in so judging, he was right. The time for free government had been; the time for freedom, justice, and public spirit might come again, and it has come. But his age was one of those hours of darkness when justice in matters of government speaks in vain, and when the dictates of invincible reason and certain truth are forced, by the unhappiness of the times, to wear the aspect of the most extravagant dreams. It is undeniable that a man of sober sense could have very little hope, in the times which were passing then, of finding the materials of a stable and orderly government in the quick-witted but jealous and sensitive and changeable people of Florence, exposed to perpetual and remorseless intrigues, and made restless by unceasing alarms and terrible dangers; still less that the most honest government of freedom and justice could avail to save its independence amid the clashing and lawless ambitions of Popes and Kings. A greater man than Guicciardini, when he recognised that the time was not ripe for the triumph of justice and truth, might have preferred to wait in faith, and meanwhile to be counted a fool for his principles and hopes. A lesser man might have weakly struggled to resist the irresistible, and caused misery and confusion by the attempt. Guicciardini, eager for work and conscious of power, was a man to make the best of things. "Nè i pazzi, nè i savii," was one of his sayings, "non possono finalmente resistere a quello che ha da essere." When he came home from Spain, he ranged himself at once on the side of the Medici, and devoted himself to their service. To have a government of purpose, counsel, and force, such as, in that state of the world, it was vain to hope for from the disorderly assemblies and the uncertain and shifting authorities of the "open" democracy, seemed to him the only chance for the independence of Florence; and the Medici seemed the only men capable of heading such a government. To save independence, he was willing, probably with but qualified reluctance, to sacrifice freedom; yet he did not forget that the popular intelligence, which he fully recognised, and the long use of liberty, had made Florence peculiarly difficult to break in to despotism; and he knew the Medici well, though he was very far yet from knowing them as in the course of time he was to know them. But he could see no alternative. The following extracts are from a collection of notes and observations which he left to his family (Ricordi politici e civili). They belong to his later life, but they represent the conclusions to which he very early came:—

> Più difficultà ha ora la casa de' Medici con tutta la grandezza sua a conservare lo Stato in Firenze che non ebbono gli antichi suoi, privati cittadini, a acquistarlo. La ragione è, che allora la città non aveva gustato la libertà e il vivere largo; anzi, era sempre in mano di pochi, e però chi reggeva lo Stato non aveva lo universale per inimico; perchè a lui importava poco vedere lo Stato più in mano di questi che di quelli. Ma la memoria del vivere populare continuata del 1494 al 1512 si è appiccata tanto nel populo, che eccetto quelli pochi che in uno Stato stretto confidano di potere soprafare gli altri, il resto è inimico di chi è padrone dello Stato, parendogli sia stato tolto a sè medesimo.—Ricordi politici (1528), No. 376, vol. i. 213.
>
> Non disegni alcuno a Firenze potersi fare capo di Stato se non è della linea di Cosimo, la quale anche a mantenervisi ha bisogna de' papati. Nessuno altro, e sia chi vuole, ha tanto barbe o tanto seguito che vi possa pensare, se già non vi fussi portato da uno vivere populare, che ha bisogno di capi pubblici; come fu fatto a Piero Soderini; però chi aspira a questi gradi, o non sia della linea de' Medici, ami il vivere del populo.—Ib., No. 377 (i. 214).
>
> Chi non ha in Firenze qualità da farsi capo di Stato, è pazzo a ingolfarsi tanto in uno Stato [particular constitution, or form of government] che corra tutta la fortuna sua colla fortuna di quello; perchè è sanza comparagione maggiore la perdita che il guadagno. . . . . Esempio abondante è a chi se ne ricorda Bernardo Rucellai; e la medesima ragione ci debbe consigliare a temporeggiarci, e intratenerci in modo con chi è capo di Stato, che non abbia causa di averci per inimici e sospetti.
>
> Io sarei pronto a cercare le mutazioni degli Stati che non mi piacessino, se potessi sperare mutargli da me solo; ma quando mi ricordo che bisogna fare compagnia con altri, e il più delle volte con pazzi e con maligni, e quali non sanno tacere, nè sanno fare, non è cosa che io abhorrisca più a pensare che a questo.—Ib., No. 379, 380.

Guicciardini, then, frankly accepted what he considered to be the necessities of a Florentine citizen who wanted to take part in public life. He served Leo X.; he served Clement VII.; he served Alessandro, and then, as far as he was allowed, the second Cosimo. And he served them with his eyes open, knowing perfectly what sort of men they were, because active life on any other conditions seemed to him impossible or useless. Every purer and nobler road was closed. His was not that "prudence which makes a man keep silence in an evil time." He saw the world round him with much the same eyes as Machiavelli; but he took what he found with the grave earnest of an accomplished and deeply occupied official, too busy and too positive to speculate on the right hand or the left, to complain, or even much to laugh at things, except in passing, with a touch of involuntary amusement and sarcasm, but with little trace of that grim, terrible humour, telling of intense scorn in the background at the wickedness and still more the weakness round him, which we feel to pervade every line of Machiavelli in his most direct, and even in his most tragic, passages.

Guicciardini's official correspondence, first from the Court of Ferdinand of Aragon, and then as the Pope's representative clothed with supreme civil and military authority in the Emilia and Romagna, is at least as interesting as any portion of this collection. His letters are of much value as documents illustrating the history of the time, and they show a good deal of the man himself. The Spanish Embassy led to nothing, and there was not in reality much to do. The crafty old King amused the young Ambassador with civil speeches, which Guicciardini perfectly understood, and treated him, as he is careful to report, with "discrezione e umanità grandissima," while his Viceroy was plotting and accomplishing the overthrow of the Ambassador's country. But it gave Guicciardini a near view of a specimen of the kings of the time, and an opportunity of studying for himself one of these formidable potentates; and he was deeply impressed with the King's immense ability, his immense dissimulation, and his terrible power. He quotes the proverb, which he says the Moors have of "this Majesty"—"che questo Re scrive le lettere a modo suo, e che Dio gliene soscrive tutte." He appears to have been particularly struck with the military order and organization which he saw in Spain. Ferdinand's perfect craft and mastery of all indirect ways was long remembered by him with hardly dissembled admiration. The crown of it was that, known to be a deceiver, yet Ferdinand got men to go on trusting him:—

> Ancora che uno abbia nome di simulatore o di ingannatore, si vede che pure qualche volta gl' inganni suoi truovano fede. Pare strano a dirlo, ma è verissimo, e io mi ricordo, il Re Cattolico, più che tutti gli altri uomini, essere in questo concetto; e nondimeno ne' suoi maneggi non gli mancava mai chi gli credessi più che il debito: a questo bisogna che proceda o dalla semplicità o dalla cupidità degli uomini; questi per credere facilmente quello desiderano, quelli per non cognoscere.—Ib., No. 105.

The letters of so quick an observer are not likely to want for incidental touches of interest. Spain was not a pleasant place for a foreigner; and he especially notices the contrast of character between Spaniards and Englishmen, then in close alliance with Spain, which was soon to lead to such fierce national antipathy:—

> E vedute queste diffidenze comminciate a nascere tra gl' Inghilesi e costoro, si può facilmente dubitare, che avendo ad essere in uno medesimo campo, possa nascere fra loro ogni giorno disparere; massime che le nature non sono conformi, e anche naturalmente queste due nazioni sono molto inimiche.

The correspondence also contains the letters to Guicciardini from his relatives and friends at home. Among them is one with an animated description of the battle of Ravenna, and another with an account, written on the spot, of the overthrow of Soderini's Government.

In the Carteggio, a correspondence relating to his government under Leo X. and Clement VII., he plays a much more important part. He shows the qualities of an able and energetic officer, placed in a very difficult and hazardous post, with dangers all round him, with very slippery masters to serve, and expected, as was common in those days, to do the most important work with the most inefficient and desperate means. He was to keep order and peace in the Pope's new conquests, with the corruption and lawlessness of the Court of Rome countenancing and stimulating the disorder of the native factions. He had to maintain the Pope's power by bands of brutal and plundering mercenaries, and to get the money to pay them as he could, in fitful and inadequate supplies. He was, if we may judge by his correspondence, indefatigable, resolute, vigilant, and, what was very necessary, patient; not fond of severity, but perfectly ready for it. He tells with great satisfaction how, at his first entrance on his office, he had seized a troublesome military partisan of the neighbourhood, of good connexion and formidable character, and had him summarily tried and beheaded, without giving him any chance of appealing; a proceeding which he considers to have produced a very good effect. If we are to believe him, his stern but just and impartial rule earned him popularity in these provinces, where plunder and oppression were usually the order of things. But perhaps the most interesting portion of the despatches is that in which he follows day by day the march of the Constable of Bourbon's fierce companies—a fresh invasion of the barbarians on their own account, rather than the advance of a regular army set in motion under the orders of a belligerent Government—to sack Rome, and put the Pope to ransom. It was a mad enterprise, except against an opponent made utterly helpless by his absolute reliance on the devices of insincerity. The band of adventurers marched through Italy in the midst of hostile camps, by almost impassable roads and amid deluges of rain. It was only to attack them; there were the soldiers to attack them; but the soldiers would not fight without money, and for this the money was not forthcoming, while Clement was vainly offering huge sums to buy off the invaders. Guicciardini's urgent counsels are characteristic of the time. Florence, the Pope's first resource for money, was exhausted. The Pope, he urges, must raise money himself now. It is no use for him to be nice about the means. Let him sell as many Cardinals' hats as he can, and not listen, at such a crisis, to weak and vain scruples. Later, the time for resistance has passed; and then he is urgent about raising the money, if not to fight Bourbon, at least to buy him off:—

> Questo capitano franzese (Marchese di Saluzzo) non può essere più debole, nè pensare manco alle cose: la gente d' arme sua male pagata, e i fanti suoi sanza uno quattrino, fanno tanti mali alli amici, che li inimici non so se ne fanno tanti; d' onde nasce la desperazione di populi, il serrarci le terre in sul viso, e tanti disordini; nè lui vuole, può, o sa provvedervi. Dio mi è testimonio che io muoio ogni dì mille volte, trovandomi in tanto caos, necessitato a pensare, a ricordare e importunare ogni minima cosa, e alla fine impotente a farla eseguire. . . . E adunque unico rimedio lo accordo, conosciuto bene da voi, ma mal aiutato; perchè non posso credere che a Firenze siano ora tanti contanti che bastino a fare ritirare costoro [the Imperialists] e vorrei che se non potessino supplire loro (i Fiorentini) ne fussino aiutati da voi; e voi non avendo altro modo, mettessi mano agli estraordinarii, i quali non so per che maggiore necessità o maggiore pietà s' abbino ad adoperare: e se voi pensate mettervi mano seguendo la guerra, quanto è meglio farlo ora per levarsela da dosso, e quanto sarà più santo e più pio. E se non vi ne risolvete al presente, vi interverrà come di molte altre cose che fuora di tempo avete voluto fare . . . in queste ambiguità vostre e diffidenze di altri veggo che o sarete presi una mattina nel letto, o vi converrà fuggire. Però per l' amore di Dio risolvetevi che l' accordo abbia effetto traendo di qualunque luogo quelli danari che non si possino cavare di Firenze: perchè questo è minore male che qualunque altro.—Al Datario (Giov. Giberti), 21 Aprile, 1527.

"Choose the least evil," is his continual appeal; and selling Cardinals' hats is a less evil than the ruin of Rome and the Pope; but, at any rate, choose: to fight in earnest, to buy off in earnest, or to throw up the game and fly. The temporizing Romans irritate him by telling him that he is too hasty; that his last alternative is a "partito pazzo e disperato":—

> Non volli allora dire in mio linguaggio altro, se non che è necessario non differire più a risolversi; e se i mali che si aspettino di questa ruina, sono i maggiori mali che possino essere, stimare manco tutti gli altri rispetti che questo, quando anche ce ne sia qualcuno che vaglia più; dico che s' ha a tornare a gittarsi in terra, e quanto più presto l' uomo sa quello che ha a essere, tanto è meglio. 18 Aprile, 1527.

The next day—in a little more than a fortnight afterwards Rome was sacked—he returns to the charge. He urges the spiritual mischief of a victory by heretical Lanzknechts as a set off against the scruples of those who hesitated to sell Cardinals' hats to raise money to resist them. It may be doubted whether he cared so much about the spiritual evils themselves which he described, as about the effect on the Pope's measures which his enumeration of them might produce:—

> E perchè il punto principale è di provvedere alle spese, e che Firenze da per sè non basta, sendo esausta come ognuno sa, e danneggiata da' soldati inimici e amici, non so che resoluzioni saranno le vostre, e se continuerete in volere più tosto perire che aiutarvi: o se quello che non ha fatto la ragione e la necessità passata, lo farà almanco ora lo sdegno e la desperazione. Non vogliono li inimici, da Nostro Signore e da noi, se non tutto quello abbiamo: non hanno instrumenti e arme seco che solo offendino il temporale, ma ruinano le chiese, profanano li sacramenti, mettono eresia nella fede di Cristo: alle quali cose chi può fare conato di provvedere e non lo fa, massime essendo in grado chi è obbligato a farlo, credo sia sottoposto alla medesima infamia, alle medesime pene, e alla medesima offesa di Dio che loro. Se in Nostro Signore è tanto animo che possa patire primo perdere la gloria del mondo; perdere lo stato temporale che hanno acquistato i suoi predecessori; vedere ruinare la sua patria, che nè per nobiltà nè per qualità di ingegni, nè per li ossequi che ha fatto a casa sua, non lo merita; privare il sangue suo di quello grado e di quello splendore, che non gli hanno già dato i pontefici, ma le virtù e fortuna degli avoli suoi;—se tutte queste cose gli paiono vili rispetto a uno proposito (direi parole più gravi, se la riverenza non mi impedissi) che s' ha messo nell' animo di non volere con fare cardinali e con modi simili evitare tanta ruina, non gli debbi parere vile la autorità spirituale, la fede di Cristo, che perdendosi questa guerra se ne va in preda di Luterani. Non l' ha eletto Dio per suo Vicario a questo effetto, perchè lasci ruinare la chiesa e la fede sua, e empire il mondo di eretici; nè per difendere le cose sacre, la salute dell' anime, la fede nostra, può con buona coscienza scusarsi di fare provisione alcuna. Non è buon capo lasciare andare in preda le cose sante, non coscienza lasciare ruinare la fede di Cristo, non virtù lasciare i Cattolici in preda delli eretici. Ognuno che ha buon gusto conforta e prega Sua Santità a non tardare più a fare danari; a difendersi, poi che non può avere pace; e non voglia per l' amore di Dio differire tanto che siano tardi.

This is certainly not a high view of things. To save the Christian faith by deliberate and wholesale simony appears to him the obvious and reasonable course. But in Guicciardini's world and age it was not so unnatural. He might think that if the Papacy—which as an Italian he wished to support—were rightly maintained by the ordinary courses familiar to all the world in the daily policy of the Popes, a sacrilege more or less, in a moment of extreme danger, could not do much harm, and was not worth standing out about. If Cardinals' hats were constantly sold one by one, he probably could not understand why, in such desperate straits, they should not be sold in a lump. Guicciardini's unscrupulousness must be measured by the service in which he was engaged; and his being in that service at all must be judged of by reference to the conditions of his time. To follow public life in Italy, when the Most Christian King was Francis I., the Catholic King Ferdinand of Aragon or his grandson, and the Holiness of our Lord the Vicar of Christ was represented in Popes who were also Medici or Farnesi, condemned a man to strange necessities. What is to be said of men like Guicciardini and Machiavelli—who, seeing no escape from these necessities, accepted their evil times as limits of irresistible fate, and made the best of the degraded Sparta to which they were born—is that they were men who, from real public spirit, could not bear to be idle; that they never deceived themselves as to the evils which yet they put up with, because they saw no way to remedy them; and that though the double character of servants and accomplices of fraud and violence, and its clear-sighted and unsparing denouncers, is not a pleasant one, yet they were the pioneers of improvement; they were among those reformers of a transition time, unable to extricate themselves from old trammels, whose acts are too much stamped with the evil habits of the past, but whose words, inconsistent as perhaps they may be, prepare for a better future. Guicciardini, with the strongest confidence in the force of reason and the power of good counsel, had also the strongest sense of the limits of human foresight, of the immense part in human affairs of the unthought-of and unexpected, and of the vanity of wasting strength on refractory obstacles which nothing but time could touch. He had no patience with the restlessness which frittered away a lifetime in varied experiments after what promised to be better, instead of throwing its whole force into one solid and concentrated effort in one direction, which after due balancing of good and bad seemed, if not the best, yet the least bad. His type and continual byword of incapacity was the accomplished but changeable and never satisfied Bernardo Rucellai, as Machiavelli's bête noire was Piero Soderini. But he looked in the face, and judged with cold, merciless reason, the evils from which he saw no present escape. His plain-speaking has been the warning and lesson to the times after him. To us it seems cynical. But this cynicism has been the way in which Italy men, short of the highest force of character, or hopelessly kept down by their circumstances, have given vent to their restrained indignation; and it was one side of a genuine and deep desire after that nobler lot of which they felt their country, with all its crimes and follies, to be worthy. Guicciardini, the officer, and an energetic and faithful one, of the Popes and the Medici family, has also, like Machiavelli, faithfully transmitted the tradition which has descended in our days to Giusti and Cavour. He has left the following judgments on that policy and system to which, on national grounds, he gave the main work of his life:—

> Non si può dire [he says, commenting on and qualifying Machiavelli's famous chapter on the Roman Church in the Discorsi on the First Decade of Livy]—non si può dire tanto male della corte romana che non meriti se ne dica più; perchè è una infamia, uno esemplo di tutti e vituperii e obbrobrii del mondo.—Vol. i. 27.
> Io non so [he says in his Ricordi politici] a chi dispiaccia più che a me la ambizione, la avarizia e la mollizie de' preti. Nondimeno, il grado che ho avuto con più pontefici, m' ha necessitato a amare per il particolare mio la grandezza loro; e se non fussi questo rispetto, avrei amato Martino Lutero quanto me medesimo, non per liberarmi dalle leggi indotte dalla religione cristiana nel modo che e interpretata e intesa communemente, ma per vedere ridurre questa caterva di scelerati a' termini debiti, cioè a restare o sanza vizii o sanza autorità.—Ricordi, No. 28.

He repeats it again in broader terms:—

> Io ho sempre desiderato naturalmente la ruina dello Stato ecclesiastico; e la fortuna ha voluto che sono stati dua pontefici tali che sono stato sforzato desiderare e affaticarmi per la grandezza loro; se non fussi questo rispetto, amerei più Martino Lutero che me medesimo, perchè spererei che la sua setta potessi ruinare o almanco tarpare le ale a questa scelerata tirannide de' preti.—Ricordi, No. 346.
>
> Tre cose desidero vedere innanzi alla mia morte; ma dubito, ancora che io vivessi molto, non ne vedere alcuna:—uno vivere di republica bene ordinato nella città nostra:—Italia liberata di tutti i Barbari:—e liberato il mondo della tirannide di questi scelerati preti.—Ricordi, No. 236.

PERRY'S GUIDE TO SCOTTISH HISTORY.*

HERE is a small book with a long title, and a book which makes one think that, if a great book is a great evil, a small book may be something more than a small evil. First of all, why should any one write books in question and answer? To any one not behind the scenes such a practice seems a profound mystery. The book is clearly not made either more interesting or more instructive by such an arrangement. No one would ask by choice that a story, as a story, should be cut up in this way, and no one can think that a lesson is thereby really made any plainer, or more easy to remember. The truth is that the fashion of writing books in question and answer is one devised wholly for the benefit of idle or stupid schoolmasters and mistresses. It is devised wholly for their benefit and to the great damage of their scholars. Some questions on the matter learned must be asked for very shame, and of course there is no test so good of the proficiency of either teacher or learner as the kind of questions which are asked and the kind of answers which are made to them. Now to put good questions, such as are likely to draw out good answers, calls for both knowledge and thought. But then think how much is asked for in these two simple words. Unless some folks are greatly maligned, there are many teachers in the land whose stock of knowledge is not great, and their stock of thought smaller still. For these it is that books are written in question and answer. The form of asking questions and receiving answers is kept up, but only the form. The wearisome process of thinking is dispensed with on both sides. The master no doubt solemnly puts his question, and the scholar, we will suppose, glibly makes his answer. But then the question is printed in the book which the master holds in his hand, and the answer is required to be learned by rote by the scholar. The master sets the question in the words of the book, and the scholar is expected to answer it in the words of the book. We believe that, if he departs for one jot or one tittle from the words of the prescribed answer, the offence is held to be quite as great as to make the grossest blunder about the facts of the matter in hand. Why not? Is it not the part of the learner to learn what is in the book and to say it? And is it not the part of the teacher to see that he says it as it is in the book? Why should either learner or teacher be wise above what is written? Why should either of them presume to decide that one departure from the text is venial, while another is confessedly mortal? We ourselves have always had a special liking for the child who, being asked what David did when they told him that his child was dead, promptly answered, "He cleaned himself and took to his victuals." According to our notions, for the child to translate the story into his own every-day speech showed that he thoroughly understood and entered into it. But such a child would get a very bad mark in a school where all the books are written on the principle of question and answer. And what, in such a school, would happen between teacher and scholar, if for a moment their parts and duties should be exchanged, if the learner should venture to ask a question, and should expect the teacher to answer it? What, in such a school, would happen to the adventurous child whose inquiring mind put a question which we recommend to the serious attention of the brothers Rawlinson, "Please, Teacher, did they milk Nebuchadnezzar along with the other cows?"

The mere fact then that the little book before us is in question and answer, so far sets us against it. But we begin to get a little more indignant when the authoress tells us in her preface that she has mainly followed Sir Walter Scott's Tales of a Grandfather, and that she has often made her answers in his very words. Now the Tales of a Grandfather are one of the books which fairly puzzle us. What should one do with such a book? Should one let a child read it or not? Should we be so stern as to forbid him to read a set of tales which, simply as tales, are among the most charming ever written? Or should we allow him the pleasure of reading them at the risk of getting his historical notions twisted all wrong for life? But though there may be a doubt about the Tales of a Grandfather in their natural state, there is no doubt at all as to the Tales of a Grandfather broken up into question and answer, and turned into an instrument of torture for the children who have to learn it by heart. By such a process all the poison is left, while all the sweetness is taken away. And, after all, there is a great deal in this small book which does not come out of the Tales of a Grandfather in any shape. We cannot trust Sir Walter Scott when the prejudices of Scottish nationality stand in the way of historical truth, but he had both too much sense and too much taste to trouble his grandson with the ridiculous fables which once passed as early Scottish history. But here we have the whole thing from Fergus the First, the contemporary of Alexander the Great, whom our authoress evidently looks on as a person about whose doings there is no more doubt than about the doings of John Knox and the Regent Murray. And so the thing goes on. "The first beginnings of Scottish Parliament appeared" in the reign of Finnan, who began to reign in B.C. 128. Perhaps this was to help to keep the number of constitutional States in the world up to the right figure, seeing that the Achaian League and the Republic of Carthage had both vanished during the reign of this prince's father. A little way on reigns Eder, who helped the southern Britons against Cæsar, but of whom Cæsar, very improperly, takes no notice in his Commentaries. And, to make matters worse, these public fictions are mixed up with private fictions, absurd stories about the origin of different families in Scotland—Grahams, Hays, and what not—all which we suppose that the children who have to get up the questions and answers are expected to believe. It is a slight ray of comfort to find that in the ninth and tenth centuries the English are called the English, but this ray is again darkened when we find the fight of Brunanburh most conveniently left out. To be sure it may lurk in the following mysterious answer:—

> A battle was fought at Dunbar, in which Athelstan reduced the Scots to such distress that their king was obliged to make the most abject concessions in order to preserve his crown.

Dunbar, we suppose, comes from the story in Fordun, about Æthelstan cleaving a rock in these parts with his sword, like Roland. But he puts—so far as Fordun can be said to put anything—Brunanburh in the "partes Anglorum australes." This can hardly mean Dunbar, such a little way within the northern frontier of Northumberland.

"Gregory the Great" reigning in Scotland as a contemporary of Ælfred amazed us for a moment. It looked so like not only a bold stroke of geography and chronology, but also a strange and caliph-like union of the two swords. But we recovered on remembering the Gregory of Fordun, who did many great acts, and who conquered pretty well the whole of England, though the English Chronicles have forgotten to say anything about it. The following question and answer are amusing:—

> Q. Who has dramatized the story of Duncan's death?
> A. The great English poet Shakspeare. He has founded his play upon certain facts in history, but to some extent it differs from the simple statement of the Scottish chroniclers.

* A Guide to Scottish History, in Question and Answer, from the Earliest Period to the Union of the Crowns under James VI.; with a cursory View of Events to the Union of the Kingdoms under Queen Anne, May 1, 1707; ending with the Final Extinction of the Royal Line of Stuart in 1807. By Elizabeth Perry. London: Longmans & Co. 1869.

To be sure it does differ a good deal from the little that we can put together from our meagre authorities, English, Scottish, and Irish. Two things, however, are certain. One that Duncan was not, as we are still told, "treacherously murdered" by Macbeth. He was pursued and killed after a battle, a cruel deed in any case, a murder according to our notions, but not a particularly bad murder for Scotland in the eleventh century. Then it is equally certain that the war between Malcolm and Macbeth was not finished off so readily as Shakspeare and the Guide to Scottish History make out, but was prolonged for some while. Even after the death of Macbeth, the cause of his house, a house of rival claimants for the Scottish Crown, was maintained by his kinsman or stepson Lulach. On the whole, Macbeth is an injured man, and we feel half inclined to rehabilitate him.

In the Wallace and Bruce times we have of course the usual kind of talk on which it is needless to dwell for the ten thousandth time. We will pass on, and cull a specimen here and there of the later questions and answers. These we think reach their height when we come to the times of Mary, Darnley, and Bothwell—the times of Mr. Burton. It is really awful to turn over the pages and con the soul-harrowing questions. "What wickedness did Darnley meditate?" "How did Mary treat Darnley after this atrocious deed?" "Who next caused great trouble to the nation?" "What dreadful deed is Bothwell suspected of?" "What audacious step did Bothwell next take?" "What other guilty act did Bothwell commit?" What, we should like to know, would happen if the scholar should forget the exact distinction between the "dreadful deed," the "audacious step," and the "guilty act," and should put the wicked doings of Bothwell in a wrong order? But we must do our Guide the justice to say, as indeed our readers may have inferred already, that no sign whatever is shown of a wish to turn Mary Stuart into a suffering saint.

The whole system of question and answer seems to us so utterly wrong from the beginning that we are perhaps not very good judges as to the merits of this or that particular question. But we would gently ask whether it is not a mistake to overload the questions with epithets and big words. A little fine writing may be endurable in the answers, but surely the questions should preserve a stern simplicity. We turn at a shot to the reign of James the Second; let no one think that we are apologists of the murder of the young Douglasses; like the authors of one of the forms of prayer from which Lord Stanhope delivered us, "we cannot reflect upon so foul an act without horror and astonishment," but it strikes us that a question is almost as ill chosen a place as a prayer for any very strong expression of horror and astonishment. But our Guide asks, "Did this barbarous and treacherous act produce all that Crichton desired?" So a little further on, "What resulted from these traitorous proceedings?" "How did the King try to rid himself of these tyrannies?" "What unhappy circumstance abruptly terminated the tranquillity of the kingdom?" The unhappy circumstance, be it remembered, is no other than the bursting of the cannon which abruptly terminated the reign and life of James the Second in 1460. Now this sort of style shows the unreality of the whole thing. No one would ask real, natural, vivâ voce questions in this penny-a-liner's dialect. Why on earth cannot we have a straightforward account of what happened without these absurd interruptions?

One extract more, to set forth the sad estate of Scotland after the departure of James the Sixth for England and how grievously the members of two learned professions fell away from their ideal standard:—

Q. Was the union productive of no good to Scotland?

A. It was the most unfortunate change for Scotland. By the removal of its regal court, it was at once deprived of all objects that refine and animate a people, and a universal dejection seemed to overtake the nation.

Q. In what way was the change most observable?

A. In the rapid decline of learning. The court being withdrawn, and most of the nobles being with James in England, there remained no standard for correctness of speech.

Q. Did not the intercourse between the two nations supply the defect?

A. The intercourse was too inconsiderable, and the ancient prejudices were still unremoved, so that the Scots possessed no means of refining the language according to the purity of the English standard.

Q. Are not the clergy mostly the disseminators of elegance and correctness in the modes of speech?

A. Yes; but in that age the Scottish clergy were more eminent for piety than learning; their modes of expression were both inelegant and incorrect.

Q. Are not the pleaders of the bar also distinguished for their propriety of speech?

A. Yes; but at the time of which we are speaking, the advocates and lawyers also fell into a loose and inaccurate style, and in writing, they introduced those vicious forms of speech which are termed Scotticisms.

Alas for the good old English of Bernicia.

FERGUSSON'S TREE AND SERPENT WORSHIP.*

THE patronage of literature or of the fine arts has never been exercised by any department of Government in this country to anything like the same extent as it is among most of the leading nations of Europe. We are, moreover, threatened just now with a resuscitation in high places of the spirit of Joseph Hume. A policy of cheeseparing and skinning of flints may serve as a reactionary check upon a temper of liberality and loving indulgence of art which had begun to show itself of late in more than one quarter. The more prompt, then, and the more hearty should be our appreciation of the act of any of our high departmental authorities in wielding the powers of office in furtherance of the direct interests of science or taste. To those charged with the administration of our Eastern affairs has been generally due, we cannot but admit, the palm of boldness and discrimination in the stimulus thus given to letters or the arts. A certain tinge of magnificence, reflected from the Orient realms subject to their sway, has been thrown for the most part over what has thus been originated or sanctioned in that department by the successors of the Moguls. The sums lavished even by the old Court of Directors upon the history, the monuments, or the scientific exploration of India are seldom taken into sufficient account in the general balance against that much-abused body. The case of the Schlagintweits may indeed be thought to speak more for the art of getting at the ear of head-quarters than for the discrimination shown in sanctioning an outlay so far beyond the merits or the fruits of the adventure. Under the new régime we had lately, in Dr. Forbes Watson's work upon Indian Textile Fabrics, a happy instance of what could be done to combine the generous patronage of art in the abstract with an enlightened regard to the cry for utilitarian results. Herein, as in the publication of the Vedas, we see realized the twofold law which should regulate all authoritative patronage of this kind. A boon to the lovers of art as such is justified beyond opportunity of cavil, should it at the same time hold out a direct and tangible gain to the community upon whom the burden of the accompanying outlay must necessarily fall. Whether a stimulus is to be administered to industrial or mechanical progress, or the light of science to be turned upon what is dark in the history, the religion, or the arts of the East, we have in this rule a practical safeguard against many possible causes of complaint. So long as it is observed, there will be less fear of injustice being done to the guild of literature at large through the blind selection of official favour or caprice. And we shall see fewer occasions of the authority or the purse of Government being lent with the mere result of airing the hobbies or fostering the crotchets of chosen individuals.

The latest publication which we owe to the liberal hand of the Indian Treasury is a magnificent work. As a triumph of typographical taste and skill it is second to none that even the Queen's printers have turned out in our day. The illustrations of "mythology and art in India" announced in the title extend to no less than fifty-nine photographs of architectural and sculptural details, executed with the clearness and precision, both of outline and shadow, for which the climate of the East forms an unfailing security. To these are added two-and-forty lithographs, giving either plans and measurements of the buildings, or hand drawings of portions and subsidiary features, taken on the spot. A rich and appropriate binding gives an air of sumptuous finish to the whole. There is so much novelty in the entire subject of Indian antiquities and archæology in this country, and there is so much even in the external aspect of this handsome volume to attract the eye of the public, that the issue of the work seems likely to mark an era in the history of literature in this country. On his own professional ground we are always glad to meet Mr. Fergusson. In the knowledge of Indian antiquities, which he has in great part acquired on the spot, he stands in many respects alone. The careful and indefatigable collection of facts which is shown in all his writings is conspicuous throughout the present volume, and the study he has brought to bear upon the elucidation of the monumental remains which form its professed object, and should justify its outlay, is beyond all praise. It is not, however, the architectural part of the subject which has been most prominent in the writer's mind, nor is it that which has given its title to the volume. The tale of the monuments of Sanchi and Amravati has been kept in subordination to certain speculations, not to say dogmas, of an ethnological or a theosophic character, which have become fixed ideas in the writer's mind. If we ask why we should have to wade through the preface, which contains so much crude and often irrelevant matter, before we even open the questions of art which these objects suggest, the answer is that to these pre-existing crotchets we probably owe the publication of Tree and Serpent Worship. The raison d'être of the volume, the motive which prompted so much outlay of ingenuity and time, the persistent energy which enlisted in its behalf the pecuniary succour of the Indian exchequer, was the chance of ventilating on a scale of unprecedented grandeur, and behind the ægis of unwonted authority, a system of ideas so near to the heart of the originator. An opportunity so golden is rare in the life of any writer. Yet we feel, for our part, too much beholden for the artistic treat which the second and substantial portion of the volume has afforded us, to find undue fault with what we may think shadowy and conjectural in the preliminary matter.

Within his own limits, and in the execution of the legitimate section of his task, Mr. Fergusson displays striking ability in the treatment of his subject. It is to his ardent study and keen appreciation of Indian art that we owe the timely rescue, and the knowledge we now possess, of treasures which might otherwise have been left to decay and perish unheeded. Among the miscellaneous collection temporarily housed at Fife House on their way to their permanent resting-place at the new India Office, was a series of stone slabs covered with bas-reliefs, richly carved with groups of men and animals. These had been sent Madras by Sir W. Elliott in 1857. They were fragments which had formed part of the circular rail of the celebrated tope or burial mound of Amravati. The general plan and structure of this curious monument had been known through a careful survey made by Colonel Mackenzie in 1817, and had been inserted in the History of Architecture four years ago. By the aid of these drawings it was possible to put together these detached fragments after the fashion of a puzzle. This task was facilitated by photographs which Mr. Fergusson was empowered to have taken on the spot, through the liberal support of Sir Stafford Northcote. Thus not only the plan, but a very fair restoration of the general aspect, of the tope could be brought before the eye. Fresh and unexpected light was in the course of these labours thrown upon this noble monument of architecture. Mr. Fergusson having become acquainted with a series of drawings of the great tope of Sanchi, executed by Colonel Maisey in 1854, as well as with General Cunningham's able work upon the Bhilsa topes, it became obvious to him that the one series could not be fitly studied apart from the other. The Sanchi tope was clearly of earlier date than that of Amravati, as proved by the simpler and bolder forms of the architectural construction, and the less complex and ornate character of the sculptured details. A further and more ample grant from the Indian Treasury gave the means of comprising within the contemplated work a comparative view of the two monuments. An additional series of photographs from the spot was made to exhibit, in still more striking form, the grandeur of Sanchi, on which time and the ravages of the destroyer have less ruthlessly pressed. Two of the great gateways in the outer rail retain their grand outline and the bold imagery of their carved surfaces. The richer ornamentation of these noble trilithons denotes an earlier date than that of the rail at large, which is of the simplest form. The construction, as pointed out by Mr. Fergusson, and illustrated by still plainer examples elsewhere, is essentially one of wood. There is nothing lithic in its character. Uprights of stone are posted in the earth some feet apart, into which three circular horizontal bars are inserted, a heavier railing above the whole fitting on to a tenon at the top of the post, and holding all in its place. The great gateways rose to a height of 27 feet, the lowest rail being 15 feet from the ground. All this, as the author forcibly remarks, is good carpentry, but it is very clumsy masonry. It might be rash to infer from this fact, as Mr. Fergusson seems inclined to do, that building in stone was absolutely unknown in India before the time of Asoka, to whose Buddhist revivalism he ascribes the erection of the Sanchi tope about 250 B.C., among the 84,000 topes traditionally ascribed to that monarch's religious fervour. His peculiar ethnological theory, which we pass over for the present, implies at least an extensive intercourse between the race among whom originated the peculiar form of worship embodied in these structures, and well-nigh every nation under heaven. Tree and serpent worship, we are told, "came from the mud of the Lower Euphrates, among a people of Turanian origin." This singular birth must have been at an early date indeed for the religion to affect, as the author makes a point of showing, the earliest Zend and Jewish records, to appear in the remote monuments of Mexico on the one hand, and of Egypt and Assyria on the other. Now the Turanians, we are as confidently assured, were the great building people, and worked pre-eminently in stone. Would it not then be the strangest of enigmas that a race capable of this world-wide diffusion should only have achieved its first steps in stone construction upon Indian soil centuries after the mighty works of Assyria and Babylonia had had their day, and thousands of years after the primitive cairn of loosely piled stones had developed in Egypt into the stately pyramid of exquisitely wrought and mathematically laid masonry?

Be it, however, the earliest stone structure in India or not, the position of the Sanchi tope relative to the later stages of Indian art is not difficult to determine. Not only from the character of its imagery, but from the relics it is known to have enshrined, its connexion with the Buddhist faith is placed beyond doubt. Monuments of a threefold kind perpetuate the peculiar faith and practice of this great religious sect—the sthûpa or tope, the chaitya or temple, and the vihâra or monastery, the prototype, it may well be, of the Christian conventual building. Recent researches into the literary history of Buddhism have kept pace with our growing knowledge of its monuments. The labours of Burnouf, Vassilieff, and others have given a solid basis to much that beforehand was vague and legendary in the extreme. Whatever may be made of the several Buddhas of the early myths, we may feel pretty certain of the historical Buddha in the person of Gotama, or Sâkya Muni, the great reformer of Brahmanism, who died in 543 B.C. Even in his lifetime Buddhistic vihâras or monasteries were erected, it is said, in numbers along the Ganges. It is usual for a considerable period of time to elapse before divine honours, the ascription of miracles, or the devout care and adoration of relics, falls to the lot of a saint. Centuries might be expected to elapse before the sacred tooth, which soon became as common as fragments of the True Cross, was enshrined in the massy reliquary tope, guarded by its outer and inner rail in solid stone. Still there is no reason why in the circular structure thus upreared, and even in the fence encircling it, there may not have been perpetuated the simple type of an architecture for ages habitual to the simplest races of mankind. Erections similar in form, though vastly more rude in art, bespeaking to most other eyes than those of Mr. Fergusson an era immensely more remote in pre-historic time, are found scattered over every continent of the northern hemisphere. The more elaborate stone gateways of Sanchi are assigned by Mr. Fergusson to about the year 20 A.D., their general structure to about 246 B.C., the date of the third great Buddhist council of Rajagriha under Asoka. By that time mid and south India had begun to feel the influence of Greek art infiltrating through the kingdom set up after Alexander's invasion of Bactria. The more refined and elaborate architecture of Amravati evidently pointing to a later date, Mr. Fergusson is probably not far out in assigning the central building, now entirely in ruins, to about 200, the outer rail to after 300, and the inner rail to after 400 A.D. In the fragments of both rails here ingeniously restored the original wood construction is nearly lost under the more conventional treatment and wonderful richness of the ornamentation. The subjects throughout are elucidated in a running commentary by Mr. Fergusson. Whether they refer in all or most cases to the history of the founder, or include incidents in the life of saintly or royal personages amongst his followers, is not exactly clear. One leading form of symbolism which runs through the whole is that drawn from living objects, trees and animals, which is met with in the artistic products of India more largely than perhaps in those of any other Eastern nation. These emblems form doubtless traces of an early nature-worship, anterior to the more spiritualized cosmogony of the Vedas. So, in turn, the religion of Zoroaster was founded on a solemn protest against the worship of the powers of nature invoked under the Vedic belief. The ruder symbolism of tree and animal worship survived both the spread of Brahmanism and the Buddhist reaction as a mode of conventional usage in art, if not as a living element in the popular belief. Pagan forms are similarly met with in objects confessedly of Christian date, as in the case of the silver nuptial casket of Secundus and Projecta in the British Museum.

NAPOLEON AT FONTAINEBLEAU AND ELBA.*

SIR NEIL CAMPBELL, writer of the Journal and subject of the Memoir which together form this volume, was an admirable specimen of Wellington's first-rate regimental officers, and something more. He seems to have laid hand to no military task without adorning it, but the opportunity of distinguishing himself in command of a large body in the field was never afforded him. Yet he saw as much service as fell to the lot of most hard-working British soldiers in the reign of George III., and the tough gallantry traditional in the old Campbells of Duntroon was brilliantly exemplified in the career which unfortunately ended at Sierra Leone, at the age of fifty-one. His first military experience was gained in the West Indies, where as an ensign he showed the quality of self-reliant judgment in the difficult command of an unruly detachment stationed on the Caicos Islands, in apprehension of an attack by the St. Domingo negroes. Returning home in 1800, he joined the 95th Rifles on the original formation of that corps, and some three years later was promoted to a majority in the 43rd Light Infantry, then encamped at Shorncliffe, in Sir John Moore's brigade, the nursery of the Light Division that was to win so many laurels in the Peninsula after its heroic trainer had been buried at Corunna. Campbell himself was not fated to serve in Spain as one of the Light Division. After three years at Shorncliffe he was again sent to the West Indies, where he remained with short interruption till 1810, assisting with distinction at the expulsion of the French from Martinique, the Saintes Islands, and Guadaloupe. Early in 1811 he joined the Peninsular army as a volunteer, and was appointed colonel of one of the Portuguese regiments in Pack's brigade. In this command he did his part at Almeida, Ciudad Rodrigo, Badajos, Salamanca, and Burgos; and the fact that half of the officers serving in Campbell's regiment in 1812 were killed or wounded before the end of that chequered campaign is a fair proof that Pack's Portuguese took their share of whatever hard knocks were going. After the retreat from Burgos, Campbell was sent home invalided, and in April, 1813, we find him at the Russian head-quarters in Poland, on the staff of Lord Cathcart, as military attaché to Wittgenstein's corps. With this division of the allied forces he went through the battles of Lutzen and Bautzen; was detached and sent northward to the siege of Dantzic, for services in which he received from the Emperor of Russia the orders of St. George and St. Anne; returned to headquarters on Rapp's capitulation, and again followed Wittgenstein's fortunes in the advance upon Paris till March, 1815, when he was severely wounded at Fère Champenoise, through the perverse blunder of some Cossacks who took him for an enemy, while he was urging a hopelessly surrounded French corps to surrender. He had but partially recovered from a sabre cut on the head and a lance thrust through the back, when he was named by Lord Castlereagh as the British Commissioner to escort Napoleon to Elba; and his is the figure of an English officer, with head bound and arm in a sling, in the elder Vernet's notable picture of the "Adieux of Fontainebleau." Campbell not only escorted Napoleon to Elba, but, at his special request, was allowed to remain as British Resident in the island through the winter of 1814. After the unfortunate evasion of that person from Elba—to use the phrase by which Castlereagh and the English Ministry delighted to designate the resurgent Emperor—Sir Neil Campbell joined his regiment in Colvile's brigade in the army in Belgium, led column of attack in the storm of Cambrai, and, after the occupation of Paris, was appointed by the Duke of Wellington to command the Hanseatic Legion quartered in the department of the Somme. This was the end of his active military service, for, on the recurrence of inflammation from the wounds of Fère Champenoise, he was invalided at his own request towards the close of 1815. After a long respite from public employment, he accepted in 1826 the Governorship of Sierra Leone, where in less than a twelvemonth he fell a victim to the peculiar climate of that colony, which then even more than now deserved and maintained its ominous name of "the white man's grave." Forty years have gone by since then; the good Knight of St. Wladimir is dust, and his good sword rust, and so forth; when now these memorials of him, and of the greater historical personage with whom it was his fortune to be for some few months intimately associated, are laid before the reading public by the piety of an affectionate and judicious nephew.

General curiosity will be more easily interested in gathering the touches of Napoleon given by Sir Neil Campbell than in retracing the lineaments of Sir Neil Campbell himself from his journals and letters; and the main title of the volume is discreetly associated with Fontainebleau and Elba. But the hors d'œuvres, so to speak, or miscellaneous observations made by the intelligent Scotch officer in the course of his varied military career, apart from those which cluster round the central figure of his great State prisoner on parole, are suggestive and acute enough to deserve appreciation by all who care to study the history of those times. His forcible description of the battle of Salamanca and its results contains a pertinent note on one of the causes of the comparative slowness in pursuit, after a victory, which is frequently charged to the nature of the British soldier. A pursuing army which adheres to the system of commissariat-supply and fair payment can rarely move as quickly as a flying army which marauds and lays waste on principle; yet Wellington's policy of rigid honesty proved the strongest in the end, considered as a piece of military tactics alone. A comparison of the Russian and Prussian forces in 1813 is curious, and historically valuable. "The physical material of the army under Wittgenstein struck the eyes which were fresh from Wellington's camp of veterans as the finest in the world; but the officers were often incompetent, and the discipline loose and orientally barbaric. The Prussians, who had just shaken off the French yoke by the grandest of national efforts, after learning in secret to be a disciplined arm-bearing people under the strict conditions by which Napoleon had endeavoured to secure their military insignificance, are described after Bautzen as "perfect in everything." Wittgenstein appeared to his English attaché to fight the battle of Lutzen on no particular plan, to be generally conscious of his own unfitness to command in chief, and to be bothered with the constant interference or criticism of his Imperial master and the King of Prussia." Bautzen again disclosed the want of a single head, and that a competent one; and the difference between the broad view of the campaign grasped by the supreme mind of Napoleon, and the indecisive muddling of the allied councils, was illustrated in the fact that before Lutzen they never dreamed of fortifying Dresden, and after Lutzen left Dresden at once for him to seize and fortify. The evidence of an officer of Wellington's can hardly be taken as conclusively impartial in estimating the comparative personal powers of Napoleon and Wellington, which appear to have been largely discussed in the allied headquarters after the news of Vittoria. Colonel Campbell was honestly convinced that the actual work done by the English general in Spain, with little aid beyond that of his quartermaster-general Sir George Murray, indicated even more surprising bodily and mental activity than was measured by the labours of Napoleon, aided by Berthier, Murat, Caulaincourt, Duroc, and his other personal staff of general officers. It is interesting to read Napoleon's own appreciation of the qualities of his great rival, in his first conversation with Colonel Campbell at Fontainebleau:—"C'est un homme de vigueur dans la guerre. Pour bien faire la guerre, il faut en avoir comme cela." A similar complimentary tribute to the bull-dog tenacity of Blücher is worth noting:—"Ce vieux diable m'a attaqué toujours avec la même vigueur. S'il était battu, l'instant après il se montrait encore prêt pour le combat." There are strong and picturesque touches in Colonel Campbell's description of this first close interview with the fallen lion whom he had once before seen at a distance through a telescope on the morning of Bautzen:—

It was a strange feeling that came over me, when the aide-de-camp, after announcing my name, retired shutting the door, and I found myself suddenly closeted with that extraordinary man, whose name had been for so many years the touchstone of my professional and national feelings, and whose appearance had been presented to my imagination in every form that exaggeration and caricature could render impressive. I saw before me a short, active-looking man, who was rapidly pacing the length of his apartment, like some wild animal in his cell. He was dressed in an old green uniform with gold epaulets, blue pantaloons, and red-top boots, unshaven, uncombed, with the fallen particles of snuff scattered profusely upon his upper lip and breast. Upon his becoming aware of my presence, he turned quickly towards me and saluted me with a courteous smile, evidently endeavouring to conceal his anxiety and agitation by an assumed placidity of manner. He first asked me several questions about my wounds—which were plainly observable from the bandages upon my head, and my arm being carried in a sling—the circumstances under which they were received, the period and occasions of my service in the army, the particulars of my Russian orders and British military decorations, upon what claims and to what rank they had been accorded, what part of Great Britain I was from. On my replying from Scotland, he inquired whether I, like himself, was an admirer of Ossian's poems, adding here, "Je les aime beaucoup, car il y a quelque chose très-guerrière." "Oui, Sire." I answered, "on a dit en Angleterre que Votre Majesté les aimait beaucoup." . . . . His conversation turned almost entirely upon military subjects, and events connected with the British army, on which he seemed to reflect with the deepest interest; but he did not once touch upon the operations of the other allied armies. He paid many compliments to the British nation for their union and national feelings, in which he considered they much excelled the French. "Votre nation," he said, "est la plus grande de toutes. Elle est plus estimée par moi que toutes les autres. J'ai été votre plus grand ennemi, franchement tel, mais je ne le suis plus. J'ai voulu aussi élever la nation française, mais mes plans n'ont pas réussi. C'est le destin." Here he stopped short, seeming greatly affected, and the tears were in his eyes.

For some personal or politic reason, Napoleon from the first treated Campbell with a more pronounced show of intimacy than he extended to the other Commissioners who were charged with the same duty of depositing him in the safe sovereign retreat of Elba. On the day of quitting Fontainebleau, he opened out in a similar style to General Köller, the Austrian Commissioner. "J'ai eu tort peut-être dans mes plans. J'ai fait du mal dans la guerre. Mais c'est tout comme un rêve"—a tone of penitence that after the "Hundred Days" of the next year sounds rather like the sick devil's proverbial desire to be a monk, which evaporated as soon as he was well.

Through the south of France Napoleon's journey towards Elba was a changing scene of such execration as might naturally follow the author of the conscriptions which had decimated the population for glory, who had ceased to command victory. He rode one stage ahead of his cortége disguised as a courier, at other times changed cap, coat, and name with one or other of the Commissioners, and showed a dread of poisoning and assassination which hardly left him even on his arrival at Elba. The whole picture given of him in these notes, by one who attended him most closely through the journey, is that of a man thoroughly disorganized for the moment by the fact of finding himself a beaten individual, and no longer a power. Yet it is clear that almost from the day of his landing at Porto Ferrajo the idea of a possible return to the French throne was forming in his mind. While telling his friend "Combell" "Je suis un homme mort," "je ne pense à rien dehors de ma petite île," and so forth, he lost no occasion of testing the temper of the French navy towards himself, and began to form the nucleus of an armed force by clandestine recruiting in Corsica, Tuscany, and the other Italian duchies. The British Commissioner soon became uneasy, but failed to convince his superiors of the possibility of an attempt from Elba, probably in concert with Murat. A high diplomatist, fresh from the Congress at Vienna, gave Colonel Campbell, at Florence, in February, 1815, a sarcastic message for the ex-Emperor:—

You may tell him that everything is amicably settled at Vienna: that he has no chance: that the sovereigns will not quarrel. Nobody thinks of him at all. He is quite forgotten, as much as if he had never existed!

A few days later, and Cæsar and his fortunes were committed to the little flotilla of seven sail bound to Antibes, to recall himself to the memory of Europe, and throw for the great stake once more. It is clear that Sir Neil Campbell would have been unable to prevent the escape, had he been on the spot at the moment.

"Madame Mère" was one of Napoleon's visitors at Elba, and so came across the writer of this journal:—

She told me that Napoleon was first intended for the navy, and studied for it at Brienne with a certain proportion of the other pupils. She went to see him there, and found that they all slept in hammocks; upon which she prevented his pursuing that line, and said all she could to dissuade him from it. "Mon enfant, dans la marine vous avez à combattre le feu et l'eau!" He was then fourteen or fifteen years of age.

It seems that Napoleon's masters at Brienne reported that he would make an excellent sea officer. Was it maternal dissuasion, or ambition, or chance, or destiny, which weighed down the scale in favour of a career on terra firma, and gave to the fortunes of the French Republic, and to the history of Europe, a turn which could hardly have been impressed upon them by Admiral Buonaparte, whatever naval victories he might have achieved?

IN SILK ATTIRE.*

WHATEVER may have been the faults of Mr. Black's former novel, Love or Marriage? they were not those of a dull, mediocre, or commonplace writer. The manufacturer of average insipid fiction who reminds you that he is the author of Sarah's Cousin or White Water Lilies might just as well introduce himself as "a near relative of Mr. Smith." But the author of Love or Marriage? if you have seen the book at all, has made for himself a definite place in your recollection. He may have attracted his readers, or he may have repelled them, or he may have done both at once; but at any rate he has given them a distinct impression of his work. In a new book from the same hand they will expect to find great descriptive power united with minute accuracy of observation. They will expect to find the scenery in the midst of which the action of the story is going on entirely realized by the writer, and represented so as to be recognised in detail by the reader. The chief persons of the story will stand out in the same clear light, and they will be real living figures. But when the writer has so elaborated his characters that they have a hold on the reader's sympathies, there will be no certainty that he will have the slightest sympathy with them himself. He is just as likely as not to exhibit his still in putting them to the torture. He could create Fanny Glencairn, and then draw the interior of Helstone's establishment, with Fanny there, and Fanny's mother too. And he could do this, not by two distinct and contrasting pictures of the poor child in her sweetness and purity, and in her after hardness and glare, but by measured and unbroken gradations of the downward progress, as unpityingly as a machine might crush out slowly a beautiful life. When therefore he invites his readers to set out again under his guidance, and to follow the story of another life, the more beautifully a new character grows under his hand the more will the reader have his misgivings as to what is to follow when the story draws towards its crisis. Mr. Black has, however, made a great advance as a writer of fiction since he last appeared before the public. He has learnt to share the sympathy which he can call out in his readers, and there is no trace throughout In Silk Attire of the cold and almost cynical exhibition of the broken idol which made the story of Love or Marriage? painful in direct proportion to the power and skill which it evinced. Annie Brunel is a conception of much higher character than Fanny Glencairn. She presents the sweetness and tenderness of girlhood in union, not with the weakness, but the strength of womanly character; and the relation between the two stories is slightly and perhaps unintentionally indicated by the introduction of Helstone as a subsidiary character, moving in the same professional circle with Miss Brunel, but on a level below her own, and outside the pale of her personal intimacies.

In Silk Attire is a story of theatrical life. We may leave the theatrical world, and the theatre-going public, to settle their own quarrel with Mr. Black, if they think they have any, in their own way. We offer no opinion on the orthodoxy of the doctrine to which the author calls us to listen from the lips of so sweet a preacher; but the conclusion to which the whole working of the story leads is unmistakeably that the theatrical profession, for women at least, is incompatible with the higher life, and that the mimetic spirit will be cast out and die as soon as a nobler impulse has taken possession of the soul. We do not mean to assert that Mr. Black has written the story of Annie Brunel with any such intended moral, but Saul is among the prophets nevertheless when a novel-writer, whose very calling stamps him as "worldly," first captivates us to a gentle, loving, high-spirited woman, and then leaves us to accept on her assurance a view of life which comes, in other words, to this and nothing else:—"Some things, indeed, are in their tone and effects, in the system by which they are supported, and in the consequences they produce, so plainly and undisguisedly dangerous that there can be no hesitation in naming them. For instance, the whole system of theatres is such that . . . no special pleading about their great moral lessons and the like will avail to save them from a simple and direct condemnation." The words will be familiar to many of our older readers as those of Archdeacon Manning. We are not concerned with their justice; but the parallel between the conclusions of the preacher and the inference suggested by the novelist is remarkable.

Annie Brunel, the most popular actress in London at a period which the course of the story identifies with the current lustrum, has inherited from her parents the highest type of refined culture, and the most complete development of histrionic talent. She is known to the reader from the first as the only child of a marriage between Henry Ormond, Marquis of Knottingley, and Annie Napier, the idol of theatre-going London in her day. The marriage had taken place in the country, and she had been brought up in America after her father's death, in ignorance of her rank or name. Mr. Black has furnished, in the introductory chapters which preface his main narrative, the key to the double nature or antagonistic forces in the conflict of which the central interest of the story lies. Two brief extracts may sufficiently indicate this:—"Annie, I cannot bear your going upon the stage any longer. How can I bear to hear the women talk of you; how can I bear to see the men stare at you; and such men and such women, Annie!" And, fourteen years later, the actress-spirit speaks in the mother:—"When my daughter [illegible] to believe that an actress may be a lady, it will be time for her to apply to you for the rank she has lost." Six years later still, Lady Annie Ormond, the heiress to all her father's estates, as "the young American actress, Miss Annie Brunel," "had won the heart of London." Through the teaching of her mother, heart-broken and embittered against English society by the conduct of Lord Knottingley and his family, she had learnt to entertain a deep distrust for every one outside the circle of her professional life, and to believe that her only chance of happiness was to marry, if she did marry, in her own profession. Only, in case she should be reduced to utter straits, was she to break this rule of social isolation, and to apply to a solicitor in London for advice. In her outward life she had grown up simple, wayward, and almost childlike in her love of amusement; all her real and deeper feeling, and all her consciousness of a higher and nobler life, was bound up in the stage:—

"I live," she said, "only in the theatre. I find my life wasted whenever I go out of it, and spend my time in amusing myself like a child. I have nothing to interest me but the theatre; nothing to live for out of it; and it is only when I get [illegible] over with a delici[illegible] fingers tingle with [illegible] many a time I can't help laughing or crying quite naturally when the scene suggests it."

A summer is passed on the Continent, and the return of the theatrical season finds Annie looking on the theatre with changed eyes, and speaking of it in a changed tone. The manager "observed an unusual constraint, at times, in the manner of his chief favourite; something which he had never noticed before, and could not at all understand." Mrs. Christmas, the kindly old lady, half nurse, half superannuated actress, to whose care Annie had been left by her dying mother, was as much perplexed, and more anxious:—

"Why should you vex yourself, mother? I have no dread of stage fright. I shall be as cool as I am now—that is not what I mean. What I fear is that the moment I go upon the stage, and see the men and women all around me, I shall feel that I am just like one of them, only a little lower in having to amuse them. I shall feel as if I ought to be ashamed of myself in imitating the real emotions of life."

"You never had any of these fantastic notions before. Didn't you use to pride yourself on your indifference to the people?"

"I used to."

"What has changed you?"

"My growing older," she replied, with a sad smile. "I begin to feel as if those things that make up acting had become part of my own life now, and that I had no business to burlesque them any more on the stage. I begin to wonder what the people will think of my lending myself to a series of tricks."

Her anticipations were entirely justified.

"Then you know," she said calmly, "that I have made a total failure, and that to-morrow every one, including the papers, will say so."

Lord Weyminster, whom people supposed to have a share in the proprietary of the theatre, went behind the scenes, and met the manager.

"This won't do, my boy," he said.

"Do you think not?" said the manager anxiously. "They received her very warmly."

"They received Miss Brunel warmly, but not her Rosalind."

The result is that Annie gives up her profession, and goes into the world outside to seek her fortune. The death of Mrs. Christmas leaves her alone in the world, and after a brief experience of life as a governess, she finds herself brought into straits which make it necessary for her to carry her mother's sealed letter to Lord Knottingley's solicitor; and she then learns that it contains the simple words, "My daughter claims her rights." Lady Annie Ormond is placed in possession of her estates, and naturally at first does not know what to do with her accumulated fortune. The author, too, is by this time so thoroughly in sympathy with his heroine that he seems to share her feeling of bewilderment, and does not quite know what to do either. As is often the case with a novel of more than ordinarily sustained interest, the last twenty or thirty pages hardly come up to the mark of the rest; and it may be worth the consideration of a writer who knows that he has done good work up to what is substantially the completion of his design, whether he is bound to go on with the merely mechanical finish at all. To break off in the middle of a sentence, like an edition of an ancient manuscript, and put cætera desunt instead of finis at the bottom of the page, would be perfectly within an author's right, and not without precedent in other, though lower, branches of skilled labour. "A little in the rough in places, still; don't you dress and finish it off?" was an inquiry made after examining some marvellous product of a modern power-loom. "Oh no," the workman carelessly answered, "we leave all that to the girls." Our readers will have already assumed that the elevation in Annie's character has been brought out by the power of love; and Mr. Black has shown even more skill in tracing the stages in his heroine's upward progress than he did in the corresponding exhibition of the downward course in poor Fanny Glencairn. We do not propose to tell the story of Will Anerley, or to analyse the well-arranged complications in which Dove, the little tender, clinging, adopted sister of Will, and on the other side the coarse middle-aged Thames Street tea-dealer, who had come into a million sterling and bought a German title and castle, are intertwined. Both are very good pictures; and when Count Schönstein is in love, we feel that we have the whole man presented to us—his ordinary nature and the condition of its temporary disturbance—in the one stroke of description that "he forgot to tell lies about the price of his wines." Miss Nelly Featherstone, too, the pert, pleasant soubrette, deserves more than a passing notice. She, with her timid and devoted admirer Frank Glyn, represents throughout the whole action of the story the level on which theatrical life and the life of the outside world may be supposed to meet and combine; the level on which Annie Brunel had never been capable of resting, and above which we follow her in her gradual rise. Nelly on the stage can act at Frank in the pit, and do things on purpose to plague him; and Frank is happy enough to see her on the stage, although he grumbles about rouge and bismuth, and gets naturally out of temper on the subject of tights.

While, however, Mr. Black has bestowed ample attention on his central figure and her accessories, there are not wanting throughout these volumes marks of a carelessness of detail which ought to have been avoided. One of these calls for notice in the opening pages of the story. It is abundantly clear that in the author's mind the introductory scenes are laid in the drinking, duelling, scandalous days of the Regency; but the later evidence of dates places it beyond question that the period of Lord Knottingley's marriage was within twenty-five years of the present time, when "the Prince" could only mean the late Prince Consort. We should like also to remind Mr. Black that it is not altogether nice for a charming girl like Annie Brunel to be loafing about "the long and sombre thoroughfares" in Pimlico, "running southward to the river, the broad smooth river," with a young engineer, at one o'clock in the morning. We are very much obliged to him for not asking us again to accept an escapade to the South coast, in which a young lady lives in lodgings with an unmarried man without any harm done or thought of; but another time he must let us off midnight rambles too, either in the back streets of Pimlico or "along the lonely pavements of Kensington." Count Schönstein was no doubt a very coarse animal and a great snob; but it must be allowed that a young lady under such circumstances does lay herself open to having disagreeable things said about her. The provoking verbal tricks which were frequent in Love or Marriage? are almost entirely absent in the present story, but there is a single instance in the repeated use of the epithet "supreme" in the senses, or nonsenses, in which it has become of late a cant word with a certain school of writers, and which lead us to suppose that "supreme" must be our old acquaintance "awful" grown up to man's estate. These, however, are only minor blots on a work which deserves a hearty welcome for its skill and power in delineation of character.

SMEATON'S LIFE OF THOMSON.*

WE have read this book steadily through with an ever increasing sense of wonder. The portrait of Mr. Thomson, which forms the frontispiece, though not remarkable as a work of art, represents a good old shrewd Scotch gentleman. The preface expresses Mr. Smeaton's opinion that the life was one which should not be left unwritten, though qualified by a modest doubt as to his own capacity for the work. However, by adopting the scheme of allowing Mr. Thomson to become as much as possible his own biographer, he hopes that a kind portrait has been drawn of an "eminent literary man." Mr. Thomson, we are told, "appears in this memoir as he thought and spoke and acted amongst his fellows." From all this we anticipated, it may have been rashly, a forcible account of one of those strongly marked types of character which are frequent in the Northern half of this island. Scotchmen may be dull occasionally, but they have a vigour and independence which is perhaps more attractive in description than in personal intercourse. It is not always pleasant to meet a man who thinks that your salvation is extremely doubtful if you ever take a good walk on Sunday; but as the subject of a biography he is likely at least to avoid the one great fault of insipidity. With such expectations we began the book, and from conscientious motives we plodded steadily onwards till we reached the opposite cover. We received from it the impression that Mr. Thomson was probably a very excellent gentleman, very conscientious if also not a little bigoted, and much respected by all his acquaintance. But that which surprised us was that it should be possible to write so many pages about a man of more than average ability, and holding a prominent position in the country, without telling us anything more about him. The narrative is perhaps one of the most colourless in existence. Poor Mr. Thomson is at the end of it precisely what he was at the beginning; that is to say, for we had not the honour of his acquaintance, nothing more than a name, something as indistinguishable from other respectable Scotch gentlemen as one mathematical symbol from another, or as the first from the second citizen in one of Shakspeare's plays. Of his domestic life we learn nothing, and there is an almost studied absence of those little touches which bring out a man's character in skilful hands. It is really strange that any human being should have composed a thing which to all external seeming is a book, and which seems to have been put together with considerable care, and even with a superficial appearance of good composition, and yet have never succeeded in bringing his hero distinctly before us. If Mr. Carlyle had ever had a view of the back of Mr. Thomson's head, he would have described him more vividly than Mr. Smeaton has succeeded in doing in his five hundred and odd pages. We can only suppose that some Scotchmen catch a certain contagion from long-winded sermons, or that their literary appetites become so depraved by listening to the monotonous flow of pulpit eloquence that they really don't know what is dull and what is not. Possibly, too, it may be that Mr. Thomson was really as uninteresting a character as his biographer describes; but we would again hope that this is highly improbable, even in Scotland.

The task of giving some account of a book which is chiefly remarkable for its undeviating dulness is not a very inviting one. If Mr. Thomson was dull, and his biographer duller, it would seem to follow that an abstract of his biography must be dullest of all. We will endeavour, however, to pick out some of the most conspicuous facts about him, and to explain so far as may be the causes of the peculiarly soporific nature of the book. The circumstance upon which his biographer lays most stress is that Mr. Thomson was a "Calvinist of the most pronounced class." His biographer has some difficulty in fixing the precise time of his conversion; but it seems that in his youth his views had been tainted with a certain "legalism"; and that he went "so far as to allege that according to a man's stability in a state of probation one might either stand or forfeit the acceptance which he once possessed—a notion which he completely outlived and repudiated." We are glad, however, to say that, whatever Mr. Thomson's views may have been, he does not seem to have indulged in that ostentation of religious phraseology which is so objectionable in many biographies of this kind. The most characteristic indication of his opinions, so far as the outside world is concerned, is to be found in various judgments passed upon men and things, and duly recorded in this volume. Mr. Thomson of course looked upon the Pope as Antichrist, and regarded Roman Catholic Emancipation and the Maynooth Grant with utter detestation. His view of Irish politics is expressed by a sentence printed in capital letters to show its importance. "The greatest evil, I think, which Ireland ever saw," he says, "was THE REPEAL OF THE PENAL LAWS." These laws, he thinks, had scotched and well-nigh killed the snake, and were removed just in time to save its life. Rather inconsistently, he admits that he would not have voted for enacting them, though he would never have repealed them. Even pronounced Calvinists have certain human weaknesses. Dr. Newman's Apologia is the most intolerable book he ever tried to read, though he condescends to the admission that its author is a man "of fair abilities." Meanwhile, he cannot sufficiently express his intense aversion to writers of a different school. "One of his most marked peculiarities," we are told, "was the inductive precision and correctness with which he apprehended the scope of any literary production," and we are treated to a good many examples of his criticism. Of one of Sir C. Lyell's books he remarks, "I dislike and disapprove this book exceedingly." He burns Channing's works, by way of marking his disgust. Darwin teaches "pure atheism." His style is clear, but he has not another good quality. His book proves nothing, and is one uninterrupted repetition of a baseless theory without a fact to stand on. Buckle is "incredibly ignorant and perverse." His book is the "most pretentious farrago of rubbish I ever read," "the whole book the most grovelling materialism and the bitterest enmity against revealed truth and moral excellence." French literature, especially the modern, is summarily declared to be an "utter abomination—not so much bad as absolute inanity." That a fine old Scotch Conservative should write down notes of this kind in his private journal is by no means surprising, and is certainly compatible with his possession of the most excellent and amiable qualities. But it is rather odd that his biographer should fancy that he is doing his hero honour by publishing them. The writers assailed may deserve all that is said of their evil tendencies; but they have rather too high a reputation to be summarily knocked on the head by this pronounced old Calvinist. Mr. Smeaton should ask himself this question, What is the logical inference from the fact that Mr. Thomson thought that Dr. Newman, Mr. Darwin, Sir C. Lyell, Buckle, Channing, and others were contemptible fools, and that all modern French literature was simply inane? Ought we to infer, for example, that the reputation of these writers must necessarily give way before Mr. Thomson's infallible judgment? or is another conclusion equally possible? To condemn a writer in this summary fashion, is to say in substance, either you or I know nothing about the matter; and the alternative is sometimes a tolerably simple one.

Mr. Thomson appears to have been a man of more intellect than these remarks would lead us to suspect, though his biographer scarcely brings out the fact. He was a rich country gentleman, and yet had a strong objection to the game laws. He was a pronounced Calvinist, and thought that a very large proportion of modern literature was utterly contemptible and corrupting; but, so far as we can make out, he was neither narrow-minded in other matters, not apt to be intemperate in the tone of his remarks. "It is impossible," says Mr. Smeaton, "to convey any idea of the sort of the wide, varied, all-embracing interest in whatever is knowable with which his mind was possessed." The expression seems to be a little strained; but he certainly took an intelligent interest in many matters. He travelled through Italy soon after the last war, and made more careful observations than are customary with the present race of precipitate travellers. He brought back sufficient knowledge of Roman antiquities to write some respectable papers on the subject, as well as to publish various demonstrations that Popery was the arch-abomination of the world. He studied geology, not exclusively with a view to show that Mr. Darwin was an atheist. He took a considerable interest in reformatories and other benevolent institutions, he appears to have founded some very successful industrial schools, and was a vigorous opponent of Sunday travelling, on the ground that it was opposed "to the commandment of the Almighty" and to "statute law." He was an effective advocate of the proposal for uniting the colleges of Aberdeen, and was also very enthusiastic about a plan for restoring the Jews to their native land, thereby not merely fulfilling the prophecies, but not improbably realizing a "vast ultimate gain" in a commercial point of view. He had his reward in a good conscience and in a visit from the Prince Consort at the time of the British Association meeting in Aberdeen, which made so deep an impression upon his mind that, besides putting up an obelisk in commemoration of the event, he was always talking and thinking about it for the remainder of his life. He was deeply interested in the Free Church movement in Scotland, and wrote a great many letters on the subject to his friend, Lord Aberdeen, to Sir Robert Peel, and to various other persons concerned. He collected a fine museum and library, and left them, together with landed property, estimated at 30,000*l.*, to the University of Aberdeen.

In all this there is that quaint mixture of commercial shrewdness, practical benevolence, and pronounced Calvinism which characterizes a certain school of Scotchmen. In spite of a very limited intellectual vision, Mr. Thomson was doubtless a useful man in his generation, and deserved better things than to have his life written. It was a cruel kindness to drag him before the public as a biographee, if we may coin a word to express a very unfortunate class, and the only comfort is that in all probability no one will read the book except reviewers and personal friends. The one chance of making it interesting would have been to bring out Mr. Thomson's peculiarities more vividly than would perhaps have been advisable so soon after his death. But Mr. Smeaton fairly put this out of his power by his notable plan for obtaining vividness. To publish a man's letters and diaries is a very good plan if the man has the power of putting himself into all his writings; but when they are commonplace remarks upon the Free Church question, or simple notes in a travelling journal, that Zurich is a fine town, and that it is interesting to see Herculaneum, nothing more uninteresting can well be conceived. There are people with plenty of character whose letters are as monotonously dull as any commercial circular acknowledging the receipt of esteemed favours; and Mr. Thomson seems to have been one of them. Whether any writer could possibly have made much of such a life is a question which, under the circumstances, it is unnecessary to discuss.

SÉRAPHINE.*

PERFORMED with the consummate delicacy and art in which such a company of actors as that at the Gymnase is certain not to fail, Séraphine may be as interesting a piece as the Parisian playgoers are said to find it; but for people who have to content themselves with a sober perusal of it by a London fireside, the secret of its success, if not hard to discover, cannot appear flattering to the state of contemporary judgment on dramatic things. A play by so good a writer as M. Victorien Sardou, be it said, ought to suffer hardly any disadvantage in being only read instead of actually seen. Of course it is as true of a good writer as of a bad one that he composes his drama for representation, and that the success at which he specially and justly aims is success in representation. If a play does not act well then it is undoubtedly a failure as a play, whatever it may be as a poem, because the object and end of a play is that it should be acted. But what we mean is that a modern French dramatist does not suffer the same disadvantages in the closet as the modern English playwright does, because the former is usually, and in M. Sardou's case certainly, a good writer quâ writer, whatever he may be as a delineator of character, or a constructor of dramatic situations. A classic tradition has lingered about the French stage, which the stage in our own country, notwithstanding the noble genius which has illuminated it, has never been so fortunate as to possess; and this tradition ensures a certain style and manner which give a cultivated reader a purely literary pleasure apart from consideration of the work's dramatic quality. Hence one sits down to read a French play without much disadvantage in missing a sight of it. The critic starts pretty fair, and without pretending to say how much the art of three or four highly appreciative and finished actors might do to ensure a long run and a triumph with the audience, he may make tolerably sure of being able to form a sound judgment upon the fundamental stuff and quality of the play. In the case of Séraphine one can hardly help seeing that this fundamental stuff is as thin, and its general quality as disagreeable, as they can possibly be.

Let us consider the plot, which has at any rate so much merit as belongs to simplicity. Séraphine is introduced to us as a lady who has surrendered herself to the practice of religion and its ordinances in all possible rigour and narrowness. She is incessant at all charitable associations, swallowed up by zeal for the conversion of the little Patagonians, eager in attendance at all the prescribed services of the Church, faithful at the conferences of any popular preacher. Her eldest daughter is married to a man of the world, living under her roof, and one of the most important tasks of the devout mother is to keep the husband and wife as much apart as possible. Her performance of this task occasions some clever by-play, which on the stage must be very funny, as a Parisian husband habitually kept apart from his wife, though living in the same house with her, may well be expected both to feel and inspire a good deal of pointed amusement. Séraphine has another daughter unmarried, whom, in her religious fervour, she is on the point of consigning to a convent. In time, however, to prevent this, an old admiral, who is Yvonne's godfather, appears, and carries the maiden off by force to his own house. At this point it appears that the admiral is not only her godfather, but her real father also; for the devout and virtuous Séraphine was not always either virtuous or devout, and she had in her unconverted days dishonoured her husband, whose child, however, the innocent Yvonne had always been very naturally assumed to be. Séraphine guesses who has abducted her daughter, and hastens to his house, whither her husband follows her. The daughter is found, and the next day there is a clearing up which leaves everybody in the dark whom it would be indiscreet to enlighten. Yvonne, unconscious to the last of her true paternity, is betrothed to a lively youth who has figured in a spirited manner during the play. The Baron, her supposed father, has been satisfied with a made-up explanation of her abduction. The Admiral, her real father, departs for the fleet, without betraying his secret; while Séraphine is left in a tolerably equable state at having escaped a doubly disastrous disclosure of her old sin. All this, it will be allowed, is not very nice; and, to make sure of our not missing the point, alongside of the main current of Séraphine's affairs there is a still less nice episode of one Chapelard, friend of the family—a greedy, selfish, fawning hypocrite, a better-mannered kind of Chadband. Connected with Chapelard by an undefined tie, which, however, is supposed here again to be that of some clandestine paternity, is a youth who is equally devout with the rest, and who is at length discovered to be spending the money subscribed by pious congregations for the little Patagonians upon an improper young lady who dances at the Opera.

The reader now understands the kind of matter of which the play consists, and its bearing. We are in the region of the immortal Tartufe, but among the dwarfs of that unlovely species. Of fine and free delineation of character there is none. Chapelard is commonplace to the last degree. M. Plantrose is a well-drawn man of the world at war with his mother-in-law; but then a man of the world at war with his mother-in-law is not much of a creation after all. The author, if he were less well known for taste than he assuredly is, would deserve some credit for the ease and good breeding of M. Plantrose, but then it is only in the modern drama of home construction that we English think it worth noting when a gentleman on the stage is drawn after the picture of a gentleman off the stage. Still there is no creation, nor power, nor freshness of conception in M. Plantrose, nor indeed about any of the rest. The unlucky Baron, Séraphine's husband, may be said to exhibit fairly the humour of his situation as betrayed husband kept in the dark, as swearing old colonel in a devout household, and as gouty subject despatched relentlessly on all pious errands in all weathers. But is not this rather too dangerously near the confines of farce to be worthy of a writer like M. Sardou? Even Séraphine herself is neither in outline nor in colour very effective. In her devout mood she is commonplace, because the caricature of religious devotion has been so often repeated by small masters and great as to have become essentially commonplace. We get a glimpse of force for a moment while she defies the Admiral, in spite of her knowledge that the fatal past places her in his power. And on one or two other occasions the entanglement of circumstances makes her interesting for the moment. But then the interest is rather from the circumstances than from the outshining of any strong or remarkable quality in her.

What, then, are the parts on which the dramatist has relied, and as it would appear has not in vain relied, for the success of his piece? So far as we can see, upon two or three situations, scenes, or interviews, which turn either upon a nauseous sort of sentimentalism, or else upon associations, suggestions, impulses, of a kind which is nauseous and something more. One situation, which we are quite sure, without having been to the Gymnase, cannot fail to stir a sentimentally inclined audience to the depths of its French heart, is the interview between the ingenuous Yvonne and the Admiral, whom she takes to be no more than her godfather. The cleverness of this scene, and the exceeding neatness of the dialogue, cannot be praised too highly. The old man, whom she loves dearly, would fain have her confess that she loves him better than she loves her (supposed) father. She holds out from a sense of the wickedness of liking anybody in the world more than a father; and the play between them, the coaxing earnestness of the old man and the half uneasy tenderness of the hardly pressed maiden, is excellent. But to a spectator or reader the entire suggestion of the scene is disagreeable. The true relationship, which of course we know all the time, is not one that we care to be reminded of or to think about. Sentimentalism is all very well, but this is sentimentalism under most unpleasant difficulties. The climax of the piece is still more unpleasant. The Admiral happens to have kept possession of a bundle of Séraphine's warmest and least reserved letters in the days of her amour. By an accident the letters fall into the hands of Yvonne. The Admiral, having just discovered this terrible mishap, seeks Séraphine on the instant, and tells her that these old letters have been taken. "Mon mari?" exclaims Séraphine:—

> MONTIGNAC.—Eh! si ce n'était que lui! . . . mais le coup est plus atroce: ce n'est pas l'épouse qui est menacée dans son honneur! . . . c'est la mère! . . .
> SÉRAPHINE.—La mère!
> MONTIGNAC.—Vos lettres sont dans les mains d'Yvonne.
> SÉRAPHINE.—Ma fille!
> MONTIGNAC.—Comprenez-vous—vos lettres! . . . sous les yeux de cette enfant! . . . ces lettres brûlantes . . . ardentes! que vous ne reliriez pas vous-même sans rougir!

That the mother is distracted with horror at the thought of the gross exposure which may have happened is natural, and this horror is a sort of tragic climax to the piece. That there is a certain dramatic force in the situation one cannot deny; the audience will be thrilled; but how repulsive in all its suggestion and association! Maternal love and its crushing anguish have often before now been made the key-note of mighty scenes, and a mother's fear lest an innocent daughter might chance upon some story of past guilt is not essentially improper for a legitimately telling situation. But we would venture to make two decided objections to its use and fitness here. First, we are not at all prepared to feel any sympathy with Séraphine by her odious and defiant action in the previous parts of the play; nothing leads up to any association of pity or good-will with her in any case. Secondly, the form in which the disclosure of the past guilt would have been made, and the expectation of which is the stimulus to the spectator's interest, is detestable. Look at it as we will, the whole suggestion of the pure daughter handling the mother's not pure letters is ignoble and distasteful, and the same kind of ignoble and distasteful suggestion runs through the entire piece.

THE SIMANCAS RECORDS.*

(Second Notice.)

WE are sorry that the long-promised continuation of our notice of M. Bergenroth's last publication of Records has been delayed until now. His lamented death, which has occurred in the interval, leaves a vacancy on the staff of the Master of the Rolls which it will, we fear, be impossible adequately to fill. Though we have had occasion to express grave differences of opinion from M. Bergenroth on important points, yet we may be allowed to state our firm conviction that no other place held by an editor of this series of documents will be so difficult to fill. We think it worth while to add that the following remarks were in type before we had heard the sad intelligence.

The supplementary volume of despatches from Simancas differs from the two volumes previously issued, and indeed from all the other publications in the series of Calendars of State Papers, both in style and arrangement. The editor has exercised a wise discretion in printing at full length the important documents which have been so long suppressed; and as they refer to two entirely different subjects, the volume has, we think, been judiciously divided into two parts, without reference being made to chronological arrangement, except that the documents in each portion follow each other in proper order. We have already discussed the first set of papers, referring to the conduct of Catharine of Aragon during her residence in England as Princess of Wales. And we trust that nothing we have said will prejudice the reader against M. Bergenroth's conclusions as expressed in that part of his preface which refers to the mad Queen of Castile. Mr. Turnbull was dismissed from his employment under the Master of the Rolls for telling the truth as it appeared in the State Papers of the reign of Mary. M. Bergenroth was never in any danger of losing his appointment for having formed an unfavourable judgment of her mother, though, as we have shown, his judgment rests upon no shadow of evidence. No one can complain of him for suppressing or altering the evidence, such as it is. The only fault we find is that the conclusion he has arrived at is in no way connected with the evidence. We are glad that the documents have been printed at full length, and an English translation of them placed at the foot of the page, for in truth the original Spanish is especially difficult to make out, and requires more knowledge of language in general than is possessed by most Englishmen, however fluently they may be able to converse in that language in its present form. Where a document was presented in French or Latin the editor has not encumbered his page with a translation, as the sixteenth-century type of the former language presents little difficulty, and that of the latter none whatever, to ordinary students of history.

In noticing the portion of this volume which is headed "Queen Juana," the first question that will arise in some minds will be—What has the personal history of the mad Queen of Castile to do with English affairs? And perhaps, strictly speaking, these papers have no business to appear in a series of Calendars the professed object of which is to illustrate English history. It cannot be pretended that the fact of Henry VII. becoming a suitor for her hand, after the death of Elizabeth of York, entitles her to appear there, and unquestionably England makes no figure at all in the Spanish rebellion against the Emperor which occupies the greater part of the volume. Again, if it were ever so well established that the mad Queen of Castile was as sane as her sister Catharine, Queen of England, it would not follow that her royal suitor was aware of her soundness of mind; nor, even supposing that Henry was relieved from the odium he has incurred for his willingness to marry a mad woman for political aggrandizement, would that much soften the dark shades which gather round his picture as it has been drawn from the previous revelations from Simancas.

From what has been said, it will have been anticipated that M. Bergenroth expects us to reverse our judgment of the character of Queen Juana, in pretty much the same way in which he thinks he has succeeded in showing us that we ought to change our views as regards the piety of Catharine of Aragon. We trust that nothing we have said on the latter point will induce any one to prejudge the case of Juana of Castile. The editor made such an absurd failure in his attack upon the English Queen that we think it quite necessary to bespeak for him a fair hearing in his defence of the sanity of the Queen of Spain. In truth, his preface is nothing less than an elaborate attempt to establish the truth of his conclusion, that her nearly fifty years' confinement was the result of a conspiracy originated by her father, and afterwards continued by her son, the Emperor, for the purpose of securing the government of her kingdom to themselves during her lifetime, and enlarging the boundaries of that dominion which had been consolidated first by the marriage of Ferdinand, King of Aragon, with Isabella, Queen of Castile; and then by the death of Don Juan, their only son, which left his sister, Juana, sole heiress to the kingdoms of her father and mother, to which, after her marriage with the Archduke Philip of Austria, were united in prospect the dominions of Austria and the States of Burgundy.

The detail of the imprisonment and the sufferings of the poor Queen reads more like a piece of romance than a narrative of real history, and yet we are bound to admit that M. Bergenroth has nowhere overstated the facts as they appear in his published documents. His representations are quite as exact in the one case as in the other, and our only quarrel with him is that the conclusion does not appear to us to come out of the premisses with the amount of certainty which he attributes to it. He says, "That Queen Juana in the year 1507 was incapacitated by insanity for matrimonial life, will hardly any longer be pretended." Now we admit that the hypothesis of Juana's sanity is perhaps tenable. That is to say, after reading first M. Bergenroth's preface, and then the documents of which it is the epitome, it appears to us just possible that Juana was of sound mind at the commencement of the dreary period of confinement and surveillance to which she was subjected, and which, at its termination, left her hopelessly insane. But it is after all only an hypothesis, which has to be confronted with some facts very difficult to make it fit in with. We may perhaps concede that Ferdinand was capable of the villany of treating his own daughter in the fashion described in these papers. It is more difficult to believe in the possibility of a son, hard and unsympathizing as that son certainly was, practising such unfeeling oppression on his mother; but the chief obstacle to be overcome is the complete success with which the deceit, if deceit it was, imposed upon the people of Spain, as well as on the other nations of Europe.

M. Bergenroth traces the real or pretended insanity of Juana for above twenty years from the date of the drawing up of Isabella's will in November, 1504. And he writes not merely like a person θέσιν διαφυλάττων, but we may observe that he actually grows stronger in his convictions in the course of composing his introduction. At p. x. we are told that "the correspondence throws grave doubts on the insanity of Queen Juana." At p. xxvii., "the story of Queen Juana's madness must, we are afraid, be abandoned, and replaced by another drawn in strong, hard lines, and coloured with the darkest tints." Further on we are told—and here we entirely follow M. Bergenroth—that, "if we consider her absolute loneliness, and all the other circumstances, we must come to the conclusion that Charles and his abettors were utterly regardless of the consequences of their conduct," and that "it would not be at all surprising if a perfectly sane person put in the position of Juana had gone mad." And we quite agree, therefore, that the unquestionable fact of her having been mad during the latter years of her life is not to be pressed too far in the way of evidence that she was mad before or at the time of her husband's death. At page lx. we advance one step further, and the editor expresses his opinion as follows:—"From what we have stated, we believe it will be tolerably clear that the reasoning faculties of Queen Juana were by no means impaired, and that, whatever opinion we may be inclined to form of her character and her religious convictions, we cannot pronounce her to have been insane." But, with all our experience of M. Bergenroth's jumping at conclusions, we were scarcely prepared for the very decided avowal of opinion contained in the last paragraph of his preface—"That Queen Juana in the year 1507 was incapacitated by insanity for matrimonial life, we think, will hardly any longer be pretended."

The outline of the story, as it may be read in Mariana or any other Spanish history, is that Isabella of Castile, with the consent of the Castilian grandees, without whose concurrence no such step could have been taken with any chance of success, left her husband Ferdinand Governor of her kingdom in the event of her daughter Juana being incapacitated for the management of affairs by her malady, which had already begun to show itself. Philip, the husband of Juana, resented this interference, and, with the assistance of several Castilian nobles who disliked the idea of being governed by a King of Aragon, held his own till a compromise was made by the Treaty of Salamanca, one stipulation of which was that Juana, Ferdinand, and Philip should be joint-Regents of Castile. Philip, however, soon forced his father-in-law to resign, and practically became King. This state of things was interrupted by the timely death of Philip at the early age of twenty-eight, when Ferdinand assumed the Regency, and held it till his death in 1516. In doing this he was materially aided by the illustrious Cardinal Ximenes, Archbishop of Toledo, whom at his death he left as Regent in Spain till the arrival of his grandson Charles in that kingdom. Charles immediately determined, in prejudice of his mother's rights, to usurp the title of King of Castile—a proceeding which the Cardinal, with his usual sagacity, saw to be highly impolitic, and the impolicy of which was shown by the subsequent rebellion of the Commons in 1520. Nevertheless, after the Pope had addressed Charles as King of Castile, and when he saw that the Prince was not to be deterred from his attempt, he used all his influence to further the plan, which certainly without his assistance could not have succeeded. After this usurpation the mad Queen of Castile disappears from the page of history, except for the use made of her name when the rebels, in 1520, vainly attempted to procure her signature to an instrument declaring that she had taken the Government into her hands. Had she done so, the success of the rebellion would have been certain, and, whether mad or not, her subjects would have reinstated her in her lawful rights. Many particulars of this insurrection and of the Queen's conduct at the critical moment, when a stroke of her pen might have secured her release, are for the first time revealed in the documents published in this volume. And the most difficult part of M. Bergenroth's task is to account for her persistently refusing to do what would have instantly secured her liberty. And though he commits himself to the statement that "there is no doubt that only a person of much higher intellectual power than the common average could have behaved as she did under similar circumstances," yet we are told that her aristocratic propensities induced her to look upon the grandees as her friends, and that in her tenderness for her son she was willing to forgive him the cruel injustice which she had suffered at his hands, and seemed to be "more solicitous for his interests than mindful of her own advantages."

This transaction alone proves, almost with the force of demonstration, the madness of the poor Queen of Castile; but it is, after all, only one of several formidable difficulties in the way of M. Bergenroth's hypothesis. We are called upon to believe that her father and her husband combined to represent her as mad when she was perfectly sane; that the father caused the death of the husband by poison, employing as his instrument the person whom he afterwards appointed to be his daughter's keeper; that after his grandfather's death the Queen's son, a boy of sixteen, kept his mother in a confinement which lasted for nearly half a century, knowing that she was perfectly capable of managing her affairs; that the Primate of Spain, the saintly Ximenes, connived at and abetted the proceeding; and that after his death the Cardinal of Tortosa, afterwards Adrian VI.—who, whatever might have been his credulity or incapacity, was a man of unimpeachable integrity—entered into the plot, knowing the real state of the Queen's mind. And lastly, there remains the fact that the Infanta Catalina, the posthumous daughter of the Queen, was allowed to associate with her mother from her birth till her marriage with the King of Portugal, and never gave the slightest hint of the real state of the case either during the time of her residence with her mother, or after she quitted her to become Queen of Portugal.

The most ridiculous part of the supposition is the idea that Queen Juana is a Protestant martyr. This idea is founded on the fact of her refusing to confess. The date 1497 is undoubtedly a little awkward for the Protestant hypothesis; but we are told that the Infanta Juana, if not a Protestant, at least rebelled against "religious doctrines which must either corrupt the soul or provoke opposition," and in consequence was put to the torture by her mother, in order to make her conform. It is worth while to notice that the only evidence of this is the assertion made twenty-five years afterwards by her gaoler, the Marquis of Denia—whom M. Bergenroth must believe to have been a consummate scoundrel—for the purpose of inducing the Emperor to adopt the same method of proselytizing. And now we have said enough to point out the principal source of M. Bergenroth's mistake. It is not the first time that we have had occasion to suspect that M. Bergenroth's prejudices would scarcely allow him to believe any good of Popes or Cardinals or priests.

THE CLARENDON PRESS CORNELIUS NEPOS.*

WE have again before us one of the Clarendon Press Series, and we find ourselves again forced to pass an unfavourable criticism. Mr. Thring's Principles of Grammar, which we lately reviewed, seemed to us to stand on an eminence of badness which could scarcely be attained a second time, at least in one series. Mr. Oscar Browning, however, in his edition of Cornelius Nepos, has done his best to save his colleague from any sense of loneliness on the serene height which he had reached.

In this edition Mr. Browning has contrived to err in many ways. He is guilty of at least three serious faults. He edits a work that is to be one of a series, but he does not proceed on any uniform method; he chooses a method of his own, but he chooses a bad method; he chooses a bad method, and he works it out with the greatest carelessness. However careful had been his workmanship, however good his method, yet still he would have been liable to the reproach of having in a series of school-books altogether disregarded that uniformity which should constitute its greatest merit. As it is, his work, being part of a series and yet not uniform, being badly conceived and worse executed, can be only consigned to that same doom which has doubtless fallen upon Mr. Thring's Elements.

Mr. Browning says in his preface:—

> Although Cornelius Nepos has often been edited as a classic of the Augustan age, the present edition does not pretend to be anything more than a school-book. The notes are intended for two classes of persons—learners and teachers. For the first I have thought it necessary to give such help as would enable them to learn the lesson with the assistance of a grammar and a dictionary. I may seem to some to have translated too many words into English, but experience has convinced me that a boy slowly learns the art of picking the right word out of a number given in a dictionary, and that translation into idiomatic English cannot be too much insisted upon from the first. For the teacher I have done my best to correct the mistakes of Nepos in history, and to notice his departure in language from classical usage. I have constantly referred to two books which are sure to be within the reach of every teacher, Madvig's Latin Grammar and Grote's History of Greece.

It is only too evident, from Mr. Browning's preface, that we are not to expect from the Clarendon Press that uniform series of school classics which has so long been wanting. Every editor is to do that which is right in his own eyes, and to execute his work in accordance with his own fancy, and not in accordance with any well-conceived uniform plan. The series will, it is true, be printed in the same type, brought out by the same publishers, issued by the Delegates of the Clarendon Press, and "bound all in cloth boards"; but with so much of uniformity, and no more, we must rest contented.

One entire and uniform edition of the Latin classics has indeed been brought out. Perhaps, however, the little use the Most Serene Dauphin made of it has acted as a discouragement to all further attempts. And yet we cannot but hope that the Delegates of the Clarendon Press may still supply the want, and fix on some methodical plan of editing the ordinary school authors. Why should they not hold a conference of masters—of masters drawn from the lower as well as the higher forms—and, after full discussion, lay down the general principles on which the editing should be done? They would distinguish carefully between the authors intended for the higher and for the lower forms, and still more carefully between the notes intended for the master and for the boy. They would fix on books of reference—some more elementary grammar for the lower forms, and some more advanced grammar for the higher forms. Not only would they have grammars referred to, but also exercise books; so that a boy might see how in his exercise book he had met with the same construction, on turning English into Latin, that now puzzled him in turning Latin into English. In the easier authors they would have everything done to bridge over that great gulf which is set between a parrot-like knowledge of the grammar and the application of it to construing. But while they build the bridge they would not carry the boy over it, but make him trudge across it himself. For the assistance they would render would not consist in translating freely or literally any difficult passage, but in referring the boy to that part of the grammar or exercise book where he could find a clue to the construction that puzzled him. In a word, they would throw as much of the work as they could on the boy, but at the same time would render him such judicious assistance that the master might, in case he did not know his lesson, reasonably punish him for his idleness, and not, as too often happens now, unreasonably punish him for his ignorance. How many followers are there still to be found of Dr. Johnson's old master at Lichfield School, who > "was very severe, and wrongheadedly severe. He used," said he, "to beat us unmercifully, and he did not distinguish between ignorance and negligence; for he would beat a boy equally for not knowing a thing as for neglecting to know it. He would ask a boy a question, and if he did not answer it, he would beat him, without considering whether he had an opportunity of knowing how to answer it. For instance, he would call up a boy and ask him Latin for a candlestick, which a boy could not expect to be asked."

Mr. Oscar Browning's edition of Nepos meets none of our requirements. Though claiming to be one of a series, it is not really so, as it is not executed on any uniform plan; though intended for beginners, half the notes and all the references are for the teacher; no elementary grammar and no exercise book are referred to; there is none of that assistance where the boy must meet his editor half way, and do half of the work at least; but there is a profusion of free translation, which even a clever lad cannot help using, and which a shirker bolts down. Some of these faults belong not so much to Mr. Browning as to the Delegates of the Clarendon Press. It is not his fault that, though writing for a series, he has been left entirely to his own discretion, but he is answerable for the bad method that he has chosen and for the careless workmanship that he has been guilty of.

We notice not a few misprints—misprints unworthy of the usual accuracy of the Clarendon Press:—

> At page 23 we find—dei Delphice responso.
> P. 32—impedentem evitare tempestatem.
> P. 37—Non tulit hunc satrapes, where the usual reading is, as the sense evidently requires, "Non tulit hoc satrapes."

Not to multiply instances of errors in the text, though we have marked others, we will now point out much more serious misprints in the notes, which indeed seem to have received but the slightest revision.

In page 167, in a note to Conon's Life, the student learns that he is first heard of as commanding at Naupactus in 413 B.C.;" in the next note he finds that Conon drove out "the Spartan harmosts from the islands after the battle of Cnidus in 324 B.C." It is not, we believe, common in the world's history to find the command of any general extending over 89 years. We may well exclaim with old Cato, "Nihil igitur afferunt qui in re gerenda versari senectutem negant." But lest the young student should think that Athens alone produced such tough old men, in the very next page (p. 168) he learns that "Agesilaus was sent into Asia in 396, and Tissaphernes was ordered to resist him, but, in consequence of his inefficiency and the intrigues of Parysatis, he was beheaded in 295 B.C." What a picture does this interesting piece of chronology present to our eyes! On the one hand, we see painted before us with one dash of the brush, the long duration of primeval life; on the other, the mild nature of the Persian monarchy, which, in spite of the intrigues of the royal spouse, bears with an inefficient general for 101 years. When the student has sufficiently digested these striking facts, and become accustomed to the prolonged age of the men of old, he is a few pages further on let into a still more interesting fact concerning the youth of those days.

In page 176 he finds this note:—"Adolescentulus, 'a young man;' he was then about forty years old. Adolescentia lasted from 17 to 40 B.C.; but there is no reason here for the diminutive." Oh, wonderful Timotheus! who, though he died in 359 B.C., as we learn from page 176, and again in 354 B.C., as we learn from page 59, still managed to be not only an adolescens, but an adolescentulus, though the period of adolescence lasted only from 17 to 40 B.C. Non cuivis homini contingit—it does not fall to the lot of every man to die twice; still less to be a youth after both his deaths, and, least of all, to have his youth begin twenty-three years after it ended, as must have been the case if adolescentia began 17 B.C. and ended 40 B.C.

We find on more than one occasion that the reading explained in the notes is not the same as that given in the text. In page 56, in the Life of Chabrias, this reading is given in the text of certainly a somewhat doubtful passage:—"Namque in eo victoria fidente summo duce Agesilao," &c. Now in the note to this passage (page 174) we find "Agesilaum; there is no verb to govern this accusative. Nepos intended to write 'perterruit,' but changed the form of the sentence; others read 'fidente summo duce Agesilao.'" We have scarcely ever met any act of carelessness that can be matched with this. Mr. Browning gives one reading in his text; when he comes to his notes, he imagines he has given a different one, which he proceeds to explain, and then calmly remarks, "others read"—what? why the very reading he has himself taken. We cannot refrain from quoting one more instance of the variance between his text and his notes, as it is an instance not only of carelessness, but also of that prudery which so often suggests the very thought which it aims at avoiding. In page 38 we read that Alcibiades "fuisse apud Thracas, homines vinolentos; hos quoque in his rebus antecessisse"; in the note to this passage (page 165) we find merely "rebus Veneris 'lust.'" The passage as unpruned by Mr. Browning for family use stands:—"Fuisse apud Thracas homines vinolentos rebusque Veneris deditos," &c. The only explanation we can form to ourselves of this curious fact is, that Mr. Browning revised his text later than his notes, and so they escaped the sensitiveness of that spiritual growth which seems to have occurred in the interval. Mr. Browning's pupils at Eton must, we presume, be far above (or below) the average run of schoolboys, if their moral nature can be offended by an expression so harmless (for the classics at all events), as "rebus veneris"; but neither Eton boys nor any other boys are made any the better by having their imagination set working by the suggestiveness of a note which shows that there is something too improper to stand in the text. The old Delphin editors could not have done a greater harm to morality than they did by marking in their parallel translation by asterisks the omission of all improper passages. These asterisks of course serve as so many convenient sign-posts to guide any one pruriently inclined in his search after congenial matter.

To pass from this subject, and from the inaccuracies which abound in Mr. Browning's edition, we cannot but find fault, as we have said before, with the very principle on which the notes are constructed:—

I may seem to some [he says, as quoted above] to have translated too many words into English, but experience has convinced me that a boy slowly learns the art of picking the right word out of a number given in a dictionary, and that translation into idiomatic English cannot be too much insisted upon from the first.

Yes, but it does not follow that because "translation into idiomatic English cannot be too much insisted upon from the first," this idiomatic English is to be supplied to the boy before he has even tried to "pick out the word in the dictionary." Surely the right course is to leave to the teacher the furnishing of the idiomatic English, and to give the boy all the help required for construing, by referring him to grammar and exercise book, by supplying links that are often omitted in the structure of a sentence, or by throwing the words more into the usual order. Mr. Browning may object that the teachers generally are not able to supply idiomatic English. If such is the case, they are hardly fit to be teachers, but at all events their deficiencies must not be remedied in such a way as to injure their pupils. In the more difficult authors these occasional renderings into idiomatic English no doubt are good, as the student already knows the construction of the sentence, and does not bolt down a certain number of English words as an equivalent for a certain number of Latin words without knowing how the several words are rendered. But this is not the case with those younger boys into whose hands Mr. Browning's Nepos will no doubt come as a wind-fall. There is nothing your lazy boy likes better than a free rendering of half-a-dozen words; the amount of dictionary and grammar work it saves is wonderful. Such a boy will find complete satisfaction for his wishes in Mr. Browning; but it is a different question whether his master will be equally pleased when he hears him translate from Mr. Browning's notes, "aut se illius fore proprium," "or whom he had devoted to his interests by an oath," p. 159; or, "quam vere," "how false was," p. 160; or, "indicatum," "in his recent acquittal," p. 160.

At times Mr. Browning gets more out of a Latin word or two than we should have thought possible, though Latin is, to be sure, a more concise language than our own. Still, it must be concise indeed, if the following (p. 164) is exact:—"Renuntiat"; "he declares the alliance between the King and the Lacedæmonians to be at an end." Even this is surpassed by a rendering further on (p. 180), "ad eum finem"; "to such an extent that, standing up, he could clasp his antagonist and prove his match." There has been nothing comparable to this since the days of M. Jourdain, and "Son Altesse Turque":—

Cleonte (en turc). Bel-men.
Covielle. Il dit, que vous alliez vite avec lui vous préparer pour la cérémonie, afin de voir ensuite votre fille, et de conclure le mariage.
M. Jourdain. Tant de choses en deux mots!

"Tant de choses en deux mots," we may well exclaim, for be it understood that the passages we have quoted above are not given as explanations merely, but are shown by the inverted commas to be meant for free translations. Free enough are Mr. Browning's translations, in all truth, but we must content ourselves with a few, and only a few, more instances:—

P. 168—scripta, "in waiting" (sic).
P. 172—quæ, "because."
P. 178—quibus rex, "by whom the King was chiefly influenced."
P. 179—quo conveniretur, "for the rendezvous."
P. 180—idem, "but at the same time"—ereptum, "by robbery."

With Mr. Oscar Browning we have done. But we must give one word of warning to the Delegates of the Clarendon Press. The work they have taken in hand is of no small importance; much that they have already done has been done well, but this is already the second considerable failure that we have had to notice. We can no more understand how they allowed Mr. Browning's work to appear than we can understand how they passed Mr. Thring's Principles of Grammar. Surely the editors of the series should exercise a real and strong, and not merely a nominal, control over whatever works they publish. No intelligent man who had read the first few pages of Mr. Thring's Grammar could have helped seeing that they contained a great deal of utter nonsense, just as no one who had glanced through Mr. Browning's notes could have helped at once discovering that they were full of the grossest mistakes. The managers of an important series ought not to look upon each work as entirely independent of the others, and upon each editor as altogether free from control. On the contrary, they should, as we have said before, after most careful deliberation, lay down the principles on which the various classes of works are to be edited, and then see that these principles are strictly adhered to. It is only thus that we can hope to see a progressive and harmonious series of school-books, in every respect worthy of the Clarendon Press.

THE DIALECTS OF CUMBERLAND.*

EVERY day destroys something of the peculiarities of our remote country places. A generation ago the speech and manners of the Northern counties were as different from the speech and manners of the South as if they had been countries absolutely foreign to each other. A Borrowdale "statesman" would have been as unintelligible to a Sussex yokel as a Frenchman fresh from Paris, and the rude pastimes of the dales had no more likeness to the homely merriment of the downs than if they had been Breton sports or Tyrolese amusements. But railways, and the penny post, and the incessant influx of travellers of all nations, and the increased circulation of the country folk themselves, and the bit by bit transfer of land from the old holders to new men, are breaking down all this rugged growth of isolation; and soon Cumberland and Westmoreland will be just like the rest of England, and as smooth and conventional as any part of the Home Circuit. The whole character of society there is rapidly changing. Moneyed men—foreigners or strangers, in the clannish speech of the autochthones—are buying up every rood of ground they can get, barren fell, fertile garth, redeemed intake—they secure whatever comes into the market; and the statesman, or peasant proprietor, hitherto the distinctive social feature of the dales, is passing away under the pressure of the cotton lords and successful speculators who tempt with long prices the poorer holders of the land. There is something sad in this, and yet doubtless it will be for the best in the end; but we cannot help feeling a certain regret at this absorption of so fine and marked a class as the Cumberland and Westmoreland statesmen, and the destruction of so many quaint and picturesque customs.

This little book of folk speech comes opportunely; for though it does not touch on many local customs, nor give any special account of manners or traditions, it has caught the exact spirit of the dialect, the run of thought and common talk of the people, and so far is invaluable as a faithful transcript of what it assumes to give. Few people are more competent to write on the subject than the present author. As a medical man, riding about the country far and wide, called into the remotest and most lonesome districts, and admitted into the very heart of the dalesman's life as no other stranger or educated man could be, he has had opportunities for studying the peculiarities of the people which only a country practitioner can have. Even a country clergyman does not get so thoroughly to the back of local life as a doctor does. Folks are shy of the priest, as they call him; they put on their best manners when he comes among them; and all the wilder and coarser part of the fun in which lies so much character, and which includes so many local customs, is hidden beneath a "menseful" bearing till he retires. He goes to a christening or "cursenin" say, and he has his sup of gin and his "Harry-lad-shive" of wheaten bread spread with rum-butter like the rest; or he goes to a funeral and carries away his "arval bread" like a gentleman born to the customs of the place, and does not eat it on the spot like an unmannerly churl; or he attends the "bidden wedding," and has his portion of currant cake, and offers his contribution as he is expected to do; but he sees merely the outsides of things after all; and it is only when he has gone that the real business of the gathering begins. He cannot go to a "murry neet" (merry night, or dance) as the doctor can; or stand by while the mysteries of the "cushion" take place; and when he hears that any of the female lambs of his flock have been guilty of a "sitten oop" with their sweethearts, he must frown down a custom which is like the Welsh bundling in form, and with the same result. But the doctor is not bound to be strait-laced; and a genial man, fond of studying human nature in all its phases, and not afraid of a little more "colour" than is to be found in the ordinary conventional drawing-room, has ample opportunities for carrying out his investigations. He is welcome everywhere, and sees "t' reugh side o' t claith" as well as the smooth. Winter and summer the ring of his galloway's hoofs may be heard in the solitary dales and over the bleak wild fell; when the little valley is choked with snow, which the wind has heaped up into high and dangerous drifts, he must still be at the call of every old wife who has a twinge of the rheumatics, and of every young one whose "bairn time" has come. Let what will be the peril and discomfort of travelling, he must go his ten or a dozen miles to the lone holding where perhaps his is the only face that has been seen for three weeks or more from the world outside the dreary and close-set fells. Indeed, many of the narrower gorges are almost impassable in the winter, and to be snowed up is no uncommon experience among the mountain valleys. We can imagine, then, how welcome the doctor is where his visits are paid, and how entirely the artificial barriers raised by society are broken down by this communion in the midst of pain and solitude. But the country doctor has one supreme temptation, one deadly enemy to resist and fight against, and that is the habit of drink which has ruined scores of our North-country practitioners. When he comes into the farmhouse, wet and dripping, or may be half frozen with the cold, we cannot wonder that the "lile soop o' gin" always offered is accepted as a needful restorative. This would be all very well if it came only once or twice in the day; but it comes as often as there are farmhouses on his list. Wherever he goes he is pressed to take just this one "lile soop"; and if he refuses his host is hurt, and he is regarded as a proud, menseless body, and a "danged seet owre stook oop for t' pleace-on him." The consequence of which is, that very few North-country practitioners who have a wide practice and a rough district keep sober, and that one after another fall away into drunkenness and destruction, slower or swifter according to individual constitution, but for the most part terribly sure. This, too, will be a phase of manners which will pass away when the dales are more thickly populated than they are at present; and one that can be very well spared.

Mr. Gibson has made an acute and accurate distinction between the dialect of the Southern side of the West Border, in which Miss Blamire, Stagg, Anderson, and others wrote, and which contains a large number of pure Scottish words, and those of High Furness, Westmoreland, and the centre of Cumberland. A glance at his glossary will show how many words he assigns absolutely to Scotland, and one or two anecdotes give the differences. Thus, under the head of ya, yan, Cumberland, and ae, yin, Dumfriesshire, we have the following illustrations:—

Ya is used when the noun indicated is named, yan when it is understood; thus: "How mony fwoke was theer?" "Yan!" "No' but yan?" "No' but ya man!" Ae and yin are used in the same way. The use of the first is illustrated in the conversation without consonants, which is said to have come off in a shop in Dumfries. Customer, referring to some cloth, asks, "A' 'oo?" Shopman assents: "Ou aye a' 'oo!" Customer again: "A' ae 'oo?" Shopman: "Ou aye a' ae 'oo!" That is, "All wool?" "O yes, all wool." "All one (or the same) wool?" "O yes, all one wool!"

By the by, why does he describe wudde, or mad, as Scottish only? It is a good Cumberland word as well; and though it may have been incorporated originally, still its length of adoption has naturalized it by this time. So with scrimp, which he makes only Shinburness." But scrow means more than this. "There's siccan a scrow on at oor hame," means a house-cleaning, or a domestic turn-out of some kind, not to be confounded with thrang, which is used for orderly purposeful work; as when "men are thrang at clipping-time amang 't hogs (sheep)," or at "shearing-time," which the south calls reaping or harvest-time. But the glossary does not assume to be exhaustive. It only deals with such words as are used in the tales and rhymes of the book itself; so that, though it is not in all respects quite correct, and though it does not give anything like the full number of provincial words in use, we may accept it without too much criticism. The illustrations of the words are often full of humour. Thus, under "Hantle, a considerable number or quantity," we have part of the Rev. Walter Dunlop's sermon to his Dumfries congregation, some of whom had joined the Baptists. "I thocht till ha'e gethered (ye?) under my wings, as a hen gethereth her chickens, but a hantle o' ye ha'e turn't oot to be deuks an' ta'en to the water." Miss Martineau's celebrated quotation is here repeated, but the venue is changed. She, if we remember rightly, made her informant a shepherd and the place the top of High Street. Mr. Gibson gives him as a boatman discoursing on the Ullswater weather generally: "It donks an' dozzles an' does, but niver cūms iv any girt pell." Many of the illustrations to the words in the glossary are evidently original—sayings that the author has heard in the course of his professional career, though he does not quote himself as the authority. Thus under iverly, everly or continuously, we find: "'How often do you take your ale?' 'Yall? I tak it iverly!' 'Iverly?' 'Ey, ebben endways away'"—as "part of a professional conversation." And under geàl, split, rend, ache with cold, is: "I've (it should be I'se) an oold teuth, when t' coald gits tull't it maks o' geàl ageàn," as "said to a Doctor"; with more than we can quote of the same kind.

The stories, or prose pieces, are the best in the collection. Joe and the Geologist, Bobby Banks's Bodderment, and Wise Wiff, are wonderfully clever and well done. The death-bed scene in Wise Wiff, when his father, forgetting the solemn tenderness of the hour, as well as roused out of a dying man's natural weakness, by his son's excessive grief, turns round and rates him as at any other time, is about as funny as anything we know of:—

"Wiffy, my lad," says he, as his son com in, leùken, as he thowte, mair sackless nor ivir, "Wiffy, my pooar lad, thy oald fadder's ga'n to leave thee. Whey, whey, gūd lad! it's reet aneuf thou' sūd be sworry to lwoase see a fadder, but divn't gowl i' that way," for Wiff hed brassen oot wid a meàst terrable rooar. "I say I hev to leave thee, an' that afooar lang. Hod thy noise, thoo bellerin' coaf, an' hear what I've to say," says t' fadder, as he got oot o' patience at Wiff's gowlin, an' went back till his oald hard way o' speakin til him. "Stop thy beelin, I say, an' lissen to me. I've had Jobby here browte ower, ebben o' pùrpose, to mack him promish 'at he 'll leùk efter thee when I'se away. Hod t' noise on the', wil' té! I'se leavin the' weel providit for, an' o' t' land mūn be let but t' Booin-eyes; thoo mūn keep them i' thy oan hand, thūrty yacre o' gûd grūnd. Thoo'll hev to leùk efter t' fences, an' t' yatts, an' t' water-coorses. Keep them i' order; an' keep t' plew oot o' t' land; it 'll give t' meast liggin t' green side ūp. Jobby 'll deù thy tradin' for the'. Dūnnot thee mell wid buyin or sellin. Leave o' that to Jobby, an' pay him whativer he charges for his truble. He 'll deù what's reet, will Jobby. An' noo I's aboot deùn. Gi' me yer hands, beàth on yé, an 'say ye'll deù what I till yè. Wilfrid! thoo'll be advised by Jobby. Jobby! thoo'll be true friend to my pooar lad, as if I was theear to see. Promish!" This was a langish noration for a body wid t' breath leavin' him, an' when it was done he laid back on his pilliver, an' leùk't at them varra wistful-like, till they promish't, an' it was a bit afooar they cūd, for by this time they war beàth on them yewlin, t' yan ower t'ùdder whedder to yewl t' hardest.

Any one who knows the Cumberland dialect and character can entirely realize that scene; it is the true touch of nature that always tells. In Bobby Banks's Boddermment the humour is broader, but very faithful in small details, though it seems impossible even for such a "gowk" as Bobby to forget his horse and cart, and walk all the slattery way from Keswick to Wythop, unable to remember what he had left behind him. But the anecdote passes for true, and "gowks," or fools, are not peculiar to the dales. The misfortune in all this local humour is that it is so entirely local, and consequently unintelligible out of the district. Very few people will dare to attack this odd-looking book, with its unusual accents, and its rude phonetic spelling; and if they do, they will not understand it if they have not had some previous education. But to those who can read it it is full of racy jokes and rich humour, and will afford infinite amusement when intelligently undertaken.

THE DEBATE ON THE IRISH CHURCH.

THE difficulties under which Mr. DISRAELI rose to move the rejection of Mr. GLADSTONE's Bill were undoubtedly great, but, after every possible allowance for his difficulties is made, his speech may be pronounced one of the worst ever made on a great occasion in Parliament. To say that it was paradoxical is to say nothing. Of course it was paradoxical, or it could not have come from Mr. DISRAELI; but it might have been sensible in the main, witty, or to the point. It might have given his party some clue to the principles on which he invites them to throw the Bill out. It might have put once for all in plain language such arguments as there are against the Bill, for the country to weigh and consider, supposing the country would take the trouble to consider any arguments at all on a matter which every one knows is now decided. But Mr. DISRAELI, either from design so that he should not be committed hereafter or from carelessness, or more probably because he was dumbfounded by the inherent badness of his cause, and haunted with the torturing thought that, after all, his political success had ended in making him the apologist at the eleventh hour of such an institution as the Irish Church, was beyond measure weak, vague, and almost maundering through his whole speech. A large portion of his time was spent in spinning periods of what, for courtesy, may be called rhetorical philosophy, which had no more to do with the Irish Church than a statement of the distance of the moon from the earth would have had. What possible light could any human being gather, on the question whether Protestant ascendency is to be kept up in Ireland, from a statement that Mr. DISRAELI has been assured by several eminent philosophers that the intellect of man is not of unlimited power, and that, in the opinion of Mr. DISRAELI, where the intellect ends religion begins? This is not saying much for religion, even if it is true, but it can have no bearing on the discussion whether it is wise for this particular generation to let the Church of a small minority arrogate to itself the position of a national Church. As to the historical assertions with which Mr. DISRAELI thought fit to ornament his philosophy every now and then, they are beyond discussion. If the leader of a great party likes to stand up and say that no political party benefited by the Revolution of 1688, that almost every gentleman holds his land under the Act of Settlement, and that the state of Ireland is no better than it was thirty years ago, there is no help for it—he must say these things, and as many more like them as he pleases. The last of these statements may, however, have caused some surprise to those of his supporters who imagined, from their recollections of Mr. DISRAELI's speeches last Session, that it was part of the Conservative case to argue that, as the state of Ireland was so very much improved lately, no violent remedies for Irish grievances could be necessary. There was, however, something darker in his speech even than its philosophy, and more random than its history, and that was its prophecy. To frighten everybody with terrible consequences if they take a decisive step is part of the legitimate Conservative policy in every department of life, and we have had a good many dismal prophecies of what will happen if we deal as is proposed with the Irish Church. But these prophecies, if dismal, are intelligible. Any one can understand what is meant when it is said that Irish Episcopalians will begin to agitate for a Repeal of the Union, out of spite to England, if their Church is robbed. This is intelligible to every one, and possibly credible to some few. But Mr. DISRAELI was not content with any commonplace terrors such as [illegible] people like Irish Conservatives could think of. He was determined to invent a grand bogie all of his own making, and the best bogie to intimidate the House of Commons which he could think of was this. If this Bill passes, he said, the clergy of the Established Church, who are to lose so much by it, will be very sore; and the Catholic and Presbyterian clergy—who under its provisions will in ten years, as he boldly assured his hearers, be a thriving, well-endowed body of men—will also be very sore, and the clergy of all the three denominations will join in asking for the property of the Irish Church back from the lunatic asylums; and they will be joined in this demand by the Irish landlords, who will have made, Mr. DISRAELI anticipates, a very nice thing out of the whole arrangement, for they will borrow the money to pay off the tithe-rent charge, and then decline to pay it back on the general Irish plea that money lent by the English Treasury to Irishmen is in its nature not repayable. But this is not all. As the lunatic asylums will not much fancy giving back the money, and as perhaps the Irish landlords will not press very hard to be restored to the privilege of paying the present rent-charge in perpetuity, they and the representatives of the different Irish sects will possibly, Mr. DISRAELI thinks, come to a handsome compromise with England; and, in compensation for not taking away the funds of Irish lunatic asylums, will accept the disestablishment of the Church in England. A more comic feature of the future of Ireland could scarcely have been drawn.

It is said that the debate is to last four nights, not that there is the slightest use in the discussion, but because so many members wish to speak, in order that their constituents may be gratified by thinking that they have got a member who has spoken on this great occasion. It is a great nuisance that the course of public business should be interrupted, and that the patience of Parliament and of all the readers of newspapers should be tried, by these declamations addressed to the absent editors of country newspapers; but we suppose it is an inevitable nuisance. There really is nothing to say on the Bill which can be worth hearing; and in order even to seem to have something to say that might not be seen on the instant to be worthless, Mr. DISRAELI was obliged to have recourse to all the strange arts by which he tried to create a suspicion that he in his wisdom saw evils and dangers which were not apparent to any one else. The principle of the Bill is what is to be accepted or rejected at the close of the debate, and all that can be said for or against the principle of the Bill has been said a hundred times already. The whole subject has been discussed for nearly a year, the nation has been asked to decide the discussion one way or the other, and has done so in a very unmistakeable way. It is voting, not talking, that is now wanted. When the time comes for the discussion of details, there will be ample room for discussion. There will be the question to decide whether the glebe-houses are given to the Church on the right terms. There will be the question whether the fourteen years' purchase given to Maynooth is a proper or an improper mean between the thirteen years' purchase given to the Protestant incumbent, and the seventeen years' purchase given to the Protestant curate. There will be the question whether such compensation as is to be given to [illegible] by the Irish county rate-payer [illegible] points [illegible] debating, and on some the Government proposal perhaps needs, and probably will receive, some modification. But as to the principle of the Bill, there is no room for more discussion. One side says, We wish to do justice to Ireland by applying to purposes that will raise no religious strife funds now applied to maintain an institution symbolic of the hatred felt by the conquerors for the religion of the conquered. The other side says, This is wrong, for it involves robbing a Church; and it is foolish, for it will do nothing to pacify Ireland, and will lead to a general spoliation of all property. If members went on talking for forty nights instead of four, for the benefit of local newspapers, they could not get beyond these elementary arguments. The debate, therefore, has no interest, because nothing new can be said in it unless it is also as untrue as Mr. DISRAELI's new things were, and the result of the division can be perfectly well anticipated. The only point of any importance that has been established in the debate is that the Opposition have been obliged to own, not only that they entirely miscalculated the feelings of the country, but that they were wrong in their confident anticipations that it would be found practically impossible to frame a measure for carrying out the Resolutions of last year. There has been none of the quarrelling over the spoils which Mr. DISRAELI said was inevitable. The Bill, in principle, is acceptable to the whole Liberal party and to the country at large, and if it is not perfect in all its details, it provides in a definite mode for almost every conceivable contingency, and effects its object in an intelligible and consistent manner.

Rumour says that the Conservatives may possibly cave in and that they will not venture to divide against the second reading. They may naturally feel gloomy about the Bill; for they can get no support, in the House or out of it, and they cannot contend against the wish of the nation and a crushing majority in the Commons. Plain men, too, must feel that it is no good fighting for a cause which their leader, in order to be able to defend at all, had to defend in such a speech as that of Mr. DISRAELI. Even in the Conservative party there are some who would vote against the principle of the Bill with much reluctance; and Lord STANLEY especially can scarcely like to show himself as the one educated man in a hundred who thinks the Irish Church can be kept up as the national Church of Ireland. The whole party may also concur in thinking that the sooner the Bill, if it is to pass, is got out of the way, and the Irish Church is forgotten, the better. So long as the question is before Parliament the Liberal majority is not assailable; but Mr. DISRAELI may calculate that there would be some prospect of the majority breaking up if other questions on which the country and the party had not so thoroughly made up its mind were brought into prominence. The day will probably come, for example, when Mr. GLADSTONE will try his hand at a scheme for settling the chronic disputes as to Irish land; and to deal with the land is more dangerous to him as the leader of a party than to deal with the Church, because his followers have not arrived at the stage of taking it as settled that to introduce exceptional measures with regard to land in Ireland is safe for Englishmen. There are then plenty of reasons to be found, without seeking very far, why the Conservatives should be inclined to let the second reading pass, and to avoid having it recorded by how great a majority the principles of the Bill are supported. But, on the other hand, the Conservative party would feel itself almost hustled out of existence if it did not divide against a Bill which it has opposed as it has opposed this Bill—which it has denounced as a scheme for sacrilegious robbery, dangerous to the Church and to religion, and to the security of private property. It is difficult to believe that Conservative members will decide to stultify themselves so far as not to protest by a vote, even though it be the vote of a minority, against a measure they think so wicked and so dangerous. The party too would be greatly disappointed throughout the country if their leaders were timid and easily beaten on so momentous an occasion. What would all the Lancashire and Shropshire clergy, who worked themselves up into assuring their parishioners that if Mr. GLADSTONE had a majority Protestants would again be burned at Smithfield, think when they saw the men whom they had worked so hard to return adopting in silence the principles of a Bill which would be the beginning of a new Martyrology? There is apparently no help for it. The Conservatives must divide and get beaten, and then they need offer no further opposition to the Bill, except such as is warranted and necessitated by the discussion of its details.

SPAIN.

THE troubles which have once more broken out in Andalusia will undoubtedly be suppressed, as the Government has irresistible forces at its disposal, while it possesses the support of even the Republican minority in the Cortes. The occasion of the disturbance appears to be the enforcement of that system of conscription which, in a heavier form, is patiently borne by nearly every other Continental country. The quota for the present year only amounts to twenty-five thousand men out of sixteen millions of inhabitants; but it seems that the liability to serve is generally unpopular; and perhaps resistance may have been encouraged by the violent speeches of some members of the Parliamentary Opposition. In France, although the phrase of "a bad number" drawn by a conscript perhaps indicates the real opinion of the people, the conscription, like every other institution connected with the army, has been surrounded by a halo of conventional enthusiasm. It is said that popular feeling on the subject has latterly undergone a change, but hitherto journalists, romance writers, and orators have habitually represented the army as the chief instrument of national glory, and have assumed that the domestic regrets of the conscript are swallowed up in his patriotic ardour. The still more comprehensive military system of Northern Germany is apparently sanctioned by public opinion. In Italy it is difficult to distinguish between spontaneous aversion to compulsory service and the results of the intrigues of the clerical and reactionary party for the purpose of exciting discontent against the Government. There can be no doubt that in Spain also the priests will cultivate, to the utmost of their power, any discontent which may be produced by the conscription. A year ago they were cordially allied with the chiefs of the army; but clerical influence over the Government disappeared with the flight of ISABELLA, while the military leaders of the day acquired additional predominance in the State. It is possible that the early prospect of active service in Cuba may increase the popular disinclination to serve in the army. It has been thought, not without reason, that the large share of colonial duty which falls to the lot of English soldiers would place an additional impediment in the way of any project of conscription. Spain comes next to England in the proportionate amount of colonial service; and the garrison of Cuba, which is large even in time of peace, has now attained the dimensions of a considerable army. Whatever may be the chief causes of the Andalusian disturbances, they are not unlikely to be repeated in other parts of the kingdom, especially as every town and country district contains the elements of disaffection among the clergy, the friends of the fallen dynasty, the extreme Republicans, and, in some of the Northern Provinces, the Carlists.

Before the beginning of the troubles at Xeres, the ordinary vote for the annual conscription had provoked angry debates in the Cortes. The Republicans, not content with declaiming against the conscription, or "tribute of blood," have invented the paradoxical theory that a standing army is unnecessary in Spain. It is indeed impossible to deny that some armed force is required, both to preserve order and to defend national independence, but the Republicans demand that the public safety shall be entrusted to the militia, and to the Volunteers of Liberty, who consist largely of the armed rabble of the towns. For similar reasons the French Republicans of 1848 insisted on the removal of the regular garrison of Paris, and on the enrolment of the population in the National Guard. In compliance with the demand of their supporters, the Provisional Government quartered the army in distant departments, and armed 400,000 National Guards in Paris and the neighbouring districts. The terrible insurrection of June was the natural result of the armament of a disaffected populace; and similar results would ensue on the withdrawal of all check from the Spanish Volunteers of Liberty. The Republicans are not mistaken in their belief that the power of the present Government rests principally on the army, nor are revolutions and administrations conducted by general officers consistent with genuine freedom; but at the present time no party is strong enough in the confidence of the nation to govern otherwise than by armed force, and disciplined regiments are in every way preferable to disorderly levies. If the Volunteers were properly organized, and paid at a rate sufficient to secure their services, they would merely constitute a new and more costly army, of which the chiefs would soon rise to the power which is now exercised by PRIM and SERRANO. The Ministers readily admit that it would be desirable to dispense with the conscription, if the state of the finances enabled them to attract voluntary recruits by the offer of adequate pay. For the present the Revolution, like all events of the same kind, has largely diminished the public revenue, both by the disturbance of trade and in consequence of the irregular abolition of some indirect taxes. The ranks of the army must therefore be filled by conscription, or the establishment must be largely reduced. In proportion to the population the Spanish army is perhaps the smallest in Europe, and the Government is fully justified in opposing at the present time any attempt to diminish its strength.

Señor GARRIDO, one of the Republican leaders, shocked the patriotic feeling of the Cortes by describing certain rebels who had been executed in Cuba as brethren who died in combating for their liberty. It would be difficult to carry factious perversity further, for the whole Spanish nation is united in the determination to retain the sovereignty of Cuba; and the friends of the Revolution more especially resent the occasion which was selected for the insurrectionary movement. It is obvious that if the army were crippled by the immediate abolition of the conscription, the rebellion, which, according to recent accounts, had been nearly suppressed, would become irresistible. Señor GARRIDO, indeed, asserted that the Volunteers of Liberty would, if necessary, go to Cuba; but there would be neither economy nor advantage in trusting to their questionable devotion. It is of the utmost importance to Spain that tranquillity should be restored in Cuba without delay, for American cupidity is bent on the acquisition of the island; and the most active politicians, encouraged by a unanimous vote of the House of Representatives, are urging on the PRESIDENT the recognition of the insurgent Government. The pertinacious clamour which has been directed against England for acknowledging that a great war could only be conducted by belligerents, will offer little obstacle to a repetition of the flagitious spoliation of Mexico. Like Cuba, Texas furnished by an insurrection a pretext for recognising the province as an independent Republic; the scheme was completed by the annexation of the territory to the Union, and the dissatisfaction of Mexico was punished by an invasion which ended in the conquest of California. The party which is now called Republican disapproved of the seizure of Texas, and of the Mexican war; but since its accession to power it has adopted the aggressive policy of its predecessors. Thirteen or fourteen years ago, Mr. BUCHANAN proposed to obtain possession of Cuba for the purpose of protecting slavery, and the opportunity of liberating the Cuban negroes is a still more plausible pretext for aggrandizement. It would be impossible for Spain to contest the possession of Cuba with the United States; but there may still perhaps be time to terminate the civil war before the American Government is prepared to interfere. The Cortes loudly applauded PRIM when he declared that the language of GARRIDO was offensive to the national honour. In principle PRIM accepted the condemnation of the system of compulsory service, but he declared that the army was for the time indispensable for the protection of the public interests abroad and at home. The disturbances of Malaga, of Cadiz, and of Xeres prove that the services of the army are indispensable for the maintenance of order. Many years have passed since the military force was employed in its present task of maintaining the constitutional authority of the Cortes.

The preponderance of the moderate party is every day more thoroughly established. The power of the Republicans is still further diminished by the adoption of an arrangement which, although it may perhaps be necessary, seems inconsistent with free Parliamentary discussion. All questions are to be considered by one of four standing Committees, appointed for the purpose, before they are submitted to the Cortes; and as the Committees will be controlled by the dominant party, the minority will be prevented from originating any measures. Some of the Republican leaders threatened to withdraw from the Cortes if the motion was carried, but the actual secession of the minority, which would greatly embarrass the Government, has not been hitherto reported. It is highly desirable that all opinions should be fully represented in the impending discussion on the form of government and on the choice of a King. The Ministers have at last made the important communication of their intention to propose a candidate for the Crown as soon as the principle of a monarchical government is adopted. It is possible that they may have taken some of their principal adherents into their confidence; but thus far their secret has been kept from the outer world. In a recent debate one of the Republican speakers insisted on the dismissal from the army of the Duke of MONTPENSIER, whom he described, in Spanish form, as Don ANTONIO of Bourbon and Bourbon. Admiral TOPETE boldly, or rashly, declared himself a supporter of the Duke, who was, as he said, properly called Don ANTONIO of Orleans and Bourbon. The Admiral informed the Cortes that it was only in deference to his own objections that the Duke had been persuaded not to embark in TOPETE's flagship when he was about to commence the Revolution. It had not been previously known that the Duke of MONTPENSIER avowed his share in the movement which precipitated his sister-in-law from the throne. His complicity may perhaps secure favour to his candidature, and it is known that SERRANO, notwithstanding his more politic reserve, shares the wishes of TOPETE. General PRIM, who endeavoured to correct the frankness of his colleague, was careful to assure the Cortes that the Admiral expressed only his own private opinion. The choice seems, since the name of the Duke of AOSTA has unaccountably disappeared from the list, to lie between the Duke of MONTPENSIER and King FERDINAND, if, indeed, there is any Portuguese candidate. The son of LOUIS PHILIPPE and the son-in-law of FERDINAND VII. will have to contend with much unpopularity, although he is personally well qualified to reign.

THE INCOME-TAX.

IT may be hoped, for the sake of Mr. LOWE's financial reputation, as well as on more serious grounds, that the report of an intention to increase the Income-tax is unfounded. The gravest error committed by Mr. GLADSTONE during his long and brilliant administration of finance consisted in his numerous and rapid alterations in the rate of Income-tax. It has been over and over again demonstrated, that a uniform charge continuing over a long series of years corrects the inequalities which arise from the varying relations of income and property; and it may be added that a low rate, by reconciling popular opinion to the tax, reduces to the smallest amount the fraudulent misrepresentations of traders. Sir ROBERT PEEL's rate of sevenpence in the pound remained for twelve years without alteration; but the high amount of charge produced a formidable clamour against the principle of the tax. During the Crimean war, partly under the pressure of necessity, and in some degree from a desire to avenge on the patriotic taxpayer the popularity of the war, Mr. GLADSTONE raised the tax to sixteenpence, which on the conclusion of peace Lord PALMERSTON and Sir GEORGE LEWIS were forced to reduce to sevenpence. On his return to office Mr. GLADSTONE raised the rate successively to eightpence and to ninepence, to cover the deficits of his Budgets in 1860 and 1861; and as the prosperity of the revenue revived he gradually lowered the rate until it was fixed at fourpence. It may be doubted whether the authority of any other Chancellor of the Exchequer would have induced the House of Commons and the country to submit to the inconvenience of constant changes; but the confidence which Mr. GLADSTONE had earned by his services was well-deserved. The fourpenny tax was cheerfully borne, and it seemed likely to become permanent, when the unlucky Abyssinian war compelled the Government once more to look round for a victim. The same considerations which suggested the rude beginnings of taxation still influence the policy of financiers. The Income-tax payer, unfortunately for himself, is in the position of a mediæval trader travelling along the valley of the Rhine, or entering or leaving the ports of the Channel. The robber barons levied tolls, not on those who could best afford to pay them, but on the owners of goods which traversed the river or the road within reach of their castles; and more regular duties were imposed on exports and imports where they passed, on landing or shipment, through the neck of the bottle. In modern times incomes are still more easily reached than goods, and therefore Governments prefer to dip their hands in the bag which is most insecurely fastened.

The late Ministry would probably under any circumstances have preferred the ready resource of an additional twopence in the pound to a laborious study of the plan which would have been most equitable and least oppressive. It also happened that, although Mr. DISRAELI was in office, Mr. GLADSTONE was in power, having a majority which, on financial questions, would have followed him with perfect unanimity. The nominal Minister was compelled to earn the approval of his rival by anticipating his decision, and it was well known that Mr. GLADSTONE's aversion to war always induced him to make the payment of military charges as burdensome as possible to the tax-payer. Accordingly, Mr. DISRAELI and Mr. HUNT proposed to pay the Abyssinian expenses out of revenue, and Mr. GLADSTONE justified their foresight by an affable support of their proposal. If the choice had been only between the additional twopence and an increase of Customs or Excise duties, it might have been reasonably contended that the proceeds of indirect taxation would not compensate for the derangement of trade; nor could it be expected that, in his precarious position, Mr. DISRAELI would incur the risk of a popular agitation. But for the fear of Mr. GLADSTONE, he might perhaps have resorted to the reasonable and convenient course of distributing the payment over five or six years by means of a temporary loan. In this way the outlay, though originally charged to capital, would have been ultimately borne by revenue, and in the meantime a troublesome disturbance of taxation would have been avoided. In a great war extending over several years it is proper, although loans may be unavoidable, to provide for a large portion of the expenditure by taxation; but the Abyssinian misfortune, though it has proved a dark and heavy cloud, had from the first the light behind it which showed that it was a passing evil. It was peculiarly undesirable to establish a precedent for throwing all extraordinary outlay on the payer of Income-tax, when Mr. DISRAELI had just before handed over the control of policy and finance to a class which pays not a shilling of Income-tax. Mr. GLADSTONE's benevolent desire to prevent war by making it disagreeable will but rarely attain its object if taxation and representation are permanently dissevered. Mr. BRIGHT's cheap breakfast-table, which means the addition of tenpence or a shilling to the Income-tax, affords a sufficient warning to indolent financiers. If articles of general consumption were relieved from duty, the working-classes would not be intimidated by the menace of taxes to be imposed on landowners and capitalists.

Three members at least of the present Government—Mr. GLADSTONE, Mr. CARDWELL, and Mr. LOWE—understand the theory of taxation on incomes, but Mr. GLADSTONE is perhaps too exclusively impressed with the belief that the income of the year is identical with the available wealth of the nation. It is true that local rates rise and fall with the demand for expenditure; but a tax levied exclusively on real property differs widely from a percentage upon income. A freeholder or permanent tenant, although he may be exposed to inconvenience, suffers no loss from the variation of the annual rates, but a temporary increase of the Income-tax falls with undue severity on the professional or industrial tax-payer whose income may perhaps be worth only two or three years' purchase. There may be persons who, having within the last two years earned large incomes for the first time, will relapse into their former condition through commercial changes, may be disabled by sickness, or may die. If the fulfilment of Mr. DISRAELI's anticipations had enabled Mr. LOWE to repeal the Abyssinian twopence in the present year, the recipients of incomes lasting only for two years would have contributed fifteen or sixteen times their due proportion to the expenses of the war; and the injustice would be owing wholly to the short duration of the tax, and in no degree to its amount. It is undesirable to provide taxpayers who have the secret of their own incomes with new and plausible pretexts for making inadequate returns. If Schedule D could once make a plausible case for total or partial exemption, the distinction between permanent and temporary taxes would soon be forgotten. A provident financier ought to approach as nearly as possible to absolute justice, if only because any inequality of treatment on his part will inevitably produce an exaggerated reaction. Mr. LOWE is not so enthusiastic a democrat as to anticipate with pleasure the transfer of political power to one class, and the unlimited liability of another to taxation. It is no part of the duty of a Chancellor of the Exchequer to alter the relative position of rich or poor by special charges or by exemptions; but Mr. LOWE can scarcely fail to foresee the attempts which will be shortly made to accumulate burdens on realized property, and especially on land. The proposal, which was merely ridiculous when it proceeded from Mr. WHALLEY, has been more seriously made in former times, and it will be renewed hereafter. As Mr. LOWE truly remarked, a WHALLEY Income-tax would be a bungling tax on property; and such a tax, whether bungling or the reverse, has long been imposed for State and township purposes in America. The possibility that it may be hereafter adopted in England furnishes an additional argument against the readiness of Governments to throw all occasional burdens on the payer of direct taxes.

As the minimum rate of sixpence in the pound is unluckily fixed, the controversy relates exclusively to the threatened addition of a penny; and it cannot be necessary to create disturbance and to perpetrate injustice for the sake of raising twelve or thirteen hundred thousand pounds. Even Mr. GLADSTONE's aversion to impose burdens on posterity would scarcely apply to the repayment of an Exchequer Bond in 1871. That year will belong rather to the present generation, who will greatly prefer a small loan, than to posterity; and, in default of some fresh war or grave misfortune, the country will two years hence be well able to pay off the amount. The Estimates of the ensuing year will have been reduced by two millions and a half; and it is almost certain that, after a long stagnation, the revenue will improve with the revival of trade. There is no reason for paying off an extraordinary liability in an unfavourable year of large expenditure and of diminished revenue. In former times demagogues contended for the taxation of the wealthier classes on the imaginary ground that they were in the habit of waging unnecessary wars for the purpose of providing their sons and brothers with promotion. It can hardly be alleged that such motives had anything to do with the Abyssinian enterprise, or with the extravagant outlay which it involved. There was but one opinion as to the obligations of national honour, and as to the total absence of any material advantage to be obtained. Mr. LOWE indeed is not likely to impose a fine of a penny in the pound as a penalty for imprudent patriotism; but he may perhaps, like his predecessor, be tempted by the fatal facility of drawing on the fund which comes readiest to hand. As an incidental consideration, he will do well to observe that each rate of percentage on income is productive in an inverse ratio to the amount. A fraud on the State to the extent of sevenpence is more tempting than an embezzlement of fourpence.

BELGIAN INDEPENDENCE AND ENGLISH MEDIATION.

THE contradictory rumours as to the relations between France and Belgium which have been in circulation during the week seem to leave two things pretty firmly established. In spite of the consoling assurances so obligingly offered by Imperialist sympathizers in this country, the subject has not been allowed to remain a mere piece of newspaper scandal. It has been deliberately converted into an occasion for the exchange of diplomatic correspondence and diplomatic interviews. The precise tenor and result of these communications are not yet known, but an attempt has certainly been made, and to all appearance made with success, to find a common point upon which the two Governments may agree. Whether this point is the rescinding, or merely the revision, of the draft contract for the cession of the Great Luxemburg Railway to the Eastern of France, is uncertain. It is announced, however, that negotiations have been entered into, and that the differences between the two countries are in a fair way of being settled. The second point on which accounts seem to coincide is that this settlement, whatever it be, has been furthered by some intervention on the part of England. Whether this intervention has been reduced to a direct proposal, or has been confined to mere advice, and, if the latter, whether this advice has been offered at Paris or Brussels, or has taken the shape of unsolicited counsel all round, does not appear; but Lord CLARENDON is universally credited with having had some share in putting matters in train for arrangement.

At the risk of being set down as alarmists, we are forced to say that the present aspect of this business strikes us as in some respects more threatening than it has been at all. Improbable as it undoubtedly was that the French semi-official organs should go on writing upon such a subject without having taken care to ascertain beforehand how their menacing articles would square with the EMPEROR's wishes, there was some small room for hope as long as this theory had not been contradicted by the event. Even if it had been false in fact, it might at least have been adopted by the Government as a concession to public opinion. Although the semi-official journals had been permitted for a whole month to assail the independence of a country with which their master and guide was on terms of nominal friendship, it was still possible that the EMPEROR might at the last moment see cause to disavow his agents. The really alarming feature in the transaction all along has not been the possibility of an immediate rupture between France and Belgium. The danger has lain in the precedent which will be established if the domestic legislation of the weaker country should come to be recognised as a possible ground for remonstrance on the part of the stronger. The settlement of the Belgian question may be as "pacific" or as "satisfactory" as possible without in the least affecting this view of the subject. There has been a Belgian question, and that is enough. It has been publicly proclaimed that, in managing her internal concerns, Belgium is not to act without consulting the wishes of her great neighbour, even when the military character of these wishes is only covered by a transparent veil. If the Belgian Legislature should hereafter presume to disregard the obligation, it will know that the laws it enacts will be virtually submitted to French supervision, and that they will not be ratified until the offending provisions have been modified, or some solid compensation has been given. This description of the future is nothing more than a reproduction of what has actually happened. Three months back a French Company proposed to buy a Belgian railway, and when the Government raised a very reasonable objection, the contract was pushed on with an insolence which would never have been shown if the purchasers had not been conscious that a greater than they was behind them. To meet this state of things, a law was passed enabling the Belgian Government to veto such transactions for the future, without unnecessary hardship on the shareholders of the line the sale of which might be forbidden. Thereupon the French Government takes up the cause of its own Company, and insists that a compromise shall be devised, and that, with this object, a Commission of some sort shall investigate the question in Paris. If Belgium will be content with the enactment of a general provision, without caring to enforce it in the particular case in view of which the law was passed, France may, perhaps, be satisfied. If the sacrifice is too much for Belgian feeling, France will make allowance for this misplaced sensitiveness, and will be content with some alternative concession to French susceptibility. This, so far as can be seen at present, has been the history of the last week or two, and if there is any distinction between such a transaction and a reserved right on the part of France to amend or cancel such acts of the Belgian Chambers as it chooses to call inconsistent with French interests, it has altogether escaped our notice. It is quite possible that the Emperor of the FRENCH, now that he has carried his point so far, will not show himself over-exacting during the course of the negotiations. A man who wants to establish a right of way over his neighbour's land may be quite willing to consult his wishes as to the precise course the path should take. His real object will have been gained when he has once been allowed to survey the ground. The pretensions now set up by the French Government are absolutely imaginary, and no moderation in urging them can alter this initial fault.

Those who look at the affair in this light will see only matter for regret in the fact, if it be a fact, that the English Government has had a share in bringing about so unhappy a consummation. We must not, indeed, in the absence of information, assume too hastily that such is the case. After all, a foreign newspaper is not always the best quarter in which to look for the truth about England, and the part which has been assigned to Lord CLARENDON may not have been really played by him. But it must be acknowledged that there are some features in his character which makes his assumption of it less improbable than it might otherwise have been. Lord CLARENDON is too much given to making the most of the points which two disputants have in common, and with that view he naturally singles out, as the recipient of his advice, the one whom he thinks most likely to listen to his ingenious demonstrations. A faculty of this kind may often be of extreme value. That large class of quarrels in which the blame is pretty equally distributed is exactly suited for such a mode of treatment. It often happens that a man will waive a great portion of his claims provided he can get a few of them conceded, and as diplomatists are human, a Foreign Minister like Lord CLARENDON has sometimes the opportunity of smoothing down a serious difficulty merely by showing himself an attentive and sympathizing listener. But to ensure this policy being a success there must be faults on both sides. Otherwise Lord CLARENDON's method will fail of effect. To the disputant, be he Government or individual, who has been wrong from first to last, he is the most dangerous of advisers. His unwillingness to range himself irretrievably with either side, and his disposition to assent to every proposition to which assent is possible, without much consideration of the consequences which may flow from his acquiescence, are just the features which may do mischief. The line he took about the Belgian Press in 1856 was an instance of this. His attitude in view of Count WALEWSKI's remarks on this point gave great and just offence to all who set any store by the liberty of the Continental press. The English Minister appeared as the humble follower of the Imperial censor, unable or unwilling to utter a word on behalf of free speech. And yet no exception could be taken to anything that Lord CLARENDON actually said. He agreed with Count WALEWSKI that newspapers which preach assassination are beyond the pale of journalistic impunity, and so far no honest man would care to quarrel with him. But, unfortunately, all the world knew that it was the independence, not the violence, of the Belgian Press which was so distasteful to the Imperial Government; that the true source of its irritation was the fact that Frenchmen might say in Brussels what they dared not say in Paris. Lord CLARENDON could accept the letter of Count WALEWSKI's remonstrance, and consequently, as the spirit of it was not visible on the surface, he could see no harm in going along with it. We are not without apprehension that his diplomacy may have taken a somewhat similar course on this occasion. No doubt the French Minister has put the grievance against Belgium in as specious a form as possible. In skilful hands even the grossest injustice can be made presentable, and we may be sure that the despatches of the EMPEROR's Foreign Minister have been filled with the finest sentiments and the most approved commonplaces. By assenting to truisms about commercial intercourse and neighbourly confidence, Lord CLARENDON may easily have impressed the Belgian Government with the belief that, in the event of a rupture with France, it must not look to Great Britain for aid. We do not suspect Lord CLARENDON of any radical unsoundness upon the question of Belgian independence. It has been left to a Conservative Foreign Secretary to devise the theory that guarantees cease to be binding the moment they become necessary; and if a French army were to occupy Brussels this spring, we do not doubt that the honour of England would be safe in Lord CLARENDON's hands. But if what is rumoured should prove to be true, we may be driven to the conclusion that, in his desire to prevent such a catastrophe, he has exerted pressure where he ought to have offered support, and spent his strength in persuading the Brussels Cabinet to give way, when he would have been better employed in reminding France that, if she has forgotten her obligation to respect the neutrality of Belgium, England has not faltered in her determination to defend it. We are no lovers of open diplomacy, but we believe that a judicious and incidental reference in the House of Lords to the binding character of the Treaty of 1831 would have done more to clear the air than any number of conciliatory counsels addressed to the wrong quarter.

MR. CARDWELL CAPITULATES.

MR. CARDWELL has capitulated—not in a very handsome or graceful way perhaps—but still he has capitulated. After a fortnight's worrying he has consented to produce the charter of the dual government of the Army, which he had struggled so hard to represent as a myth. It was scarcely to be expected that, after all he had said, Mr. CARDWELL would be willing to admit in words the existence of the warrant which he had so studiously suppressed; but to hold out to the last in ignoring the fact, while the Queen's Printers were at work by his orders in setting up the type for the information of the House of Commons, was a policy which we scarcely know whether to characterize as timorous or bold. Certainly it was not wise.

But leaving poor Mr. CARDWELL to enjoy the position in which he has placed himself, it is due to another member of the House to explain how this startling capitulation was brought about. In an article of last week we expressed a natural surprise that Mr. O'REILLY had (as we thought accidentally) omitted to ask the very pertinent question of which he had given notice, and we have received a letter from Mr. O'REILLY, who is anxious that we should withdraw any imputation of neglect. This we are most happy to do. The real history of the transaction entirely exonerates Mr. O'REILLY, and throws a curious light upon the tactics of the Minister. It seems that, when Mr. O'REILLY threatened to ask questions about the suppressed document, Mr. CARDWELL felt that it would be very embarrassing to confess vivâ voce to the House the existence of the dual government which he and his backers had so obstinately denied. To avoid this unpleasant position the Minister did the sort of thing which people generally do when they are driven into a corner. He offered to yield at discretion, and to give all the information that Mr. O'REILLY desired, by printing the authentic document itself. Only save him from a verbal confession of facts that no ingenuity could reconcile with what he had said again and again for the last week or two, and he was ready to capitulate. Under these circumstances it was impossible for Mr. O'REILLY to do anything but accept the offer of the Minister, and having thus obtained the production of the paper he sought for, it was no longer in his power to put the question of which he had given notice. Mr. O'REILLY, however, wishes it to be known that he intends on a suitable occasion to call attention to the remarkable paper which Mr. CARDWELL has at length, under compulsion, produced. And the paper is well worth a great deal of attention. It runs in the following terms:—

"Whereas We deem it expedient, in order to prevent any 'doubts as to the powers and duties of the Commander-in-'Chief with respect to the government of Our Army and the 'administration of Military Affairs, to express Our Will and 'Pleasure thereon. Now Our Will and Pleasure is, that the 'Military Command and Discipline of Our Army and Land 'Forces, as likewise the Appointments to and Promotions in 'the same, together with all powers relating to the Military 'Command and Discipline of Our Army, which under and by 'any Patent or Commission from us shall have been, or shall 'from time to time be, committed to, vested in, or regulated by 'the Commander-in-Chief of Our Forces, or the General 'Commanding Our Forces for the time being, shall be ex-

"cepted from the Department of the Secretary of State for "War.

"And We are further pleased to declare Our Will and "Pleasure to be, that all powers relating to the matters above "enumerated shall be exercised, and all business relating "thereto shall be transacted, by the Commander-in-Chief of "Our Forces for the time being, and shall be deemed to belong "to his Office, subject always to Our General Control over "the Government of the Army, and to the responsibility "of the Secretary of State for the exercise of Our Royal "Prerogative in that behalf, and subject to any powers "formerly exercised by the Secretary at War.

"Given at Our Court at Balmoral this 11th day of October, "1861, in the 25th year of Our Reign.

"By Her Majesty's Command."

There is the document at full length. Now what does it mean? But before closely criticizing its terms, let us point out what it clearly does not mean.

In the first place, it is obvious that, on any interpretation of the language, the powers of a General or Field-Marshal Commanding-in-Chief are not less "excepted from the jurisdiction "of the Secretary for War" than those of an officer enjoying the full title of Commander-in-Chief. It will not be forgotten that Mr. CARDWELL, in his answer to Lord ELCHO, affected to make a great point of this imaginary distinction.

Next, it is equally clear that the Duke of CAMBRIDGE—serving, as he does serve, under the terms of this Royal Warrant—cannot be honestly or truly described as an officer not appointed by a Royal Warrant, but acting simply under a letter of service. And yet this was what Mr. CARDWELL tried to make the House believe, and actually did make the Times believe. We need scarcely say that when he took this line the Minister did not know that he would be compelled, after a fortnight's fencing, to produce the evidence which would annihilate his statements.

We have a great deal of compassion for Mr. CARDWELL's miserable position. He seems to have been put into the War Office for the express purpose of preserving intact the dual government, which very few of his colleagues were disposed to tolerate. With this burdensome task imposed upon him, he thought the safest tactics were to deny, as far and as long as he decently could deny, that any dual government existed. By this policy he has tided over just one fortnight, but he has paid dear for the reprieve; for he has now to face the question encumbered with the reproach of all his previous statements, and to make the best fight he can whenever the subject is seriously considered, as sooner or later it will be. Of course he is safe to get a majority; for it is clear that Mr. GLADSTONE has taken the courtier's view of the subject, and is determined, at whatever risk to his reputation, to force that view upon the House. But the little skirmishing campaign of the last week or two will bear its fruits. It has not destroyed the dual government, but it has forced the Government to acknowledge its existence. This is no small gain. JACK the Giant Killer lost half his vantage when he fought without his coat of invisibility. The issue of fact is disposed of, and the issue of policy will follow in due time.

We do not lose sight of the circumstance that the warrant of 1861 is as ambiguous and contradictory in terms as we have always said that it was, and it is quite possible that Mr. CARDWELL, being no longer able to deny its existence, may fall back on the not more ingenuous device of suggesting that it means nothing, and that it has been wholly inoperative. This will be a dangerous point to make. If the warrant really means nothing, why was it ever framed? If it is wholly innocuous, why was it so studiously concealed? If it amounts to no more than the letter of service, why did Mr. CARDWELL attempt to make the one document do duty for the other? Men do not do and say questionable things for the mere pleasure of exposing themselves to observation. But the warrant, absurd as its phraseology may be, is in reality the charter of the dual government. Nothing could be further from the truth than to describe it as nugatory. Like all compromise documents, it has one clause which points one way and another clause which points the other way. But the two do not, on the face of the document, neutralize each other in principle; and, as a matter of practice, we know that the excepted authority of the Commander-in-Chief has ever since existed as a distinct power, wholly unaffected by the singular reservation of the prerogative in the second clause, except perhaps on one or two extraordinary emergencies in the course of the last seven or eight years. Neither Mr. CARDWELL nor Sir JOHN PAKINGTON, nor any other War Minister, will deny this, except possibly in the same Parliamentary sense in which Mr. CARDWELL seemed to deny the existence of the document which he has since produced.

The meaning of the warrant, notwithstanding its apparent contradictions, is, after all, not very difficult to make out. The first clause says absolutely that a large, and indeed the most important, branch of army administration is to be "ex-"cepted out of" the department of the Secretary of State for War. Taken by itself, this establishes dual government in the most absolute form—one of the two departments being responsible to Parliament, the other only to the Crown. Then, how does the second clause modify the result? It reserves to the Crown a prerogative right of interposition, to be exercised as all prerogative must be exercised, under Ministerial advice and responsibility, and it reserves the powers formerly exercised by the Secretary at War. These last were powers which no one ever could define, which were the subject of constant disputes between the Minister and the Commander-in-Chief for the time being, which were considerable when men like Lord PALMERSTON held the office, and insignificant under all other circumstances. The upshot, therefore, is that, subject to occasional prerogative interference, the office of Commander-in-Chief carries with it the undisputed control over all matters of command and discipline, appointments and promotions, besides such other cognate matters as may from time to time be added by the terms of any patent or commission. Probably, with this document before him, not even a Cabinet Minister will have the courage to deny again that the dual government exists in principle.

But what has been the practice? May not Mr. CARDWELL say that, in the actual working, the second clause of the warrant has been made to override and nullify the first—that in substance the duality recognised and established by HER MAJESTY has been destroyed by the vigorous exercise of the prerogative power which was prudently reserved to control it? After what Mr. CARDWELL has said, we do not know what Mr. CARDWELL may say; but we do know what the facts are, and we will state them as fully as they can be stated without going into petty details.

The whole organization of the Horse Guards is based upon the first clause (what we may call the duality clause) of the warrant. Salaries, of course, have to be voted by the House of Commons, like all other monies; but the Minister, as a rule, does not meddle with the establishment as it exists. In the exercise of the powers divided between the Secretary for War and the Commander-in-Chief, each of these functionaries is in the constant habit, by a sort of comity, of communicating his proceedings to the other in all matters which trench on the border line of jurisdiction; but there is no more an appeal from the Horse Guards to the War Office than there is from the War Office to the Horse Guards. Treating as two coequal powers, each extends to the other a certain amount of consideration, intermingled with occasional wrangling. In this way it is found possible to work, after a fashion, under a system which would break down utterly as soon as any strain came upon it. But this sort of comity and complaisance means the sacrifice of every administrative reform which may be unacceptable to the Commander-in-Chief, or, what is often much more serious, to the officials who surround him; and accordingly, whenever the Minister for War is desirous of improving his department, he finds himself constrained to omit from his interposition the whole organization over which his so-called "subordinate," the Commander-in-Chief, presides. A curious illustration of this occurs at the present moment. The War Department, and especially the Supply Service, is being overhauled and remodelled by Sir HENRY STORKS and General BALFOUR. A Report is promised, if not made, by which an entirely new organization is to be created, and all this activity has hitherto been restricted absolutely to the department of the Secretary of State, as distinguished from that of the Commander-in-Chief. It does not yet appear that a single alteration is allowed to be made, or a single suggestion to be breathed, as to the overgrown and overpaid establishment in Whitehall, which to a great extent is occupied, sometimes in obstructing, at other times in doing over again, or pretending to do over again, the work which is, or ought to be, done once for all in Pall Mall. And probably Mr. CARDWELL will tell us that this is not dual administration in practice, just as he has told us that to except command and discipline out of the Minister's functions is not dual government in principle. But then Mr. CARDWELL has such a remarkable power of statement.

THE GOVERNOR-GENERAL OF INDIA.

ALMOST at the moment of Sir JOHN LAWRENCE'S return to England the Government has introduced a Bill for altering and enlarging the powers of the Indian Viceroy, and attention is therefore naturally directed to the position which the Governor-General holds, and is hereafter to hold, in the scheme of English administration. Every year we make some change in this position, and the change is always in the same direction. The Governor-General is to have more power in India, but the Secretary of State is to have more power in England. Instead of a Board checking a Board, we shall soon have nothing but two men, each supreme in his own sphere, but with the man in India entirely subordinate to the man in England, where the two spheres are the same. No better system of Indian government can be devised if the two men in office are the right men; and experience shows that it is better to give a good official a chance of doing good, even at the risk of letting a bad official do harm, rather than cripple the energies of able and wise men by subjecting them to a control which keeps foolish or mediocre men in check. We certainly run most extraordinary risks under the system which is daily gaining ground. It is only by a sort of hazard that at the present moment India is not governed by Mr. BRIGHT here and Lord MAYO over there, who would have seemed beforehand two of the least likely and least suited of successful English politicians for the work. On the other hand, a short time ago there was first Lord SALISBURY and then Sir STAFFORD NORTHCOTE in England, and Sir JOHN LAWRENCE in India, and then the system was seen at its best. But even at its worst it is better than the opposite system of getting a Board here, with a dummy President, to rule another Board out there with another dummy President. Lord MAYO seems to have been stimulated at the outset of his career by the vastness of the power confided to him, and the new Bill brought into the House of Lords last week by the Duke of ARGYLL increases this power in a slight but incontestable degree. It makes the Governor-General independent of his Council on any occasion when he thinks that the question at issue will justify him in acting solely on his own responsibility; and all that is left to his Council to do is to place a record of the reasons of their dissent before the Secretary of State; and it simplifies the machinery by which the Governor-General can made regulations in the Punjaub and in territories under his immediate administration. Every one who spoke in the Lords approved this, and it is evident that the powers of the Governor-General will be from time to time increased, so far as any increase may be necessary to give him an opportunity of acting with vigour and efficiency in what may be termed the extraordinary business of Indian administration. Lord SALISBURY drew attention, at he has often done before, to the expediency of making a similar change in the English half of the Indian Government. The Secretary of State ought, he urged, to be advised, not controlled, by his Council. The Duke of ARGYLL combated this notion, but his reasons appear to us insufficient. There is of course immense weight, to every assembly of Englishmen, in the argument that the present arrangement has done no practical harm. The Secretary of State either has not been overruled by his Council, or, if he has been overruled, he has, like Lord HALIFAX, successfully vindicated his authority by proposing and carrying, as a member of the Cabinet and of the Legislative body, the very measure to which his Council objected. But the Council might not always be so reasonable. They might have a political feeling against such a man as Mr. BRIGHT, or a feeling of legitimate jealousy at being dictated to by such a man as Lord DE GREY. If they chose to make themselves disagreeable, they could hamper and thwart the Secretary of State in a hundred matters which he could not bring before Parliament, because he would not wish to use the extreme remedy of getting an Act of Parliament passed to override his Council in matters that to the outside world would seem of slight importance. Lord SALISBURY, during his tenure of office, met with support from the Council, even when he inclined to novelties which they did not much like, because, being men of honourable feeling, and capable of recognising the high qualities of their chief, they saw that it would be really for the welfare of India that a capable Secretary of State should have the opportunity of showing how he could govern. But a very little bad feeling, a tinge of mediocrity on either side, would have sent them into an opposition to their chief which must have been successful. Lord SALISBURY, it seems to us, is quite justified in saying that this is wrong in principle. The Council ought not to have this power, even if hitherto they have exercised it well. And it may be considered as quite certain that they will lose this power as soon as they cease to exercise it well, and probably as soon as they exercise it at all. If the Governor-General is to be independent of his Council on all questions which he considers important, the Secretary of State will claim most reasonably to stand in the same position.

The Bill also provides that the Governor-General may admit natives into the Civil Service when he thinks fit to do so, and may admit them without requiring that they shall go through the competitive examination by which Englishmen find their way into it. This is the best and simplest way of settling a question which has lately occupied the attention of Indian authorities. It seems only bare justice that natives qualified to enter the only profession in India which gives men of high ability and character an adequate career, should not be shut out of it. And to subject them to a competitive examination is to shut them out from it. Sir JOHN LAWRENCE conceived the idea of founding scholarships which should enable promising native youths to come to England and study here with a view to competing for places in the Civil Service. But although there is much to recommend this proposal, it has not nearly the same advantages as permitting the Governor-General to place such natives as he may think eminently fit in the posts which he thinks they will hold satisfactorily. The class of native who will send his son to a foreign country to receive an education among infidels cannot be the class that is most worth conciliating and rewarding by high appointments; and the sort of young native who would get into the Civil Service by competition would seldom be the sort of man we should really wish to get hold of. It will be a very rare thing, probably, for the Governor-General to put natives into any considerable post, but a few examples will encourage the natives, just as French soldiers are said to be encouraged by the poetical statement that every soldier carries a marshal's baton in his knapsack. But if it is desirable to encourage the natives, it is also most desirable not to discourage Englishmen, and it would discourage them if natives were admitted to the Civil Service who were not up to that high standard the existence of which gives its greatest charm to the career of an Indian civilian. The life of an Indian civilian is one of the most useful, honourable, and happy that can be led under the sun; and, as a body, these civilians are unrivalled for a high and conscientious love of duty, and an unremitting zeal for the interests both of the conquerors and of the conquered. It is much more important to keep up the standard that has been now attained than even to please and reward the natives of India; and the standard will be in danger of being lowered unless natives are selected, not only who are clever — for cleverness is a small thing, and thousands of natives are clever enough to do any kind of administrative work—but who are honourable men, and will not degrade the service by petty acts and intrigues and efforts to seek promotion by flattery, fawning, and calumnies.

The most eminent of Indian civilians has now come back to England, after having lived not only to attain the office of Governor-General, but to hold it for the full term, and to have discharged his arduous duties without any interruption from sickness. Sir JOHN LAWRENCE has concluded an Indian career complete and perfect in itself. He has gone on in a gradual succession of advancement, from the days when he was a promising youth at Haileybury to the moment when he is now on the eve of taking his seat in the House of Lords after five years of Viceroyalty; and throughout he has won his way by the same means—by indomitable perseverance, by self-reliance and courage, by indifference to giving offence, by simplicity of feeling and life, and by a great warmth and generosity in friendship. His Viceroyalty has not been marked by any striking events, nor has he been called on to decide any questions which have interested the English public. Every one knows that his administration has been successful so far that it has been absolutely unmarked by any want of success, but few know in what its merits have consisted. Put briefly, these merits have been mainly an avoidance of war and a care for the poor. He has resisted every attempt to plunge us into a war for the sake of guarding prematurely against dangers in Central Asia, and luck befriended him by getting him out of the only war in which he engaged—that in Bhootan—with more ease and rapidity than might have been expected. His genuine zeal for the interests of the poor has been shown in the efforts he has made to reform the gaols, to provide proper barracks and hospitals for the common soldiers, to make the railways accessible to the most indigent travellers, and to protect the cultivators against oppression by the upper classes in the settlement of land questions. It is quite true that neither a policy of peace nor a zeal for the poor is to be blindly praised. It is still a matter of grave consideration whether there are not points beyond our frontier which we cannot allow a hostile Power to seize, and it is quite as unjust to deprive an aristocrat as a pauper of his rights. All government is a question of time, of opportunity, of the balance between less and greater evil and less and greater good. All that is necessary or fair to say is that, during the particular five years of his Viceroyalty, the policy of Sir JOHN LAWRENCE was in the main just and wise. Not to be easily alarmed by distant dangers, but to increase the tenacity and force with which we hold our own frontier territories, was, it may be safely said, the right policy for the time. To set the example of an assiduous care for the humbler classes, both of Europeans and natives, was the best example that a Governor-General, at this crisis of English Government, could have set. Few will forget the coarse contempt and vulgar hatred with which many Englishmen, especially in military circles, used to speak of the Indian "niggers" in the years immediately following the mutiny. The feeling which prompted such language has in a great degree died away now, and no one has done more to discountenance it than Sir JOHN LAWRENCE. India has gone forward under his Government, and it has gone forward in the right path; and that this should be said of him is, of all things that could be said of him, the most likely to be acceptable to a man in whom the love of duty is much stronger than the love of notoriety or praise.

UNIVERSITY TESTS.

IT is difficult to understand the extraordinary, and as it seems to us the exaggerated, enthusiasm which the University Tests Bill excites in certain minds. That the subject which had precedence of it on Wednesday week should be discussed with passion is natural enough. A Cattle Bill affects the material and immediate interests of large classes of the community, and by a curious inconsistency marshals in opposite camps the advocates of cheap meat and the advocates of healthy bullocks But the changes introduced by Sir JOHN COLERIDGE'S Bill are, it might have been thought, of too moderate a kind to arouse much feeling in its behalf. That the opponents of the measure should be hot against it is intelligible enough. It has always been a distinguishing feature of Conservative Oppositions that they will defend an outpost as vigorously, after the citadel has been surrendered, as they did while it was still in their hands. To Liberals the identification of the State with a definite religious belief seems past praying for. They may regret or rejoice in the change according as their own convictions happen or not to coincide with the particular creed which has been dethroned; but they accept the fact. To Conservatives of the type of Mr. MOWBRAY the principle of an Established Church is as green and vigorous as in the days when it was supposed to be bound up with making men receive the Sacrament as a qualification for municipal offices, or with the exclusion of Roman Catholics from Parliament; and they maintain it in happy forgetfulness of the number of times when, on their own showing, it has been finally abandoned. But from the stand-point of the supporters of the Bill the change is a very small one. It admits Nonconformists to the governing body in the two Universities, and it removes one of the restrictions which now prevent them from getting their share of College Fellowships. As to the first change, it is extremely unlikely that it will, at least for a long time to come, produce any considerable effect. Both at Oxford and Cambridge the ordinary administration is very properly left to those actually resident—we wish we could say, to those actually working—within the local limits of each University. A mere admission to Convocation or the Senate will confer little more than a nominal right to cancel the decisions arrived at by this smaller body, and, even in regard to this right, the new comers will only constitute a very small minority amongst a mass of Conservatism which altogether defies leavening. As to the second change, the possession of a Fellowship is no doubt a tangible advantage to the young barrister waiting for business, or to the high-classman whom it enables to substitute the comparative repose of college lecturing for the greater intellectual strain of private tuition. But not to mention that the disposal of a certain number of prizes—which, so far as they can be enjoyed by non-residents, do not call for very tender handling—is hardly matter for thankful exultation, we are not aware that the existing tests have been found to give rise to any hardship worth speaking of. Without presuming to impugn the orthodoxy of a single Fellow in a single college, we may still say that in more than one of those societies the interpretation of the Anglican standards has not been so rigid as to exclude some diversity of opinion, at all events on minor points. Has any one yet complained of being rejected at Merton or Balliol on the score of doctrinal unsoundness? If so unique a specimen of theological eccentricity now walks this earth, he ought, as a concession to legitimate curiosity, to present himself for public inspection.

Besides, however, the ordinary assailants and the ordinary defenders of tests, there is a third class of persons with whom, though we regret their conclusions, we own to being more in sympathy. They do not declare themselves satisfied with a mere formal signature of a document which can hardly be said to express the opinions of a single member of the Church of England, and yet they feel a natural alarm at the surrender of the solitary hold which denominationalism now has upon Oxford and Cambridge. They rightly hold that a really undenominational education is, in many of the higher studies, a practical impossibility. In history or moral philosophy, for example, however careful a professor may be to state facts fairly, the conclusions he has himself drawn from them will necessarily colour his teaching. Whatever may be the professed character of the institution in which he lectures, his own influence on his class will be distinctly denominational—using the term, of course, in that wide sense which includes the positive side of negative convictions. Mr. BEESLY, for example, is Professor of History in an undenominational College, but no one can read the extremely original views of his subject occasionally put forth by him without drawing a very definite inference as to the nature of his religious opinions. Mr. BEESLY is not a man to whom creeds are a matter of indifference; on the contrary, he is, in a certain sense, a profoundly theological writer, and, if the students who come under his influence are unconscious of the fact, they must be quite incapable of appreciating the very striking lessons presented to them. Similar instances might easily be multiplied, and the enemies of denominational education have, so far as we can see, no real answer to the argument these instances suggest. When Dr. PUSEY and Mr. LIDDON proclaim their alarm at the action of Sir JOHN COLERIDGE'S Bill upon the Universities, they mean, not that they are afraid of a colourless education, but that they are afraid of an education tinged with a distinctly hostile hue. You may prohibit the exclusive teaching of Anglicanism, but how are you to prohibit the accidental teaching of Comtism? They are themselves ready with a proposal which will shut the door, they think, against this danger. The University they are willing to abandon. The feeling against any restriction on the choice of Professors is too strong to be resisted. Sir ROUNDELL PALMER'S proposed test is so sure to be rejected, that it is scarcely necessary to express any opinion on its merits. But some at least of the Colleges might be retained by the sacrifice of a part of the endowments. The highest ideal Dr. PUSEY now hopes to see attained is a mixed University with denominational Colleges, and to secure this he would give up a fair proportion of the existing foundations to Dissenters, to Roman Catholics, and even to Secularists; or, if it seemed more practicable, he would found new Colleges for their use out of the revenues of which the Anglican Church has now the exclusive enjoyment. In this way he considers that the principle of definite religious teaching would be secured without the reservation of any exceptional privilege to the Established Church.

As regards the end to be kept in view we believe that this scheme is substantially right. A mixed University with denominational Colleges not only suggests itself as an obvious compromise between the conflicting theories on the subject, but is in itself the best solution of a real difficulty. A denominational University becomes more and more of an impossibility every day. It simply means an indefinite multiplication of Universities, and in the long run this is almost certain to involve a mutual competition for students which would tend directly to the lowering of the standard of education. Denominational Colleges are not open to this objection, because the standard is fixed by the University to which they are affiliated, and denominational zeal would only render the respective Colleges more careful to make and keep their place in the common examinations. The real question, however, is whether this end can be attained. By the method suggested by Dr. PUSEY we are quite sure that it cannot. In the first place, such a settlement would meet with scarcely any effective support. Even of the High Church party only a fraction would accept it, while the larger part would insist upon following Mr. MOWBRAY in a blind adherence to the existing system. The Liberal party within the Universities would be opposed to it, since its members, with scarcely an exception, belong to that school of Liberalism which regards denominationalism as the one heresy to which no toleration should be accorded. The Dissenters, who would in some respects be the chief gainers by it, met it, when it was proposed last autumn, with a scarcely qualified hostility. If the persons specially interested in the matter are all antagonistic, is there any chance of the public generally being better disposed towards the scheme? Surely the whole lesson of the recent elections is that the day of State endowments for religious purposes is past, and that educational foundations, unless of very modern date, will all be counted among State endowments. It will be seen that our objection to Dr. PUSEY's proposal is of a quite different kind from that entertained by Sir ROUNDELL PALMER. In the sense in which he applied the quotation, we have no expectation that

> The darkest day,
> Live till to-morrow, will have passed away.

"I want," he said, on Monday, "to keep all the Colleges for "the Church of England in the sense in which that Church has "a legitimate right to them." He hopes to do this by virtue of "the moral obligation of the permanent regulations of the "Colleges which form the basis of the agreement which a man "has entered into with the society of which he is a member." Such an expectation, however fair and right in itself, leaves out of sight the immense probability that some of the leading Colleges will at once abrogate or modify these "permanent re-"gulations," so far as they bear upon the nominal necessary Anglicanism of their fellows. Sir ROUNDELL PALMER's "moral "obligations" have already ceased to bind in the spirit and will soon cease to bind in the letter.

Our own conviction is, however, that the very measure to counteract which the idea of denominational Colleges was started may be made a means of carrying it out. The University Tests Bill does not propose to interfere with the liberty of the several corporations; it simply removes a particular restriction imposed by Act of Parliament. As Sir JOHN COLERIDGE said, in moving the second reading, "it leaves the "Colleges controlled by their statutes, by the feelings of their "members, and by all the associations which gather round "them." In the freedom of action thus secured to each separate society there may be the germ of a practical settlement of the whole question, on a basis not radically different from that devised by Dr. PUSEY and Mr. LIDDON. Supposing that upon the passing of the Bill several, or even a majority, of the Colleges proceed to revise their statutes and throw open their fellowships to persons of all religions. It is possible that in some cases this may be done without removing the present tests in the case of tutorships, and as long as non-resident fellowships are suffered to exist, the educational character of a College will be little affected by such an amount of relaxation. Probably, however, the change will be more sweeping, and a College modifying its statutes may virtually cease to be in any sense a place of religious education. But, as a consequence of this, the doctrinal tests in those Colleges where they are maintained will gradually assume a new character. As things are now, they are practically valueless. The public opinion of the University does not censure a man who, disbelieving in a personal God, and thinking the immortality of the soul at most an open question, presents himself as a candidate for a fellowship, and is prepared to sign the articles in the event of his election. The whole value of a test of this sort depends upon the extent to which it binds individual consciences. No College can reject a man, otherwise qualified, on account of his religious opinions, so long as he is willing to make the required subscriptions; so that now these have lost their efficacy, the lay fellowships at Oxford and Cambridge are, in practice, open to all except Roman Catholics, or Dissenters of exceptional strictness. But the fact that tests are abolished in some Colleges and kept on foot in others will at once restore their meaning. Public opinion may be trusted no longer to sanction a disregard of them when the Colleges which impose them are known to do so as a matter of principle, not because the Act of Uniformity leaves them no choice in the matter. No man, for example, would dream of presenting himself for election at the Keble College who was not genuinely a member of the Church of England, and when each society is left free to frame its constitution for itself, a similar feeling will grow up in reference to those which assume an equally defined position.

THE REFORM LEAGUE.

MR. BEALES and the Reform League have at last had the good sense to see that their time is gone by. Their importance culminated with the Hyde Park riot; and, as the London mob became less and less inclined to disturbance, their function dwindled and died. Government by Clubs has never thriven permanently in England, because the House of Commons has always represented the nation by general consent or acquiescence, as well as by constitutional right. The power which is from time to time assumed by self-elected agitators is derived exclusively from their real or supposed ability to promote seditious movements. The debates in the Council of the Reform League were below contempt, and no moral authority attached to its expressions of opinion; but for a year or two it was doubtful whether Mr. BEALES and his associates might not successfully abuse the exceptional liberality of English law. In any other country in Europe their street assemblages would have been prohibited, or, if necessary, dispersed by force; but English history justifies the assumption of voluntary deference to law, although demagogues may now and then succeed in defying a society which has provided insufficient securities for the maintenance of order. When the short period of anarchy had elapsed, the Reform League, misapprehending its own resources, endeavoured to assert for itself the position which the Jacobins and Cordeliers occupied by the side of the French Assembly and Convention; but agitation languishes in times of political tranquillity, and the general election proved that the Council could exercise no influence over a single constituency. As it was found impossible to meet the modest expenses of the organization, some hasty Reformers candidly proposed an alliance with the Tories which might bring stingy Liberals to their senses. Mr. BEALES, although he may possibly have had personal reasons for retirement, was the first to desert the sinking ship; and his colleagues were all but simultaneously convinced that it was no longer possible to continue their organization. After devolving on a surviving Committee the duty of beginning a new agitation whenever circumstances may favour the attempt, the Council, in the name of its real or imaginary constituents, has dissolved itself with a final flourish to the effect that the necessity for its existence has ended with the accomplishment of its objects. Although the League has not succeeded in establishing the universal suffrage which formed its principal purpose, there is a certain colour of truth for its dying professions of satisfaction. One of the many conditions which rendered Mr. DISRAELI's Reform Bill possible was the downfall of the Hyde Park railings.

The League and its President had for some time vegetated in obscurity when the opportunity arose which made them famous. In the debates on the Reform Bill of 1866 Mr. LOWE had imprudently taunted the working-classes with their indifference to Reform; and Mr. BRIGHT had suggested that the population of London should assemble in the neighbourhood of the Houses of Parliament, to contradict the imputation, and perhaps to show their numbers. Mr. BEALES and his club, with creditable adroitness, undertook to provide the machinery for a popular exhibition of force, and, after two or three tentative obstructions of the streets, they determined to exhibit their numbers on the spot where they would cause the greatest alarm to the peaceable community. It may be confidently asserted that open-air political meetings in a city with three millions of inhabitants are incompatible with order and with liberty, for even if the promoters of the movement desired to conform to the law, they could exercise no control over the promiscuous rabble. Although Mr. BEALES may have wished to intimidate the Government, he would certainly have deprecated the breaking of windows, and yet at some of his meetings windows were broken. The selection of Hyde Park was ingeniously mischievous, for, although the mob were trespassers, there is in England no effective law of trespass, so that there was a zest of illegality about the proceeding, without any serious risk of penal consequences. The head of the police was in some degree responsible for the disgraceful riot which ensued, inasmuch as he caused reasonable irritation by admitting carriages and horses into the Park when the gates were closed to the multitude; and also because he undertook to defend with an insufficient force an utterly indefensible position. There is no reason to suppose that the ringleaders had foreseen the damage which was done; but their noisy exultation in their supposed triumph renders them justly responsible for the misdeeds of their followers. Having baffled the guardians of public order, they announced their intention to assemble the mob once more in Hyde Park; and through the weakness of an amiable Minister Mr. BEALES was enabled to undertake, with condescending moderation, the maintenance of the public peace. The Reform League had discovered the not very recondite secret of State that, when custom and public opinion discourage the employment of military force, any demagogue who can muster a rabble at his heels may for a time defy the Government. Mr. BEALES has frequently boasted that, if Mr. WALPOLE had not yielded, the streets of London would have run with blood; and he has never seemed to understand that the hypothetical crime which he attributes to himself would have been unpardonable, if only it had been committed.

The unexpected success of the Hyde Park disturbance induced local agitators to hold large meetings in many of the great towns during the following autumn; but the multitudes which assembled at Birmingham, at Glasgow, or at Leeds laboured under the disadvantage of having neither a Government nor a Parliament at hand to be frightened. It was felt that the London Reform League enjoyed a great advantage in its central position; and at one of the provincial meetings Mr. BRIGHT announced that on a certain day in November five hundred thousand men would prove by their presence in the streets of London that the people were determined on a reform of Parliament. Although the greatest efforts were made to render the so-called demonstration formidable, only a few thousands of men passed in a harmless procession from the East of London through Piccadilly to Chelsea. In the spring of 1867 a meeting held in Hyde Park without opposition from the police attracted so little attention, that the League ceased from that time to rely upon its power of collecting mobs. About the same time a rival club, under the title of the National Reform Union, was formed to represent a milder shade of Radicalism; but the League, appealing more strongly to revolutionary sympathies, has survived its Girondist competitor. As neither association exercised any influence over public opinion by argument, by eloquence, or by authority, the body which had once alarmed respectable people by exhibiting the physical force of the London rabble was justly entitled to preference over a mere debating society.

Although Mr. BEALES, as the principal leader of the defunct Reform League, has done some mischief and attempted more, he is probably entitled to the humble credit of honesty and good intentions. An enthusiast, not for liberty, but for nominal democracy, he has repeatedly contended with apparent sincerity that France, with its universal suffrage, was more truly free than England. Provided that all men vote, it seems to matter little whether those for whom they vote are elected to legislate on minor matters, or to govern the policy of the country at home and abroad. When the Spanish Revolution had been effected by the army, Mr. BEALES and his League once more jumped to the conclusion that England was left behind in the career of liberty, by a community which had scarcely emerged from a military and superstitious despotism. The good faith of Mr. BEALES's admiration for all forms of revolution was illustrated by his simultaneous sympathy with GARIBALDI and with the disaffected Irish. Until his proposals to extend the organization of the League to Ireland were contumeliously rejected, he had probably never discovered that Roman Catholic agitators hold no intercourse with the enemies of the POPE. Although the occupation of a demagogue is culpable and disreputable in proportion to the freedom of the Constitution which he endangers, it is satisfactory to observe the comparatively inoffensive nature of the dwarfed and stinted variety which represents the species in England.

> Squameus in spiram tractu se colligit anguis.

Belgian students cannot hold a meeting without resolving to abolish all forms of religion. French agitators, tolerated for a time in the hope that the middle classes may be frightened into Imperialism, denounce marriage and property, and threaten the decent part of the population with massacre. Spanish Municipal Juntas distribute private estates among the poor, beginning with the property of foreign residents. Geneva Peace Congresses, under the auspices of GARIBALDI, proclaim universal war against existing Governments; and societies of workmen in all parts of Europe demand the spoliation and destruction of capitalists. By the side of Continental anarchists, the Reform League almost assumes the character of a Conservative Association. Mr. BEALES and his colleagues never coiled themselves up for a spring against all law, all religion, and all Government. They only clamoured for the Ballot, which now finds favour in the Cabinet and the House of Commons, and for universal suffrage, which is, with all its numerous demerits, a legitimate subject of political discussion. Their error consisted in their attempt to substitute force or terror for constitutional modes of action. The malignant brawlers of the Paris Redoute are for the present allowed to prattle, because the Government is prepared to crush them if they attempt to put their theories in operation. The wildest declamations of the Reform League would have been thought absurdly tame at a meeting of French democrats; but the demolition of a yard of park-railings would have been followed in Paris by a charge of cavalry, and by sentences of penal servitude or transportation. Freedom, with the mildness or laxity which attends it, rests on the loyalty of all classes to the law. The ungenerous misuse of liberty is in the first instance almost always successful, as a player may often win an inglorious victory by disregarding the rules of the game. The English Constitution received a perceptible though transient shock from the proof that it included no practical safeguard against the paltry riot in Hyde Park.

THE POWER OF THE MIND TO RESIST KNOWLEDGE.

IGNORANCE is a very favourite topic; we charge ourselves, our friends, our enemies with it, as a ready and stereotyped accusation; but it may be doubted whether it is attributed as often as it ought to be to the mind's active energies. Not only should all of us know more if we learnt more—if we applied our minds more sedulously, if we conquered our indolence, if we roused our dormant powers—but we should know indefinitely more if we did not treat knowledge as an enemy, if we did not sedulously resist its inroads. The power of the human mind to resist knowledge is not duly considered in treating the subject. We are so used to the result that we do not sufficiently note the cause. As regards a good deal of the ignorance that is in and about us, the difficulty is to discover how men contrive not to know; and we observe that a very resolute will must have been at work. We do not see that any effort whatever would have been needed to take in certain ideas. An ordinarily intelligent mind that was not preoccupied could not help receiving them—as, for instance, the forms and qualities of objects continually before our eyes, or simple facts stated within our hearing; rather, the effort must have been applied to shut them out, to prevent thought and reason exercising themselves upon them. We often fail to do justice to our own cleverness. In fact, men and women can always learn what they honestly want to know—what they want to know in preference to other indulgences.

All people receive willingly congenial knowledge; what they reject is either that which finds no place for its reception, or that which is unwelcome at the time from the mind's being otherwise occupied, whether by another train of thought or in the agreeable pursuit of fancy. We do not of course mean imagination at work in any laborious sense, but a devious, aimless self-abandonment to every suggestion that comes uppermost. Minds given to reverie are not passively, but actively, averse to knowledge; anything that interferes with the promptings of the moment, that arrests thought, that lays some force upon inclination, is repulsed instinctively as an enemy. It is astonishing how this enmity to ideas grows with indulgence, till it is next to impossible to find a place for facts, opinions, thoughts, or speculation in any sense that demands the faintest effort—in a word, for whatever threatens to arrest the trumpery procession of vague images. In such a state of the faculties nothing interests a man that has not some personal relation; nothing can be received that is new or so far abstract that it cannot be turned on the spot into a question of self. Of course an all-absorbing pursuit may possess the mind like reverie. No one can do great things in science or art without his mind being occupied to the forcible exclusion of uncongenial knowledge. But laziness and folly have more abstractions than thought and genius, and hug their lucubrations with a more resolute clutch. The man who is pleasantly engaged on the oft-conned problem of how to keep a horse, or when and where he is to make his first speech, or otherwise show himself a fine fellow, or in planning schemes of amusement, or reckoning up his expenses and means of defraying them, or his chances of an inheritance, is quite as steadily opposed to a bit of information that has no relation to any of these questions as if it sought to thrust itself into the midst of profounder speculations.

It is easy to perceive that to some young people the whole world of thought is a blank, that it excites in them feelings of positive repulsion and abhorrence; and if this be so in youth, there is little chance that mere growth in years will bring about any change that shall effect a reconciliation. If men are to think to any purpose, they must learn to think when young. But, we repeat, it is not native power that is wanting. Take the girl whose head is full of dress, and who is always contriving how to set herself off to what she thinks the best advantage. So long as this taste is ministered to, her attention is alive, her apprehension is quick, her fancy suggestive. She is clever, receptive, laborious. She can take in the most complex description, she can picture to herself the most elaborate effects. She is imbibing new ideas every moment; she is apt, open, liberal, industrious; she is in the state to learn a science or a language, chronology or chemistry. What she is doing is only less difficult than graver studies because it is more congenial. To detect real from false, to appraise a fabric to a nicety, to take in at a glance a thousand details, are feats of the intellect not less remarkable in their nature than those of the naturalist who knows the note and flight of birds, and the habits of insects. Set him upon the young girl's pursuits which are her pastime, and he will be as unteachable and reluctant as she will probably show herself towards his studies; and for the same reason—unteachable because reluctant. It is the wish to know, not the power to learn, which is the desideratum.

There can be no more irksome task to many minds than to address themselves to subjects which require from them accuracy of information. This is one of the reasons why questions are often so intolerable. They awaken people to the fact that they know nothing; which matters little so long as they themselves are the only losers, for if they know nothing it is because they preferred to know nothing; but it is a bore to be expected to know, and exposure is always a nuisance. Many persons who travel guard themselves jealously against the acquisition of new ideas; they are so tiring; they seem to stretch the mind hither and thither out of all its bearings. "Oh for a shop window!" they seem to cry, in the midst of museums and galleries, "for something familiar, some link between myself and what I see." Everybody knows this feeling more or less; it is a revolt against new knowledge, a taking refuge in our weaker selves, which is perfectly justifiable in its degree. Certainly inquiring minds are apt to be bores; people that will pursue and get to the bottom of subjects are great disturbers of the peace, unless this curiosity on their part is qualified by more sympathy than commonly belongs to it. It is well to tell children, "Never submit to be ignorant when you have knowledge at your elbow"; but it an axiom which requires modification in general society, where as we have said, few persons are ignorant in an exceptional degree unless because they like it. These probers ought to know that most people like to think as little as they are compelled to think; that to fix or nail the mind on a subject is utterly alien to many an intelligence which is bright and active enough in its own groove; and they should be tender in obtruding their useful, instructive, and important topics upon reluctant yet ashamed ears. As zealous, restless inquirers after truth, they may, with Locke, consider it a fair question how far these enemies of learning are, in knowledge and intellectual faculties, superior to a cockle or an oyster; but they should spare the feelings of their weaker fellow-creatures. The reception which we are all too prone to give to knowledge thrust upon us is that which a party of gossips might give to the invasion of a charitable or literary deputation. The people may be worthy folks in their way, their talk full of information or of utility to their neighbours; but what an interruption! and how willingly do the invaded see them depart, that they may relapse and unbend on the instant into the familiar trivialities!

It is a sufficient reason to a great many people not to acquire new ideas, that they are new. "I know nothing about that" means, "I am steadfastly resolved never to know anything about it." Even where their interests are involved, the strangeness and horror of novelty carries the day. A mother, for example, has a son at school or college, yet the whole phraseology of school and college life remains to the end mere Greek to her. Little-go, moderations, class lists and what not, her mind is a chaos to them all; and because women do not play cricket, just as they do not yet go to college, the rules and machinery of that game are in like manner unattainable by the female mind. As an instance of feminine power to resist knowledge, we were struck the other day by a description of a High-Church parson in Good Words, betraying an ignorance which we must regard as the more signal and remarkable considering the amount of dignified clerical teaching brought to bear on that favoured periodical. The lady draws the portrait of the Rev. Tobias Choake, who fasted on Fridays and Saints' days, advocated auricular confession, and was suspected of wearing a hair-shirt. This lady has lived through Oxford, Anglican, and Ritualistic movements to no better purpose than actually to suppose that the leaders of these parties regard Saints' days not as feasts, but fasts—a case of scarcely less singular deadness to importunate knowledge in one line than was that quoted by Southey of the Liverpool merchant in another, who wrote to his bookseller for Milton's, Shakspeare's, and Dryden's works, and if any of those fellows wrote anything new, he was to send it as it came out. In both cases alike it is impossible that the truth should not have often enough sued for admission at eye and ear, only it was let slip at the time as being without interest to the non-recipient.

Many persons have the faculty of refusing and rejecting all knowledge that goes against their prejudices or inclinations. It is perfectly useless to enlighten them; they prefer a fog, and have a chemical faculty which reproduces it after every attempt to clear it away. Thus Dr. Manning has asserted that the Church of England cannot be what she claims to be, because there is so much infidelity among the English laity—an argument that requires him to ignore the fact of infidelity in France, Spain, and Italy. The policy of non-admissions generally which belongs to his school is based upon this chosen and wilful ignorance. We may perceive indeed how very valuable this power of rejecting knowledge must be to all who have a strong line to take, and a theory to inculcate. Lacordaire, advocating the restoration of the monastic orders, quotes a saying of Napoleon that he did not fear the Spaniards because "It is a nation fashioned by monks; and all monks are cowards." "And at the foot of the Pyrenees," cries the preacher, "he found Christians formed by monks; and his warriors, who used to say that from the Pyrenees to the Baltic they had met nothing but children, confessed, in language both military and energetic, that they were more than men, that it was a war of giants. Spain had the signal honour of being the primary cause of that man's ruin." It suited the orator not to know that, in so far as Spain caused Napoleon's ruin, it was by bringing him in contact with a nation not formed by monks; and Lacordaire was no doubt able really to exclude this fact from his consciousness. And even where no principle is involved, that inobservance which is the reproach of commonplace ordinary sinners is the glory of some saints, of one of whom we are told that, after living in his cell some forty years, he was found in entire ignorance of its form, colour, and furnishing.

There are, we suspect, in all minds desert places not capable of cultivation, where knowledge, fact, and inference will not grow. Certainly, in spite of all we have said, there is a respect felt for persons possessing any accurate knowledge which would be disproportioned but for this admission. But, allowing this, the marvel remains that so much of what it would seem easier to receive than to reject remains unknown. Perhaps a good time is coming when accuracy—without which knowledge does not deserve the name—will be a more common virtue than it is now. In the meanwhile it must be confessed that our preference for the society of one fellow-creature over another is not ruled by this scale, and that we have passed some of our liveliest hours with persons whom we would no more subject to any critical examination whatever—even on those subjects which are so familiar and within reach that it would seem an effort of ingenuity to be ignorant of them—than we would covet such an investigation for ourselves.

CHARMING WOMEN.

THERE are certain women who are invariably spoken of as charming. We never hear any other epithet applied to them. They are not said to be pretty, nor amiable, nor clever, though they may be all three, but simply charming; which we may take as a kind of verbal amalgam, the concentration and concretion of all praise. The main feature about these charming women is their intense feminality. There is no blurring of the outlines here; no confusion of qualities admirable enough in themselves but slightly out of place considering the sex; no Amazonian virtues which leave one in doubt as to whether we have not before us a youth in petticoats rather than a soft and tender woman. A charming woman is woman all over, one who places her glory in being a woman, and has no desire to be anything else. She is a woman rather than a human being, and a lady rather than a woman. One of her characteristics is the softness and exquisite grace of her manner, which so sweetly represents the tender nature within. She has not an angle anywhere. If she were to be expressed geometrically, Hogarth's Line of Beauty is the sole figure that could be used for her. She is flowing, graceful, bending in mind as in body; she is neither self-asserting nor aggressive, neither rigid nor narrow; she is a creature who glides gracefully through life, and adjusts herself to her company and her circumstances in a manner little less than marvellous; working her own way without tumult or sharpness, creeping round insuperable obstacles, and quietly wearing down more friable opposition with that gentle persistency which does so much more than turmoil and disturbance. Even if enthusiastic—which she is for art, either as music, as painting, or as poetry—she is enthusiastic in such a sweet and graceful way that no one can be offended by a fire which shines and does not burn. There is no touch of scorn about her, and no assumption of superior knowledge. She speaks to you, poor ignorant Philistine, with the most flattering conviction that you follow her in all her flights; and when she comes out, quite naturally, with her pretty little bits of recondite lore or professional technicalities, you cannot be so boorish as to ask for an explanation of these everyday matters, which she makes so sure you must understand. Are you not an educated person with a soul to be saved, and can you then be ignorant of things with which every one of culture is familiar? She discourses confidentially of musicians and painters unknown to fame, and speaks as if she knew the secret doings of the Conservatoire and the R. A. council-chamber alike. The models and the methods, the loves and the hates, of the whole artistic world are to her things of everyday life, and you cannot tell her that she is shooting her delicate shafts wide of the mark, and that you know no more of what she means than if she were talking in the choicest Arabic. If she has been abroad—and she generally has been more or less—she will pour out her tender little rhapsodies about palazzi and ville of which you have never heard, but every room of which she assumes you know by heart; and she will speak of out-of-the-way churches, and grim old castles perched upon vine-clad mounts, as if you were as well acquainted with them as with your native hamlet; and she will bring into her discourse all manner of Italian technicalities, as if you understood the subject as well as she herself understands it; though your learning is limited to a knowledge of how much was done in jute and tallow, or how many pockets of hops went off in the market last week. If she has a liking for high life and titles—and what charming woman has not?—she will mention the names of all manner of counts and dukes and monsignori unknown to English society, as though they were her brothers; but if you were to interrupt the gentle ripple of her speech with such rude breakwaters as "who?" and "what?" the charming woman would think you a horrid bore, and no man would willingly face that. One may be a rhinoceros in one's own haunts, but, as the fable tells us, even rhinoceroses are ashamed of their parentage when among gazelles. Never self-asserting, never contradictory, only sweetly and tenderly putting you right when you blunder, the charming woman nevertheless always makes you feel her superiority. True, she lays herself as it were at your feet, and gives you a thousand delicate flatteries—indeed among her specialities is that of being able to set you on good terms with yourself, and her art of subtle flattery; but despite her own self-abasement and your exaltation you cannot but feel that she is your superior, and that although she is too charming to acknowledge what would wound your pride, yet she feels it too, and tries to hide it. All which has the effect of making you admire her still more for the grace and tact she has displayed.

The charming woman is generally notoriously in love with her husband, who is almost always inferior to her in birth, acquirements, manner, or appearance. This affection of hers only shows her feminine qualities of sacrifice and wifely devotion to greater advantage, and makes other men envy more ferociously the lucky fellow who has drawn such a prize. The husband of a charming woman is indeed lucky in the world's esteem; no man more so. Though he may be one of the most ordinary, perhaps unpleasant, fellows you know, with a sour face, an underbred air, and by no means famous in his special sphere, his wife speaks of him enthusiastically as so good, so clever, so delightful; no one knows how good he is, she says, though of course he has his little peculiarities of temper, and the rest of it, and perhaps every one would not bear with them as she does. But then she knows him, and knows his wonderful worth and value! If they are not seen much together that comes from causes over which they have no control, not from anything like disinclination to each other's society. Certainly, for so happy a marriage, it is a little surprising how very seldom they are together; and how all her friends are hers only and not his, and how much she goes into society without him. On the whole, counting hours, they live very much more apart than united; but that is the misfortune of his career, of his health, or of hers—a misfortune due to any cause but that of diversity of tastes and inharmoniousness of pursuits. Full of home affection and the tenderest sentiment as she is, the charming woman does sometimes the oddest-looking things, which a rough little domestic creature without graceful pretensions would not dream of doing. Her child is lying dangerously ill, perhaps dying, and she appears at the grand ball of the season, subdued certainly—how well that sweet melancholy becomes her!—but always graceful, always thoughtful for others, and attentive; and though indeed, she will tell you, she does not know how she got dressed at all, she is in such a state of cruel anxiety, yet she is undeniably the best dressed woman in the room, and the most carefully appointed. It is against her own will that she is there, you may be sure, but she has been forced to sacrifice herself, and tear herself away for an hour. The exigencies of society are so merciless—the world is such a terrible Juggernaut, she says, raising her eyes with plaintive earnestness to yours in the breathing times of the waltz. She has another trial if her husband is ordered out to Canada or the West Indies. Dearly as she loves him, and though she is heartbroken at the idea of the separation, yet her health cannot stand the climate, and she must obey her doctor's orders. She is so delicate, you know—all charming women are delicate—and the doctor tells her she could not live six months either in Toronto or Port Royal. If he had to go on diplomatic service to St. Petersburg or Madrid, she might be able to stand the climate then; but that is different. A dull station, without any of her favourite pleasures, would be more than she could bear; so she remains behind, goes out greatly into society, and writes her husband tender and amusing letters once a month.

The charming woman is the gentlest of her sex. She would not do a cruel thing nor say an unkind word for the world. When she tells you the unpleasant things which ill-natured people have said of your friends or hers, she tells them in the sweetest and dearest way imaginable. She is so sure there is not a syllable of truth in it all: and what a shame it is that people should be so ill-natured! In the gentle tone of sympathy and deprecation peculiar to her, she gives you all the ugly and uncomfortable reports that have come to her, of which you have never heard a breath until this moment; yet it is you who are stupid, for she tells them to you as if they were of patent notoriety to the whole world; only she does not believe them, remember! She takes the most scrupulous care to deny and defend as she retails, and you cannot class her with the tribe of the ill-natured whom she censures, setting, as she does, the whole strength of her gentle words and generous disbelief to oppose these ugly rumours. Yet you wish she had not told you. Her disclaimers spring so evidently from the affectionate amiability of her own mind, which cannot bear to think evil, that they have not much effect upon you. The excuse dies away from your memory, but the ill-savoured report roots, and you feel that you have lost your respect for your former friends for ever; or, if they were only hers, that nothing should tempt you to know them. There is no smoke without some fire, you think; and the charming woman cannot possibly have kindled the flame herself out of sticks and leaves and rubbish of her own collecting. But how sweet and charitable she was when she told you! how much you love her for her tenderness of nature! what a guileless and delightful creature she is!

The charming woman is kind and graceful, but she does not command the stronger virtues. She flatters sweetly, but, it must be confessed, she fibs as sweetly. She sometimes owns to this, but only to fibs that do more good than harm—fibs into which she is forced for the sake of peace, and to avoid mischief. It is a feminine privilege, she says; and men agree with her. Truth at all times, bold, uncompromising, stern-faced truth, is coarse and indelicate, she says: a masculine quality as little fitted for women as courage or great bodily strength. Her husband knows that she fibs; her friends at times find her out too; but though the women throw it at her as an accusation, the men accept it as a quality without which she would be less the charming woman that she is; and not only forgive it, but like her the better for the grace and tact and suppleness she displays in the process of manufacture. Hers are not the severer virtues, but the gentler, the more insinuating; and absolute truth—truth at any price and on all occasions—does not come into the list. Charming women, with their plastic manners and non-aggressive force, always have their own way in the end. They are the women who influence by unseen methods, and who shrink from any open display of power. They know that their métier is to soothe men, to put them on good terms with themselves, and so to get the benefit of the good humour they induce; and they dread nothing so much as a contest of wills. They coax and flatter for their rights, and consequently they are given privileges in excess of their rights; whereas the women who take their rights, as things to which they are entitled without favour, lose them and their privileges together. This art of self-abasement for future exaltation is one which it is given only to few to carry to perfection, but no woman is really charming without it. In fact it is part of her power; and she knows it. Though charming women are decidedly the favourites with men, they are careful to keep on good terms with their own sex; and in society you may often see them almost ostentatiously surrounded by women only, whom they take pains to please, or exert themselves to amuse, but whom they throw into the shade in the most astonishing way. Whatever these really charming women are, or do, or wear, is exactly the right thing; and every other woman fails in proportion to the distance she is removed from this model. If a charming woman is dressed richly, the simpler costumes of her friends look poor and mean; if she is à la bergère, the Court dresses about her are vulgar; if she is gay, quietness is dulness; if she is quiet, laughter is coarse. And there is no use in imitating her. She is the very Will-o'-the-Wisp of her circle, and no sooner shows her light here than she flits away there; she has no sooner set one fashion, which her admiring friends have adopted with infinite pains and trouble, than she has struck out a new one, which renders all the previous labour in vain. This is part of her very essence; and the originality which is simply perfection that cannot be repeated, and not eccentricity that no one will imitate, comes in as one of the finest and most potent of her charms. When she lends her patterns to her friends, or tells them this or that little secret, she laughs in her heart, knowing that she has shown them a path they cannot possibly follow, and raised up a standard to which they cannot attain. And even should they do either, then she knows that, by the time they have begun to get up to her, she will be miles away, and that no art whatever can approximate them to her as she is. What she was she tosses among them as a worn-out garment; and remains still the unapproachable, the inimitable, the charming woman par excellence of her set, whom none can rival.

WHAT IS EDUCATION?

We have heard a great deal about education of late, and we are likely to hear a great deal more. We have had, and shall continue to have, speeches bristling with statistics, and pointing with horrific precision to the thousands and tens of thousands of ragged boys and girls whom that ungenerous entity the State allows to grow up as devoid of mental as of corporeal clothing. Then we have statistics of crime, and the stereotyped deduction that so many men committed murder because they did not know the alphabet; so many others burglary, because they could only read and could not write; and so many others arson, because they could only read imperfectly. And then we have some blustering missionary of the cause rushing about the country, and haranguing patient crowds on the iniquity of the national neglect, and the duty of its immediate reparation. What is this education? How would it be defined by its warmest advocates? In what does it consist? And what are its objects? It seems strange that at this time of day we should be asking these questions. Yet it is equally strange that, while we have had an infinite quantity of words on the subject, we have had no satisfactory definition. Ask the first man or woman you meet, who takes an interest in the subject, and you will get a volume of fine phrases, with stock quotations about the beauty of knowledge and the ugliness of ignorance, about the effects of the one in raising and refining, of the other in degrading and brutalizing, mankind. But from hardly any one can you get a distinct and precise statement as to what the process of education really is, how it is carried on, what is its modus operandi, and what it really does effect.

All its advocates agree in certain things. They say that it improves men's understandings and morals; that most men sin through ignorance, and that, by removing ignorance, education removes the most potent cause of misconduct. Others seem to think that ignorance lies at the bottom not only of sin and crime, but of poverty, vagrancy, and mendicity; and that, if we sowed education broadcast, we should not be shocked by the spectacle of haggard women dragging half-naked children after them on a cold March day, or frightened by the mingled whine and threat of sturdy vagrants in Belgravian streets. When these people thus speak of education, they mean by it schools, schoolmasters and schoolmistresses. So many schools, teachers, books, slates, ink, pen and pencils, at the national or municipal expense, and the thing is done. The ragged urchins of both sexes under this treatment will grow up into respected citizens, of whom all the men will be honest and true, all the women virtuous and industrious. We believe that this is the real, though unexpressed, creed of several thousands of respectable and benevolent people in the United Kingdom.

Now, anybody who has ever reflected on what education is will see that, though this is a kind of education, it is not that kind which he would care to see provided at the public expense. If it is capable of being defined at all, education must mean the formation of the intellect and of the character of the educated. Now, all circumstances of life tend to form the character in some way or other; and also, in some degree, the intelligence. The tiny crossing-sweeper who wields the ancestral broom in suburban districts cultivates his intellect and forms his character by what he daily sees and hears about him. He gets to learn the physiognomies of the persons who are likely to give or to refuse him money, and the expediency of being civil and good-tempered. He becomes familiar with great varieties of costume, differences of condition, and diversities of language; and he may also attain proficiency in other kinds of learning neither useful to himself nor to the public. The maid of all work in a small genteel family also educates herself in a way, till she has acquired a wonderful aptitude for discerning the signs of the times in the look or tones of her mistress. These and other stations of life are educational schools of a certain kind. They are all the schools that certain classes ever go to, and they have a decided result in forming the minds and manners of the scholars. They do one thing which professed schools do, and leave another thing undone. They teach no book lore, no writing, no ciphering. But they present many objects for observation, and enforce a certain sort of habitual discipline. What would the schools, as schools are, do more? Suppose the tiny crossing-sweeper sent to school, and the embryo housemaid snatched from the premature duties of a general "help" in poor families, and put under a National School mistress, what then happens? They each learn to read and write, get the catechism by rote, have a confused notion of some stories from the Old Testament, and some moral doctrines from the New; but what is the effect upon their minds and characters? They are sharper than they were. They can read play-bills, advertisements, and placards, can read and compose valentines. But do they give any indication of becoming better citizens than they were? Have they a higher principle, a stronger sense of duty, any sense of religion? This will be found to depend, nine times out of ten, not on the master or mistress of the school, but on the parents, the homes, and the associations of the pupils. Now and then there does occur a singular case of a boy, born of bad and vicious parents, yet fortunate in possessing an exceptionally good disposition and an exceptionally good teacher, who, despite adverse circumstances, succeeds in implanting in his pupil the seeds of a nobler morality than he has known at home. But the average teacher of a charity school leaves the majority of his pupils much as he found them. He may succeed—though it is not a certain and necessary result that he will succeed—in maintaining the forms of discipline. He may compel a sort of languid attention, at least he may suppress noisy chattering during school hours; and he may even sometimes succeed in extorting some slight show of deference to himself. But he does not succeed in implanting any genuine attention or genuine respect in the school. What the boys are at home, that they are in the school. What the homes of the majority of the boys are, that is the school also on a larger scale. What their talk and habits are at home, that they also are at school. If they come from sordid and slatternly homes, inhabited by dirty and idle parents, they themselves will be idle, slatternly, and dirty. If their parents talk blasphemy and obscenity, they will talk in the same way also. If their fathers prefer begging to working, and thieving to begging, no amount of copybook morality, or texts recited from memory, will make the boys anything better than beggars and thieves. They may fill reams with magniloquent platitudes about the cardinal virtues, and repeat the catechism with mechanical precision, but the only fruit which this proficiency will produce will be a sniggering consciousness of successful hypocrisy. They will have added to their ingrained viciousness the talents of vulgar parody and indecent persiflage. We speak now of schools in which the bulk of the boys come from low and disreputable homes. In schools where the majority of the scholars belong to decent families, the example of the good may leaven the whole school, and the bad minority will perhaps imitate the external bearing of the majority.

Our position is that schools less frequently change than develop the characters of children. When people talk of Eton and Harrow and Westminster and other public schools as giving a high and gentlemanly tone to the boys, they hardly mean that these schools communicate to the pupils some quality which they did not possess before. It would be more true to say that the high and gentlemanly feeling which previously animated the boys is encouraged and kept alive by the school. A boy goes to one of these schools from a gentleman's house. Since his birth he has been familiar with a certain tone of manners, sentiment, and habits. He has lived in an atmosphere of dignity, courtesy, politeness, and refinement. He has rarely witnessed anything but suavity and good-breeding on the part of his father's and mother's friends. He has seen authority exercised with a mild firmness and obeyed with a complacent submission; he has heard a certain line of conduct always designated proper, honourable, and gentlemanly—an opposite line stigmatized as base, mean, cowardly, dishonourable. He goes to the great school, where he finds five or six hundred other boys educated under similar influences in similar homes. They form among themselves one society, inspired by the same associations and recognising the same unwritten code; actuated by the same motives and addicted to the same tastes. Reading the same books, hearing the same comments, and discussing the same questions, these boys naturally educate each other. They confirm in each other the tastes, predilections, and sympathies which they brought from their respective homes. They have a liking rather than an enthusiasm for literature, for history, and for the arts. They have a disposition to the gentle exercise rather than to the severe exertion of their minds, and perhaps they also have too marked a tendency to ease and self-enjoyment. But they form a strong and healthy public opinion among themselves as to the degradation and turpitude of all mean and paltry actions. If they cannot be diligent students and finished scholars, they will at least be gentlemen. Take another class of school, only dissimilar from the former in respect of the inferior wealth of the scholars. These come from homes less opulent, less luxurious, and less refined than those of which we have just spoken. They are the sons, not of peers or wealthy commoners, but of professional men, lawyers and clergymen, who have worked a toilsome path to competence, and have secured nothing better than competence. They have been as strictly brought up to admire truth and manliness as their richer compeers, but they have been also brought up in the love and practice of hard work. Hard Greek and harder Analysis have tried their youthful intellects. They have to make their way in the world by the sweat of their brains, and they acknowledge this without disguise. In the schools in which they meet they reproduce and confirm the associations of their own homes. Hard work in school and hardy play out of school are the natural sequence of the early training at home. Their intellects and their limbs are both braced for the struggle of life by an education which in reality was begun under their fathers' guidance and in their fathers' study.

But send to Eton and Harrow, or to Repton and Rugby, in lieu of the boys we have described, an entirely different kind of youngsters—the young Arabs of Birmingham or Liverpool, or the sons of Bengal Baboos—and will any amount of Horace and Virgil, longs and shorts, or Alcaic odes, Greek odes, and Greek iambics, make these latter boys what the former were? No one with the slightest knowledge of practical education or of human nature can hesitate as to the answer.

Take other cases. Take the grammar-school of a small country town uncorrupted by mercantile opulence, and untarnished by manufacturing smoke. It has a large and respectable middle-class population whose condition approaches poverty rather than ease. The habits of their families are primitive, austere, perhaps Puritanical. The boys have been brought up hardly, and without luxury. They know they have to make their way in the world. Send them to a grammar-school conducted by a strict and conscientious master. What will the boys grow up? The counterparts of their fathers, with the addition of a lore which their fathers did not possess. They will be hard students at the University, will get fellowships, and will become strict and severe tutors; or else hardworking attorneys and men of business in their own town. In any branch of life the fruits of their domestic training and the traits of their ancestral character will re-appear. Contrast them with the scholars of some pretentious "Institution," or so-called "College," kept by a charlatan who has conferred his own diploma, and who angles in metropolitan suburbs for the sons of "shoddy" wealth. The instruction given here will be a sham, the moral training will be worse than nil, the whole tone of the school flabby, vapid, and unmanly. The lads will develop into wretched hybrids, half coxcombs and half cheats, the flaunting scandals of the Stock Exchange, the unconscious caricatures of modern City youth. Why? Not because the master is an impostor and a fool, but because they themselves have been nursed and reared in an atmosphere of folly, falsehood, and display.

So with these street Arabs. It is not because they are not at school that they are half-naked, wholly thievish, and blaspheming little blackguards. They are what they are, because they were born under influences which did not allow them to become anything else; because their parents swore and thieved, swear and thieve; because they prefer idleness to work, and beer to wages. Send these boys in a body to a school where there are no others, or only a few others; and you will have a miniature reproduction of their fathers' boozing ken. You may save five per cent. perhaps for a cleaner and better life, but the majority will be what they are now; the same half-naked, half-savage, dirty little rascals. If you want to change the class radically, take them as soon as weaned, exile them for ever from the wretched hovels of their birth, clothe them, feed them, and then send them to school. But what beneficent patron, what paternal State, is going to adopt 10,000 infant children in one town, appropriate them, feed, clothe, and teach them up to the standard of the teaching given to rich men's children—and then turn them out upon the world? And, if so trained, how would they support themselves?

When will people learn that education is a composite process, not confined to books and teachers, but made up of the varied influences of home, fortune, and early association?

MURDERERS IN COUNCIL.

AMERICA may be described as the country where principles are tested by application to the most extreme cases. In Europe we are timid, and shrink from sweeping statements; we fence round the simplest truths with innumerable qualifications and safeguards before we apply them to facts. In America, on the contrary, they lay down political axioms as confidently as if they were self-evident propositions in geometry, and proceed to act upon them, regardless of any little discord between fact and theory. The system has its interest for political observers, as it enables them to observe the working of social forces free from the perplexing influences which mask their action elsewhere. The vessel of State, to use a most respectable old metaphor, is propelled by a steady democratic trade-wind, instead of being driven hither and thither by local gusts and gales, whose intricacy is so great as to baffle any attempt to discover their law. Yet, with a full appreciation of the logical gallantry of Americans, of the audacity with which they accept as natural conclusions results which in England we should fancy to be a reductio ad absurdum, we confess to have been ever so little startled by the last illustration of this tendency. The criminals in Thomaston State prison—unless, as we half suspect, we are the victims of an ingenious practical joke—have held a public meeting, and passed some pathetic resolutions on the subject of capital punishment. In France the right of public meeting is only conceded grudgingly to the most respectable people, and with all kinds of provisions to obviate the possible danger. In America the inherent and indefeasible rights of man extend even beyond the prison walls and to the foot of the gallows. The last few days which a criminal passes before his execution are in most countries supposed to be devoted to weaning himself from the affairs of this world, or possibly to humble petitions for reprieve. In America a gentleman who has unluckily committed a murder solaces the close of his life by taking the chair at a public meeting, and, instead of petitioning, signifies his opinion to his countrymen as if he were president of a constitutional convention. It is, on the whole, one of the most pathetic examples ever given of the ruling passion strong in death. Pope, indeed, would have found in this case as good an illustration of his principle as any of those he has noticed. The dying actress, according to him, remarked—

> Betty, give this cheek a little red,
> One would not sure be frightful when one's dead.

The American convict, accustomed from his infancy to public speaking, ends his career by proposing resolutions about the duties of society to the individual, and indulges in the epigram, which would almost be worthy of a place in one of Mr. Bright's perorations, that "it is not so much Harris he would save from ignominy as the State."

The opinion of these gentlemen, not perhaps very remarkable in itself, gains a certain importance from its circumstances. No persons are more qualified to throw light upon the question of capital punishment, as seen from one point of view, than a meeting of criminals under the distinguished presidency of Mr. George Knight, who, it seems, owed his pre-eminence to the atrocity of the crime for which he was convicted. All the officers of the meeting, we are told, were murderers, and the committee of two who were commissioned to lay the resolutions before the Legislature of Maine were both convicted of capital crimes. They have certainly done a good deal to clear up the subject; for if the reasons which they allege are not very novel or conclusive, the conclusion to which they come is well worth notice. It is a favourite argument of those who advocate the abolition of capital punishments, that they do not tend to diminish crime. The criminal, it is said, becomes brutalized, and the chief effect of the punishment is to diminish the reverence for life. It is impossible to argue this on purely abstract grounds. We may perhaps imagine a state of society in which people would dread imprisonment for life worse than speedy death, and, in that case, it may be that the gallows would be a comparatively ineffectual penalty, and tend to make men more careless of their own and other people's existence. Here, however, we have the highest possible authority to the fact—not, it is true, a very surprising one—that there is nothing to which criminals entertain a more decided objection than to being hanged. The inconveniences which attend such a catastrophe were admirably pointed out in a tolerably conclusive paper by Charles Lamb. We do not know whether his remarks were quoted at the meeting, but the criminals obviously sympathized with his conclusions. They have placed upon record, in unmistakeable terms, that, on the whole, murderers—agreeing in this respect with other classes of the population—would rather submit to any suffering which we could propose to inflict upon them than to capital punishment. And it would be very difficult to discover a more conclusive reason for continuing capital punishment. There is a naïveté about the supposition that their dislike to the practice is a reason for discontinuing it, which implies that the education in the United States can scarcely be so effectual in this class of the community as we should have been glad to believe. Not only do they cut their neighbours' throats, but their logical faculties are decidedly weak. Of course our murderous friends do not state this excusable prejudice straightforwardly as their reason for advocating the abolition of capital punishments. They put forward more commonplace arguments on the subject; they appeal, not on their own account, but "on behalf of society itself; society which is brutalized, and made a breeder of criminals, by its infliction of punishments which are vindictive"; they delicately hint at the danger of hanging the innocent, and they make the usual vague appeal to "statistics" which "show that hanging induces crime and diminishes the security of society." It is pleasant to see this unselfish zeal for the welfare of society, though, to free it from all suspicion, they should have put their personal interests out of the question, as might easily have been done if they had agreed to be hanged themselves, and confined their remarks to the future. Society, it may be, has been very guilty, and certainly seems to have bred some remarkable criminals in the State of Maine; but, having done so, the best thing it can do is to get rid of them, and start clear for the future. If society owes a duty to itself, and is bound to get rid of all the pests which make life and property insecure, it is hard to see how that duty could be more effectually discharged than by extinguishing all the pests by the most summary and decisive mode, and taking such precautions as may be suggested for preventing their growth in future. If it owes something to the criminal, which we do not deny, it certainly owes a good deal more to the innocent, who have grown up to be non-murderers in spite of the evil influences by which they were surrounded; and it could pay its debts finally and satisfactorily by making a clean sweep of all the existing sources of evil. Nothing is more propitious to the growth of murderous instincts in the future than the existence of a large mass of murderous instincts in the present; and if we could only stamp them out summarily, there would be a fair prospect of cutting off the contagion. Meanwhile, we should have been glad to know, if these interesting persons had been kind enough to go into details, how far any of them are able to trace their moral ruin to the gallows. The State of which they are unworthy members has tried to quench certain causes of demoralization by its celebrated laws upon the liquor traffic. It does not seem to have been thoroughly successful; but it would have been curious to know by what process the fact that criminals are subject to a process which they specially dislike is connected with the growth of a criminal population, and the beneficent action of a law repressing drunkenness is neutralized by the unfortunate habit of hanging murderers.

Here we can only regret the absence of any report of the debate. The anecdotes by which the speakers must have illustrated their remarks might have filled up the apparent gaps in the argument. It would have been interesting to hear the speech in which some distinguished criminal proposed two gentlemen as admirably qualified to serve upon the committee, whose claims no one present would be inclined for a moment to dispute, inasmuch as they were both under sentence of death. It would be curious to observe the etiquette which prevailed in the meeting—to watch the modesty with which a simple pickpocket would venture to suggest a few remarks, and the universal respect which would be paid to one convicted of a diabolical murder. As, however, reporters do not appear to have been present, we must endeavour to compose the murderer's oration for ourselves; and on the hypothesis that criminals in the State of Maine resemble their brethren on this side of the water, we may imagine that the supposed argument on the demoralizing effects of hanging would have been something to the following effect. Society, he would perhaps say, society, my friends, has on the whole treated us, if not with all the indulgence that we might expect, yet with a fair approximation to justice, in every respect but one. It allows us to bring up our children in the way they should go, free from the cramping influences of the parson or the schoolmaster. When we have passed a certain apprenticeship to our art, it treats us with an amount of respectful consideration to which in former times we were little accustomed. With a jealous regard for our rights of personal liberty, it allows us the fullest conveniences for exercising our profession; if it does not give us any exceptional protection, which is scarcely in accordance with the spirit of the age, it grants to us what it grants to our rivals, a perfectly free trade, and allows us to form depôts for the purpose of our commerce, in the most convenient parts of our cities. If the board and lodging provided for us are hampered with a few rather awkward restrictions, we are at any rate permitted to withdraw our custom with reasonable rapidity; and as soon as we have again set up in business no one is allowed to ask unpleasant questions. We enjoy all the rights of other citizens, and can on the whole carry on our trade with as little interruption as the prejudices of individuals will permit. But there is one damning blot on the system. We are still occasionally hanged. The brutalizing influence of the practice considered in this connexion is only too plain. We, for our part, should be delighted to perform our necessary duties as civilly as may be. When we have taken a gentleman's watch, we have no special interest in cutting his throat; and except at moments of occasional excitement—from which no man can in any profession be free—we would abstain from murder as much as possible; for, in truth, murder would, under such circumstances, be a blunder. It would spoil the artistic beauty of the performance. It would be a coarse expedient worthy only of a savage tribe—not of the delicate-handed pickpockets, the dexterous burglars, the truly accomplished forgers whom I see before me. But, if you hang us, the question is altered. When Jack Ketch brutally interferes, we must retaliate with equal brutality. We must let society know that we are not men to be trifled with. We must mark in indelible characters our sense of the profound injustice with which we are treated. My friends, if they will permit me to call them so, the distinguished murderers on the front benches, are the martyrs of our profession; men who have risked their lives to preserve our dignity, but whose lives shall not be sacrificed if the unanimous protest of every one present, from the murderer down to the humblest novice accused of petty larceny, can avail to bring society to its senses. Brutal! We may be brutal, as every oppressed race is brutal in self-defence, but it is the oppressors who must take the first step to remedy the evil by confessing their error.

If this was not the actual course of argument, it would at least possess a certain plausibility, and we shall not be able to give a conclusive answer until we have made our criminal population understand that we seriously disapprove of their conduct, and are prepared to bring the rest of our system into harmony with its crowning point. We are at present quite as anxious to respect their rights as citizens, with scrupulous delicacy, as to punish them at the end of the career; and we admit that there is a certain incompatibility in the two departments of our conduct which distinctly requires a remedy.

IRISH ECCLESIASTICAL BUILDINGS.

IT has been customary to sneer at the alleged grievance to Ireland involved in the existence of the Established Protestant Church as being only a sentimental grievance. Now this cry is one of the cries which, like the cry of "confiscation," are verbally true. The grievance of the Irish Church is a sentimental grievance. The fallacy lies in the supposed inference—the inference that a sentimental grievance is an unreal grievance, a trumpery grievance, a grievance not worth taking any notice of. In a commonwealth of philosophers it is quite possible that sentimental grievances might go for very little. But the mass of mankind are not philosophers, and in this every-day world sentimental grievances do count for a great deal. We suspect that, in the long run, they count for more than practical grievances. We suspect that, if we had statistics of all the discontents, all the murmurings, all the revolts, that have happened since the beginning of the world, we should find that sentimental grievances have had a good deal to do with most of them. The proverbial saying about adding insult to injury has a great deal of truth in it. Men will commonly endure a real damage much more calmly than they will endure an insulting word. A nation will endure much of practical oppression and misgovernment which weighs equally on all classes far more calmly than it will endure anything which savours of insult, anything which wounds the national feelings or galls the national pride. The memory of a wrong, the outward badge of a wrong, often cuts more keenly than the wrong itself. No policy can be more senseless than, after a wrong has been redressed, to keep up forms, names, institutions, by which the memory of that wrong is kept alive. Those forms, names, institutions, are each of them so many sentimental grievances, and so long as the sentimental grievances exist, so long will the nation be slow to remember that the practical grievances have vanished.

The existence then of the Protestant Church of Ireland is mainly a sentimental grievance, but, as being a sentimental grievance, it is all the more a crying grievance, a grievance which justice and policy alike call on us to redress. And the most sentimental part of this sentimental grievance is one to which we ourselves called attention about a year back; we hope that we are not overrating our own merits in believing that we were the first to call attention to it. This is the case of the ancient churches and burial-grounds of Ireland. When men see the graves of their fathers, the holy places where their fathers worshipped, the places to which they themselves still resort for devotion and pilgrimage, held as a possession by those whom they still look on as a race of alien intruders—when they see the ancient temples of the land, every one of which has its own tale recorded in the national annals, neglected, forsaken, crumbling away, because those who own them cannot use them, and those who would have used them are not allowed to use them—the grievance is no doubt a sentimental grievance, but it is a real grievance and a crying grievance all the same. It is undoubtedly a grievance which speaks with a very different voice in different ears. We have found people who could not understand that it was a grievance at all. It is not a matter of life or limb, it is not a matter of pounds, shillings, and pence, and therefore to some minds it seems to be a matter of not the least consequence. It is at least some comfort that Her Majesty's Government are not of this earthy and prosaic way of thinking. It marks the thoughtful and diligent care with which the Irish Church Bill has been drawn up, the honest anxiety to deal with every aspect of the question, to give satisfaction to every reasonable cry of complaint, that this subject also, which we can fancy that many statesmen would have pooh-poohed as wholly beneath their notice, has been carefully thought of and satisfactorily provided for. English readers may at first sight fail to take in the full force of the first clause of the twenty-fifth section; those who have not seen Ireland for themselves will hardly realize how wide is the scope and grasp of the following words, "Where any church or ecclesiastical building appears to the Commissioners to be ruinous, or, if a church, to be wholly disused as a place of public worship, and not suitable for restoration as a place of public worship, and yet to be deserving of being retained as a national monument by reason of its architectural character or antiquity." The number of buildings in England which would answer this description would be very small. Churches in the state described would be, with only a few exceptions, monastic churches which have long since passed into private hands, and with these of course the Act does not deal in Ireland any more than in England. It may sound strange in some English ears to be told that in Ireland these words apply to nearly all the ancient parochial churches, and to a large proportion of the cathedral churches to boot. These buildings could hardly have been better described than they are in the Act. An ancient Irish church is, as a rule, "ruinous," "wholly disused as a place of public worship," and "not suitable for restoration as a place of public worship." Yet Dr. Petrie, or any follower of Dr. Petrie, would assuredly say that it is "deserving of being maintained as a national monument by reason of its architectural character or antiquity." This provision in the Act, coming just after the publication of Petrie's Life, reads like an apotheosis of him and his labours. The Round Towers and ancient churches of Ireland are declared to be national monuments, worthy to be preserved as such. Such a declaration in an Act of Parliament is in itself comforting. It marks the steady growth of a genuine appreciation and love of the ancient monuments of the country, when we find this distinct recognition of the value of national antiquities in the regions which are generally the last to be reached by such "sentimental" feelings. It is too bad when, after reading the words of the Bill, one turns to the unlucky pages of Punch, and finds it there affirmed, seemingly in all seriousness, that the intention of the Government is to pull down all the ruined churches and sell the sites and materials. On the contrary, the Act distinctly says that these ancient remains are to be preserved and maintained as national monuments, and a fund is expressly provided for their maintenance. Happily such a fund need be of the very smallest amount. A ruin does not stand in need of "restoration." It wants to be cleared out and kept decent, and, if its walls are tottering, they should be propped. The ancient parish churches of Ireland are for the most part ruined beyond all hope, besides that they are commonly so small as to be unfit for modern ecclesiastical use according to either rite. As the property of a religious body which does not and cannot use them, each of these ancient buildings is a badge of national humiliation. Preserved as national monuments, carefully sheltered from further damage, they will form a precious heritage of former days, of which Ireland may well be proud.

With regard to churches in actual use, the present Established Church, in its future disestablished state, will be able to choose and retain such as it thinks good. We must again remind our readers that the churches in actual use in Ireland are very seldom, in country parishes perhaps never, buildings of any architectural or historical value. Here and there in a town a cathedral or large parochial church survives, and that is all. The present Established Church will therefore be able to retain, if it pleases, buildings like the two Dublin cathedrals, the cathedrals of Kilkenny, Limerick, and Killaloe, the collegiate church of Galway, the parish church of Clonmel. Here again the principle of national monuments is most properly recognised. Whatever religious body possesses buildings like Saint Patrick's and Saint Canice, it would be a disgrace to Ireland to allow them to fall into ruin. A portion of the funds of the disestablished Church is to be allotted to the maintenance of these churches as national monuments. The number so to be endowed is limited to twelve. Now the ruin of ecclesiastical buildings in Ireland has been so general, that we suspect that twelve will cover all the churches which have any claim to come under this head. It must be remembered that there is not, in Ireland as in England, a mediæval cathedral church still in use in every diocese but one. Of the Irish cathedrals several are modern, several are ruinous. Of course neither the modern nor the ruined cathedrals have any claim to admission among the twelve. The unhappy thing is that, of those churches which have a fair right to count among the twelve, several have been so damaged by tasteless repairs that an antiquary would be almost better pleased to see them in ruins.

Churches in actual use which shall not be thus applied for by the disestablished Church will remain at the disposal of the Commissioners. And we suppose that they will have the disposal of any churches which, though not in actual use, are still capable of being used. Through the operation of these clauses, it is quite possible that some ancient churches may be actually again used for the worship to which the people of Ireland have ever stuck with such desperate fidelity. It is possible that, by the operation of this Act, the people of Ireland may recover to religious uses some of those monuments of the piety of their forefathers of which alien invaders have so long deprived them. Mass may perhaps again be said on the Rock of Cashel, at least in the venerable church of Cormac, if not in the greater but less ancient choir by its side. At all events, that wonderful spot will no longer remain a badge of conquest and mockery, the property of a Bishop or Chapter whose right in it is simply the right of the dog in the manger. If it does not again become the property of the Irish people as a group of religious buildings, it will at least become their property as a national monument, preserved from further damage out of the funds which now maintain its intruding owners and nominal occupants. So at Glendalough, so at Clonmacnoise, so at Monasterboice; an Irishman will no longer feel himself a stranger among the dwellings of his saints and among the graves of his fathers. A "sentimental grievance" will be redressed, but the redress of that sentimental grievance will be nothing short of putting the crown to the emancipation of a people. The Irish patriot and the Irish antiquary, the lover of ancient art and history in any part of the world, may join in returning thanks for the enlightened care with which the framers of this Act have ..., with a subject which is one of no small difficulty, and which, important as it really is, there must have been a constant temptation to cast aside as unworthy of the attention of statesmen.

THE POPE AND THE ARCHBISHOP OF PARIS.

A CURIOUS document has just come to light in the third edition of a work by M. Ollivier, from which it has been copied into the French journals. The International of last Saturday, which is lying before us, gives the text in full; and though the date is October, 1865, it has too direct a bearing on questions of present interest to be passed over in silence on its first appearance in print. Our readers will recollect the recent skirmishing between the French and Roman Courts about the proposed elevation of the Archbishop of Paris to the Cardinalate, which has as yet been persistently refused or evaded by the Holy See. It was known well enough in a general way that his Grace's "Gallicanism" was the real objection, however ingeniously it might be disguised in the diplomatic terminology of the Vatican. But the letter addressed by the Pope to his "venerable brother, George," two years after his appointment to the See of Paris—which is not very fraternal except in the superscription, and evidently was not intended for the public eye—reveals with a quite engaging frankness the grounds of complaint against him. And in doing so it betrays a simple confidence in the divine and eternal truth of the extremest theories of Ultramontanism which is no doubt sincerely entertained by Pius IX. himself, though the compilers of the document, unless they are singularly impassive or still more singularly ignorant, can hardly have penned it without laughing in their sleeve. At all events it is well to know, on the highest authority, what is the current estimate of Church history and Church policy at the Vatican. We may be very sure that, had the matter depended on Papal appointment, Mgr. Darboy, who, however, is one of the ablest and most high-principled of the French Episcopate, would never have been primate of France; and unless very strong pressure is brought to bear on the Curia, he is not likely to obtain his Hat under the present régime. Nor will his chances be improved if there is any truth in the apparently well-authenticated rumour that the Jesuits have abandoned their design of attempting to extract a decree on Papal infallibility from the approaching Council, in view of the determined attitude of the French bishops. Our concern, however, here, is not so much with the Archbishop as with the principles enunciated, and intended to be proved, in the remarkable missive addressed to him from Rome. And to this we must now direct the attention of our readers.

After referring to his hope that the Archbishop on his appointment would have written to him to confess his "very high respect for our person and this Apostolic See, and his most perfect regard for the same," the Pope proceeds to criticize the letter which Mgr. Darboy had actually written to him concerning his diocese, and which was "no light subject of grief and astonishment" to him. In short, it contained opinions "entirely contrary to the divine primacy of the Roman Pontiff over the universal Church." And these opinions are accordingly enumerated and commented upon. In the first place, the Archbishop maintains that the Pope has no "ordinary or immediate power" over dioceses other than his own, and can only interfere in extreme cases, when a sort of deus ex machinâ is necessary "to save souls and remedy the negligence of pastors." The Archbishop accordingly regards appeals to the Holy See in ordinary cases as an "abuse," which makes the due government of the diocese impossible, and denounces the interference of regulars, nuncios, and Roman congregations in the diocesan administration as an encroachment on his just rights which ought to be resisted. This, according to the Papal letter, is to maintain the "false, erroneous, and condemned doctrines of Febronius"; and their falsehood is then proved by the following not very intelligible chain of reasoning. Every bishop, the Pope assures his venerable brother, "who has a generous soul"—we fear the "venerable brother" is not to be reckoned one of them—finds in this immediate jurisdiction and constant intermeddling of the Roman See with his diocesan government "a very great sweetness and consolation in his pains, before God, the Church, and the Church's enemies." The first two points are too obvious to require any proof, but as regards the third, we are informed that it is "a fact of experience and perfectly demonstrated," that every bishop who does not act on this principle comes to grief—if the expression may be pardoned—with his enemies. There are certainly a good many ways of reading history, but it would require, we suspect, the very adroitest of Ultramontane special pleaders to extract this particular "demonstration" from its pages. Thomas à-Becket, for instance, is a canonized saint, but any one who will take the trouble to wade through the late Mr. Froude's Life of him, with its copious supplement of his correspondence, or indeed any tolerably impartial compendium of it, may easily satisfy himself that the martyr, though zealously fighting the battles of the Holy See, had quite as much difficulty in holding his ground against his ecclesiastical superior—who was always on the eve of betraying his cause—as against his temporal sovereign. It was only when his death had settled the contest that the Roman Curia, which had feebly supported and frequently snubbed him, was eager to make capital out of sufferings endured in its interest, but in which it had no share. Or, if a later example be wanted, the Life of Nicolas Pavillon, reviewed the other day in our columns, supplies it. He was engaged, through a long episcopate, in a hand-to-hand struggle both with royal despotism and clerical insubordination and immorality; but until the very end of his life, when Innocent XI. mounted the Pontifical throne, the influence of Rome was always at the command of his enemies; and of its "very great sweetness and consolation" he experienced less than none.

But before going into the next point of the indictment against the Archbishop, let us examine a little more closely into the gist of the first and main charge objected to him. He is severely censured, as we have seen, for denying the immediate and ordinary jurisdiction of the Pope over every diocese, and the right of appeal to the Holy See in any and every case; and he is told that, in resisting these claims, he "grossly offends the Divine Author of the constitution of the Church," which must mean, if it mean anything, that Christ was the author of the False Decretals. For every tyro in ecclesiastical history knows by this time what is the real origin of the Pope's claim of immediate jurisdiction and right of appeal. It must be perfectly well known at Rome. To quote the words of a recent Roman Catholic writer, who has few equals in knowledge of the subject:—"History deposes unhesitatingly that Rome rose to the eminence which she occupied in the thirteenth century, when at her zenith, by fraud and force; by the weapon of the weak and the weapon of the strong, alternately put into her hand and employed by her as legitimate, for the spread of her own power, to the dismemberment and destruction of the Church at large; the most striking specimens of each kind being the Pseudo-Decretals and the Crusades. By these means her bishop aspired to become Patriarch of the whole Church as well as Pope," which is exactly what the Archbishop of Paris is condemned for opposing. As to that right of appeal to Rome which, according to the Papal letter, belongs to all the faithful in every case by the divine constitution of the Church, the first faint hint of any appeal to Rome occurs in the middle of the fourth century, when, not Christ, but the Council of Sardica (in 347), gave a right of appeal in certain extreme cases to bishops, and to them alone. A century later, indeed, St. Augustine and the African bishops solemnly affirmed that "the Nicene decrees plainly committed both clergy and bishops to their own metropolitans, having wisely and justly provided that all questions should be determined in the very places where they arise," reserving an extreme right of appeal, not to the Pope, but to a Provincial, or if necessary, a General Council. It is a spurious encyclical, incorporated in the False Decretals, which first asserts—in the middle of the ninth century—with an effrontery only possible in an age of the densest ignorance, that "the Apostles appointed, by command of our Lord, that all greater and more difficult questions should be brought before the Apostolic See, which is the head and judge of all the Churches." Even a Jesuit writer spoke the other day, in a magazine which is the organ of his order in France, of "the pseudo-Isidorian reform" as not only quite unnecessary, but "having produced nothing but evil," adding pointedly, "Le mensonge demeure toujours un mal, même lorsque celui qui en use se propose un bien." So much for the Archbishop's sins against "the Divine Author of the constitution of the Church," which have filled the heart of Pius IX. with "astonishment, affliction, and anguish."

The rest of the letter deals chiefly with matters of detail. It appears that the Archbishop had refused to recognise the exemption from his authority claimed by religious orders in his diocese, on the ground that they had never been canonically established, partly from the absence of any legal sanction, partly because the consent of the bishop, required by the canons of Trent, had never been obtained. To this sound plea, which one would have thought would be alone conclusive if the canons are rightly quoted, the Pope makes no reply, probably because there is none to make. On the absence of civil authorization the letter is copious and eloquent, not to say rather abusive. The bare notion of the civil law interfering in any way with monastic arrangements is too shocking for discussion; it is only a topic for declamations, interjections, and something as near swearing as the epistolary usages of the Vatican admit of. On this we will merely observe here, that the recent appeal of a nun to the verdict of an English jury against the tyranny and the calumnies of her religious sisters is an odd comment, to say the least, on this lofty rejection of all interposition of the law. We need not follow the Pope into the discourse on Freemasonry which concludes his letter, especially as the same sentiments, couched in very much the same language, may be read two or three times a year in the pastorals of Cardinal Cullen which are published in the newspapers. The real interest of the document lies in its round and indiscriminate assertions of the extremest and most mythical of Ultramontane theories of the Church, which are put forward with a simplicity truly amazing, if any other end than the relief of wounded feelings was expected to be served by its transmission. Historical inquiry during the last fifty, nay the last twenty, years has made gigantic strides, but the oracles of the Vatican have learnt nothing and forgotten nothing. They have not even learnt to distrust the Divine authority of one syllable of the Isidorian forgeries, though they no longer affect to regard them as genuine. In view of the approaching Council it becomes a question of some interest and considerable curiosity how far this strange attitude will be maintained. To talk, as the Pope has been made to talk in his recent addresses to Greek and Protestant Christians, of a desire for restoring unity, so long as this attitude is maintained, is to talk nonsense, as they who guide his pen must be well aware. But what line will be taken by such prelates, for instance, as the Bishop of Orleans, who may fairly be credited with honestly cherishing the aspirations which at Rome are a conventional formula? How many of His Holiness's "venerable brethren" will be found to share, or will have the moral courage to avow, the sentiments of their brother of Paris? There must be many among the eight or nine hundred Bishops in communion with Rome who know at least as much as is familiar to all students of Church history, and it would be as little reasonable as respectful to assume that none of them are honest enough to adhere to their conviction of what they know to be the facts. Yet for doing so the Primate of France receives from the Pope what one of our contemporaries not inaccurately describes as "a tremendous wigging." A General Council, conducted on the principles stated or implied throughout this letter of his Holiness, would be something more than an anachronism. It would be—according to the point from which men choose to regard it, seriously or the reverse—either an outrage or a farce.

THE ARMY ESTIMATES.

THE task imposed on the War Minister was similar to that which the First Lord of the Admiralty had to discharge. The army, like the navy, had to do with 1,000,000*l.* less than usual. Mr. Cardwell has acquitted himself of his duty somewhat in the same fashion as Mr. Childers, though with considerably less skill and success. Just as Mr. Childers lopped off the foreign squadrons, so has Mr. Cardwell cut down the colonial garrisons. Both measures are right, but while the First Lord contrived to introduce some principle into his other reductions, the Secretary for War has simply made the expenditure less by diminishing the effective force of the country, and by postponing to the future part of the outlay upon stores which would otherwise fall on the present year. Mr. Cardwell was at some pains to explain that, if the non-effective charges are put out of consideration, his savings amount to about ten per cent. on the outlay of last year. That is true, but it is also true that the diminution in the aggregate strength of the army reaches nearly nine per cent. and that the reduction in the ordinary annual supply of stores is considerably more than twenty per cent. The broad result therefore is, that we pay ten per cent. less, and what we get for our money is reduced in a still larger proportion. This of course is stinting, as distinguished from saving, but it equally answers the purpose of a Ministry pledged to reduce in some way or other the aggregate amount of military expenditure. Under certain circumstances it may be safe and wise to stint in those matters, but it is important that money saved by this means should not be confounded with the legitimate economy effected by improved organization without any equivalent sacrifice of efficiency. We may be able to get on with less military power than has hitherto been thought necessary, but it would have been much more satisfactory if the Minister could have given us the usual measure of protection, and still have saved the indispensable million. Perhaps this was an impossible achievement, at any rate for Mr. Cardwell, and we are not disappointed at finding that he has not been able to compass it. It is certain that much of the apparent economy of this year only means additional expenditure in years to come. Still it may be quite right to postpone everything that can be postponed, provided that credit is not claimed for savings which are more imaginary than real. Mr. Cardwell had a plausible excuse for deferring the large outlay which will be necessary to supply the army with the Henry-Martini breech-loader, which has just been selected by the very efficient and laborious Committee to which the inquiry was delegated. As the new gun will shoot about twice as fast and more than twice as well as the Snider, there can be no doubt of the necessity of adopting it; but it is prudent, before manufacturing on a large scale, to try a few thousands in the hands of the troops, and the time which this will occupy gives Mr. Cardwell an excellent opportunity for throwing the expenditure on the next year instead of this. While upon this subject it may not be amiss to remind the authorities, that by serving out a few thousands of the new arm to picked men among the Volunteers, who would shoot with it daily, any defects which may remain, and any improvements of which the weapon may admit, will be discovered much more speedily than by the more orthodox practice of testing it in the hands of the Line. Volunteers have taken a leading part in selecting the weapon, and Volunteers would be the best men to test it. However inferior they may be in solidity and other qualities to professional soldiers, there is no doubt that the better sort of them know a great deal more about rifle-shooting than any other body of men in the world. What we suggest, however, would be one of those judicious irregularities that are not to be expected from men in office, and we do not expect it from Mr. Cardwell.

At the present moment a good deal of attention has been concentrated on the reform of army administration, but the Estimates show little of the saving which we are taught to look for hereafter from this source. It is impossible that the consolidation of the supply services should not result in a real economy. The division was absurd in the extreme, and though the reform is partial, and does not extend to the high officers of the Horse Guards who deal with such matters, it cannot fail to be beneficial. Since the appointment of Sir Henry Storks and General Balfour to carry out a plan which Lord Strathnairn's Committee borrowed from the suggestions of War Office civilians, we have never ceased to urge the importance of keeping these new functionaries to their allotted task. For a long time they seemed to direct their chief efforts to the endeavour to absorb the financial control which had been wisely separated from the duties of supply; and we are by no means sure that they have yet abandoned a pursuit in which they have met with many checks. But if, as Mr. Cardwell intimates, they are really devoting themselves to their own duties, instead of struggling to supplant civilian by military authority, they have yet a great career of possible usefulness before them. All this, however, rests in hope. Up to this time the achievements of the reformers make little mark upon the Estimates. The details of the proposed expenditure on the higher staff are given, and they show no real reduction.

The Horse Guards of course remains substantially untouched, but in the War Office, which really is under the control of the Minister, an apparent saving of about 4,500*l.* is shown. This is quite imaginary. The greater part of it is effected by transferring figures to other votes, and, in the case of Admiral Caffin, by paying that able officer 1,000*l.* a year for retiring, instead of 1,200*l.* a year for doing most effective work. The rest of the supposed saving is easily accounted for. A year ago the salaries of the War Office staff were increased by more than 6,000*l.*, mainly by the appointment of the new controlling officers, who were intended to supersede other officials. For the first year the double staff was retained, and now some of these have been reduced, leaving, however, a net increase, instead of a decrease, of expenditure, as compared with 1867, amounting to several thousands of pounds. There is, therefore, the reverse of economy in the higher ranks, the principal change being that salaries formerly paid to civilian officials have been transferred with additions to military officers.

Perhaps the weakest part of Mr. Cardwell's programme was that which related to the reserve forces. The Militia Reserve scheme has proved a contemptible failure, the force being represented by less than 3,000 men, and no steps are proposed to be taken to improve it. Militia officers are to be paid a little more, but beyond this nothing is proposed to make this force either more effective or more available as a nursery for the army. On the Volunteers Mr. Cardwell had one or two wise and one or two foolish things to say. He said that before granting them more money he should like to make their organization more efficient. This is just what the Volunteers have been always praying for, but they have been properly enough forbidden to organize themselves, and it seems odd that if money is really wanted to meet their necessary expenses, the grant should be delayed because the Government has steadily refused to give them a more comprehensive organization. Then Mr. Cardwell laid down another rule—that all Volunteer officers should be efficient, and that neither social position nor any other recommendation should be accepted as a substitute for efficiency. This is admirable, and is just what the Volunteers themselves mean when they ask for more liberal assistance in meeting their expenses. At present social position and the like, including the possession of wealth and the willingness to spend it, are primary considerations in the selection of officers, and efficiency alone is wholly unavailing. But why is this? Simply because the Government have left upon the shoulders of the officers the burden of supplementing a grant which is insufficient to cover the necessary expenses of the most economical corps. And Mr. Cardwell solemnly pronounces that while the Volunteers are driven to get rich officers, whether they may be efficient or not, the necessity of continuing this objectionable system of selection shall never be removed. If it is really desired to exclude all inefficient men from Volunteer commands, it must first be made possible for efficient men to accept them, even though they may not be wealthy, and to refuse an increased grant until a defect is removed which the scantiness of the grant itself occasions, is one of those inverted proceedings which no one can be expected to understand. There is the same lack of purpose and suggestiveness about every other part of Mr. Cardwell's proposals. He says that he has concurred in the abolition of the Ordnance Committee, whose work was mainly to test new inventions and incidentally to advise upon the claims of inventors. The Ordnance Committee was not all that could be desired, but still it had a scientific element in it, and has contributed largely to the introduction of vast improvements into the armament of our troops and forts. It may be asked how Mr. Cardwell proposes that their work is to be done in future. Mr. Cardwell has no proposition on the subject. The Ordnance Committee led, he says, to difficulties with inventors, and so it is proposed to have no one to test inventions at all, and, instead of it, to constitute all the leading officials of the War Office into a Council, whose duties will be to act as standing counsel against inventors. As a rule, we believe inventors are a troublesome race, and (barring its occasional injustice) the device of a Council to sit upon them may be very good. But inventions like Armstrong guns and Moncrieff carriages are sometimes worth having, and how Mr. Cardwell is to secure the wheat and reject the chaff, without any competent body to make the necessary investigations, he did not think it necessary to explain.

SURPLICES AT THE WASH.

THE learned author of the Art of Pluck, in his chapter "Concerning Logic," has given as "a good example of logical conversion," as understood at Oxford in his time, "'I saw two cats fighting on the leads' converted to 'I saw two dogs fighting in the street.'" The two propositions were formally equivalent in meaning, because as to their matter they were exactly equivalent in interest, and as a social nuisance there was nothing to choose between them. Mutato nomine, it would seem that the "great Convent case"—if it be not a weariness to refer again to Saurin v. Star—"converted" to Protestantism, and expressed in terms of the secular clergy and the Anglican Establishment, has been exactly reproduced in the Thames Police Court, the principal parts being sustained respectively by the Curate and the Rector of Stepney, the mother parish of the East-end of London. In each case the facts are of the most insignificant and contemptible kind, and in themselves unworthy of a moment's serious notice; but in each they have the same significance as indicating the weak points of a system upon which adversaries will be led to concentrate their attack, and which friends will seek to strengthen and protect. If the weak side of Roman Catholic religious houses has been exposed in Saurin v. Star, the weak side of English parish churches has been no less signally, though less publicly, exhibited in the melancholy and ludicrous squabble of Ball v. Lee. We may presume that, as a criminal procedure, the case is now at an end. The twin Gallios of the Thames Police Court, Mr. Paget and Mr. Benson, have driven the Rector and the Curate from the judgment seat—the former, after two hearings, choosing to leave the case over to a day when his colleague would be sitting; and the latter, when his turn came, first listening to what each side had to say, and then telling them to go and wash their dirty linen somewhere else. Mr. Benson, indeed, is very precise in his directions, and has evidently "views" of his own on the subject of final appeal in ecclesiastical litigation, as he desires the clergy concerned to "go to a Civil Court," and the laity interested—"the Churchwardens and leading parishioners of Stepney"—to "go to the Bishop of London," that is, to an Ecclesiastical Court. Tros Tyriusve, it is all one to Mr. Benson, so that he himself sees and hears no more of Stepney and its pastoral amenities.

The ancient parish church of St. Dunstan Stebonheath is the only ecclesiastical building east of the Tower, since the destruction forty years ago of the Collegiate Church of St. Katharine, which can lay claim to anything like a history. Half a million souls are gathered within the limits of its ancient cure. It is the one single spot in the wilderness of East London in which old religious sentiment can rest; its Rector is the one sole link connecting the ecclesiastical present of the East End with the venerable past. In the vestry of St. Dunstan's Church, on Tuesday, February 23, the Rector of the parish was seated at a table, as his predecessors may have been seated any day these thousand years, to distribute the alms of the faithful to the poor. With him was the priest, his old historic associate in the cure of souls in the parish and in the ministrations of the church—the Vicar of Stepney in the nomenclature of earlier times, the Curate of Stepney in that of our own. Outside, waiting in the church to receive and guide the applicants for admission to the pastoral presence, was the deacon, or, in modern language, the parish clerk. Within, and in the presence of the clergy, was a poor woman, worn and sad, "asking an alms." Nothing could be more in keeping with the traditions of mediæval or primitive times. The Rector's hand was already in his pocket; but the conditions of modern London, with its pauperism and its imposture, intervened to call for inquiry, and to stay the Church's alms. Was the poor woman "in the district"? The Rector thought she was not. The Curate, with the fuller information which it was in his province to supply, gently interposed, and said that she was. The alms—twelve pence—were forthwith bestowed, and the poor woman retired with a joyful heart and blessings on the Church's bounty. It was a touching scene, and one which beautifully illustrated the relation of the English Church, in her poorest and most squalid corners, with the great ones of the State. For the Rector of Stepney, the Rev. Richard Lee, "a man far advanced in years," had but a few weeks previously been selected by a great noble, on his elevation to a dukedom, to fill one of the additional domestic chaplaincies which his ducal rank entitled him to maintain; while the Curate, who was so far from being "a novice" that he had been twenty-six years in orders, though a curate still—the Rev. Hanley Ball—had held for many years a position of similar honour as domestic chaplain to a Conservative earl. It had chanced that the Rector, in drawing from his pocket the shilling which had relieved the temporal needs of his poor parishioner, had brought out with it "a clasp-knife, such as is generally used for pruning fruit-trees"; for even in Stepney the advent of earliest spring is heralded by the pink blossom, here and there, of an almond, and a little later by the snowy brightness of many a lingering pear-tree. "I will stab you; I will drive it into you," said the Rector to the astonished Curate; "and this more than once." Never was transformation scene in a pantomime more startling or more complete. The Curate was equal to the occasion. "I never moved a muscle, but stared him steadily in the face, as that is the best way to curb animals." Mr. Hanley Ball's presence of mind may be accepted as offering some excuse for a slight theological confusion of terms. He had just before stated that the Rector "crossed over to me, and put his face close to mine, grinning satanically, as he often does." The "animal" and the "satanic" natures are not, we believe, commonly taken as being theologically the same. The clasp-knife, with its peaceful associations, under the Curate's steady stare grew in its dimensions. "I will not swear it was not a dagger. It had a blade four or five inches in length." Under these alarming circumstances the Curate prudently turned and retreated from the vestry, the Rector "following him," and, having come apparently to a "milder mood," only "pushing him down the steps." Upon this Mr. Ball retired for a meditative walk in the churchyard, where he "met the inspector of police," and "in half an hour's time I came down, and took out a summons at the police court," with the result which we have already described. The evidence of Mr. Price, the parish clerk, would lead to the conclusion that the Rector and Curate of Stepney, like the Eton boys of the period, "funk each other." Mr. Ball swears that he "stands in bodily fear" of Mr. Lee, at least that he did so on the 23rd of February last, and should again if the terrible clasp-knife again grew into a dagger before his eyes. Mr. Price swears that the Rector "had asked him many times not to leave him alone with Mr. Ball, but to protect him." At the same time the parish clerk's evidence shows that the Rector could at times "protect" himself against the Curate after the fashion of the cuttle-fish. "He knew there had been serious quarrels between the Rector and the Curate in the vestry of the church, and that Mr. Ball came out of the vestry one day with ink on his face, and there had been previously high words between the Rector and Curate."

The pastoral amœbæans of Stepney had certainly, as the parish clerk puts it, been somewhat "high" in their musical, or unmusical, pitch; or, to speak more ecclesiastically, the antiphonal chanting from the "decani" and "cantoris" sides of St. Dunstan's had been a good deal more shrill than edifying. First it appeared that the Rector's living had been sequestrated, and that Mr. Ball, in June of last year, had been appointed, by the then Bishop of London, curate under the sequestration. Previously to this appointment Mr. Ball states, "I was acquainted with Stepney Church, voluntarily giving my services there, with the Rector's sanction." The evidence of the Clergy List would lead to the conclusion that Mr. Ball's "services" in Stepney were at the time those of a London Diocesan Home Missionary, which are not usually "voluntary," and that he exchanged this position for that of Curate of Stepney Church at a considerably reduced stipend; but at any rate he became Curate by the Bishop's appointment independently of the Rector, and shortly after "I preached a sermon which circumstances led me to preach." Whether or not this "sermon was pointed directly at the Rector, condemning him in the strongest terms," Mr. Ball declined to say. He "condemned scandal"; and then, "in order to stop scandal," he first "gave a promissory note to pay the expenses to stop the proceedings," and afterwards "preached" another "sermon, written by me, and corrected by the Rector," "a portion of which the Rector took, and published it under the head 'Reparation.'" Whether the promissory note, or the sermon, or both together, succeeded in stopping the "proceedings," appears to be uncertain; for simultaneously with the police-court summons for assault in Ball v. Lee, the newspapers have reported a process in the Sheriff's Court for assessment of damages in an action for slander, Lee v. Ball, in which the plaintiff's wrongs were assessed at a farthing. An agreeable private correspondence meanwhile between the Rector and Curate lightened and diversified the tedium of these various legal formalities. In one letter Mr. Ball explained to the Rector that he had been on previous occasions advised to prosecute him, but "forbore, as I neither wished you should be again on your defence in a criminal court, nor the parish of Stepney be rendered more notorious by you than it unfortunately is. . . . I pray God to overrule everything to the spiritual welfare of the people committed to our charge." This "holding out the olive-branch," as Mr. Ball's counsel aptly described it, was met by the Rector in an equally pacific and gentle spirit. He sent to Mr. Ball "a notice in which he demanded to be informed of the number of judgment summonses for debt that had been served on Mr. Ball during the year, and also to see his banker's pass-book." The magistrate very sensibly declined to allow all this private correspondence to be put in as evidence on a "peace summons," and, remarking that Mr. Ball could not pretend to be "in bodily fear of a weak old man like the Rector," summarily, as we have said, dismissed the case to the Civil Courts as it concerned the plaintiff and defendant, and to the Bishop as it affected the parishioners. The decision of the Civil Courts had been, in one aspect of the question, anticipated, and it is hardly probable that it will be challenged in another; but a statement has appeared in some of the daily papers that the churchwardens and parishioners, acting on the magistrate's advice, have resolved to appeal to the Bishop. "The parties," said Mr. Benson, "above all, ought to be separated and removed to different spheres"; and the Bishop of London, we may presume, is to carry out the magisterial award, and to "remove" Mr. Lee and Mr. Ball "to different spheres," whatever that may mean. How he is to do so is by no means so obvious. He may revoke the license of the Curate, or countersign the Rector's notice to that effect, which comes to the same thing. But in doing this he would give an absolute victory to the Rector, whose object has been all through to get rid of Mr. Ball, as Mrs. Star's object was said to have been to get rid of Miss Saurin. On the other hand, to "remove" a rector "to a different sphere" is a process, in the present state of ecclesiastical law, more easy for a police magistrate to talk about than for a bishop to perform. And when the question is complicated by the claims of creditors under a sequestration, it is not altogether clear that the spiritual interests of churchwardens and parishioners would be the only interests recognised and protected by the law. On the whole, we think that the spiritual pastors and masters of the mother parish of East London have raised between them as troublesome a problem in the administration of an Established Church as is likely to arise within our experience; while, if it should succeed only in checking the vulgar sneers of a so-called "Protestant public" at the exposure of defects in a portion of the Roman Catholic system, it may produce some grain of benefit to counterbalance its extraordinary scandal and disgrace.

INFANTICIDE IN FRANCE.

WE shall not disgust our readers with a minute analysis of the horrible details of a recent trial in Montauban, in the course of which it was proved that no fewer than eight wretched women had been concerned through a long series of years with some of the worst crimes which disgrace humanity. They were tried and convicted of the crimes of infanticide and of procuring abortion; in the latter case, some as agents, some as patients. One woman, the central figure of the group, Delpech, was proved to have murdered no less than nine infants, one her own daughter's illegitimate child, and all under circumstances of the most inconceivable and fiendish brutality. She seems to have commenced her career of infanticide with this murder of her grandchild, to which the mother was privy, by administering vitriol; and in the other cases she had recourse to the simpler process of holding the victims' heads under water—the Times' Correspondent says boiling water, but this does not appear in the French report in the Constitutionnel which has reached us. These infanticides were connected with the familiar system of baby-farming, as we call it, or, as in their pretty way the French wits style it, the manufacture of angels. In every case the mothers, and in one the alleged father, entrusted illegitimate children to the tender care of the woman Delpech, who, in consideration of money paid down, ranging in different cases from 100 to 500 francs, undertook to place the poor little wretches in various nursing institutions, which duty she discharged by murdering them off-hand, and occasionally cutting them in pieces and hiding them in various parts of her house. Generally the mothers exhibited a significant lack of interest in their miserable offspring; and in one instance no inquiries were made for five years. The whole matter reads its own horrible lesson, which it would be impertinent to enlarge upon or to exaggerate; and doubtless its lesson will not be lost upon our eloquent contemporary of the daily press, who has been especially minute and especially impressive in expressing his horror of this social depravity, and who at the same time regularly inserts the advertisements of baby-farming establishments among ourselves which, if they have not much the same results, are sadly suspected of sometimes carrying on a trade little better than that of the woman Delpech.

Apart from these considerations, which are on the surface of the case, we propose to examine it as a typical instance of what seem to be the very strange results of French criminal proceedings. And, first, the details of the trial do not reflect much credit on the vaunted superiority of the French police. The history of the woman Delpech—at least her criminal history—runs as far back as the year 1857. The stages of her guilt are successive, and increase in infamy and crime. Commencing with what the Act of Accusation in sonorous French tongue calls the trade of "proxénétisme," Delpech took naturally to baby-farming and consequent infanticide, and at last to the more lucrative trade of abortion. It was only in consequence of some unlucky failure in this last branch of her profession, which ended in the death of her two victims, that Delpech was brought to justice. That is to say, for twelve years she had been suspected by the police, who were indeed active enough to convict her more than once during this time for some small robberies. But her greater crimes were not detected, or, if suspected, they were not gone into. At any moment she might have been caught almost in the act, for the skeletons and scattered bones of at least seven of her victims were discovered when—that is, after some ten years—the suspicions of the police were at last roused into action. But, unsatisfactory as this specimen of the detective powers of the French police seems to be, this preliminary consideration is insignificant when compared with the result of the criminal proceedings at the assizes of Montauban. The Judge, more Francorum, had it all his own way. In the course of his examination of the principal prisoner, Delpech, she confessed everything; and the very leading questions as to her guilt put from the Bench were met with instantaneous alacrity of assent and explosions of laughter on the part of the accused which had to be accounted for, and on these jovialities in the dock, planned and pre-arranged for the purpose, her counsel framed a very pretty defence. True that the accused confessed everything; but then she was mad. She had on some occasions gone to the cemetery and had invoked the ghosts of her parents, who, according to her own account, dictated to her the confession of these crimes. The ingenious advocate passed over the fact that the prisoner's guilt was sufficiently proved by extraneous testimony apart from her confession. But he went on to argue—Look at the woman; observe her demeanour in Court; watch her convulsed by alternate fits of laughter and tears; take note of these unquestionable signs of madness. And so he went on, and at last moved the Court with a formal appeal. "Whereas the fact of insanity at the moment of the commission of crime excludes all culpability, and therefore all penalties; whereas the existence of insanity after the commission of crime is a bar to judgment; whereas in this case the evidence of experts will probably prove such insanity in the prisoner," &c. &c., the Court was moved to suspend all proceedings, as against Delpech, till these subjects were investigated. This hint will perhaps not be lost upon our legal practitioners; but the dodge met with little countenance from the French Judge, who immediately took the opinion of the prison doctor, who replied very distinctly that Delpech's madness was all simulated, and her grinning and laughter only got up for the occasion. As far as the Court went, the Ogress—for this is the nickname which Delpech has acquired—overdid her fictitious madness. But, as regards the jury, she partly succeeded. Knowing the nature of French folks, so susceptible of theatrical impressions, she had recourse to all the advantages which art and nature gave her. She appears to be a preternaturally hideous woman, and she is depicted in the report with remarkable powers of personal description, which lead us to suspect that the artists of the Daily Telegraph were subsidized for the occasion. In picturesque but not engaging language we are told of her tremendous black eyebrows, and her head turbaned with a yellow handkerchief; her huge prominent nose, fort et un peu plongeant; the hideous space between her broad nostrils and frightful mouth, traversed by cavernous wrinkles; and her charms are accentuated by long, sharp, bestial teeth, and a huge chin, which completes a savage and animal jaw. To the value of these personal advantages for playing the maniac our agreeable Delpech was not insensible; throughout the trial she grinned, she growled, she laughed demoniac laughter, and alternated with copious floods of tears; and for the two operations she kept two separate handkerchiefs, one to muffle her sobs of grief, and one to stifle her hilarity. Now and then she seems to have forgot her rôle, and interchanged the characters and handkerchiefs of this new version of Jean qui pleure and Jean qui rit. But even this mistake might be a stretch of artistic power, and though it had little effect on the unsympathetic Judge, it told—at least we suppose it told—on the jury; for though they found her guilty, it was under those convenient "extenuating circumstances" which have relieved the greatest criminal of the day from the extreme punishment of death.

Anyhow Delpech, though convicted, has only been punished with imprisonment and hard labour for life. What the extenuating circumstances may be which weighed with the Montauban jury we are only left to conjecture. Perhaps they were impressed with the feelings of one of the witnesses, who observed, with some plaintiveness, "What are poor folks to do who have many mouths to feed and no bread to give them?" an observation which the Judge characterized as "full of interest, but scarcely proper." Perhaps the jury thought, as has been suggested, that it was an extenuating circumstance that the Ogress murdered a round dozen of her fellow-creatures, and that she ought to have been guillotined if she had murdered only a single baby. Or, what is much more likely, they really were influenced by the plea of insanity. The influence which this plea exercises on stupid people like jurymen is subtle. It is not in this case that they really believed that Delpech was mad; but it had been alleged that she was mad. Whether this was so or not, the plea had at least this effect, that she might have been mad. Therefore the extenuating circumstances consisted, not in the fact of madness, but in the possibility of madness, and the allegation of madness. The confusion between a fact and a possibility raises what puzzle-headed people call a doubt, and they give the accused the benefit of this fiction which they dignify with the importance of a doubt, but which is in truth only mere stupid incapacity to distinguish between facts proved and possibilities suggested—a stupidity which is not confined to French jury-boxes.

On the whole, the results of this trial tend to reconcile us to what are undoubtedly defects in our own criminal proceedings. At Montauban we must admit that justice has failed, although the guilt of the accused was established with a certainty which is very seldom possible in our own Courts. It seems that in aiming at too much, and in endeavouring to invest human justice with the awful attributes of a Divine retribution, the main object of the French system runs the risk of defeating itself. Human passion, prejudice, caprice, pigheadedness, or what not, will have its say, and will interpose between what the advocate for the prosecution —in this case, the Procureur-Impérial—called the supreme and necessary expiation of crime. To what else are we to attribute the success of a remarkable and sensational dodge tried, and tried successfully, on behalf of one of these miserable culprits, a woman named Boyer? She, the only one of the eight prisoners, was acquitted absolutely, although the evidence against her, that of being a consenting party to abortion practised on her own person, was precisely the same as that which convicted others of the accused. Why was Boyer acquitted? Because of a coup de théâtre executed in open court, to which we should fail to do justice unless we produced it as reported in the French papers:—

> En me rappelant, ajoute le défenseur, le chiffre des victimes de la femme Delpech, je trouve un singulier contraste. La justice demande compte de neuf victimes, je défends une femme qui a donné neuf enfans à la société. Je ne puis pas vous les produire tous ici: trois sont morts. Mais les six autres sont ici.
>
> Les voilà: levez-vous, enfans de la femme Boyer, venez demander votre mère à messieurs les jurés (les enfans de l'accusée se tiennent un moment debout en poussant des sanglots), prouvez-leur que vous la regardez comme une bonne mère; dites combien vous l'aimez. (Agitation dans la salle.)
>
> M. LE PRÉSIDENT.—L'audience est suspendue pour quelques instans.

Before the jury retired, on being in the usual form asked whether she had anything to add to her defence, la femme Boyer neatly replied, "Je demande, messieurs, que vous me rendiez mes enfans." The jury were too polite and gallant not to accede to this amiable criminal's request, and this excellent parent of six living children, the mother of the Montauban Gracchuses who are to be, la femme Boyer, est acquittée.

THE UNIVERSITY BOAT-RACE.

ALL the remarks which it is necessary to make on the University boat-race from a professional point of view may be compressed into a very small space. The Cambridge crew were beaten, after a very gallant race, for two reasons. The first and most important was that they were decidedly weaker than their opponents; the difference in aggregate weight was only a stone and a half, but the Oxford men had undoubtedly greater propelling power, especially where it could be most effectually applied—namely, in the middle of the boat. The second reason was that Cambridge suffered the calamity of losing a man in the place which, of all the places in the boat except stroke, is least easily to be filled up at a moment's notice. To alter seven is to corrupt the purity of the stroke at its source; and in the race it was only too obvious that, although Mr. Still rowed with admirable pluck and steadiness, the time on the bow-side was distinctly uncertain after the first mile or so. This was enough to destroy any chance which Cambridge might have possessed. Considering that with these disadvantages Cambridge led at Hammersmith Bridge, and was finally beaten by not more than two or three lengths in a course of four miles and a half, one result seems to be obvious—namely, that in spite of a good many criticisms by various dogmatic writers, the Cambridge stylo must have been as good as that of their opponents. With two such serious drawbacks, they were able to hold their antagonists for two miles, and were finally beaten by a distance for which the want of strength and the want of training at, with one exception, the most important place in the boat, will more than sufficiently account. Hence it is no longer to be said, as was said for some years, that Cambridge knew so little about rowing that it mattered little how strong or well trained they might be. With Mr. Morrison's assistance they have surmounted that difficulty, at least for the time, and as they have at least an equal chance with their opponents of getting good raw material for another race, and now possess the art of putting on the required polish to an equal degree with their antagonists, there can be no reason why they should not win on the next occasion. The search into the causes of past failures is therefore unnecessary, though we must, in passing, protest against the theory that they have been due to any want of public spirit. There are more rowing men at Cambridge than at Oxford, and they are at least eager enough to distinguish themselves on the river. With so capable a trainer as Mr. Morrison, they ought to begin the next campaign with sufficient hopes of success.

There is another point of view from which the race will be regarded by the older spectators, and to which we will now proceed. The extraordinary interest which the race now excites in every class of the population is a really curious phenomenon. It is not singular that old oarsmen should look on with an emotion sometimes rising to the painful. No contest can be named which approaches it in dramatic interest. Youthful enthusiasm raised to boiling point has something very contagious about it, even for wheezy elders whose too solid flesh would melt under a tenth part of the strain. The visible display of stern determination to fight to the last gasp, manifested in a contest where no one has ever ventured to hint a suspicion of anything but scrupulous fairplay, is in its way very impressive. The boat-race is as superior to a horse-race in every element of interest except the vulgar element of money, as is our respect for a spirited lad to that which we feel for a horse owned by a tricky gambler. A struggle for pure honour between some of the finest specimens of youthful vigour in England is intrinsically a far more stirring spectacle than a contest in which horses merely supply the place of dice, with occasionally an awkward suspicion that they are loaded. We may easily account for the interest which leads even cabmen to adorn their whips with scraps of blue, and makes every little dirty boy on a London crossing chaff the wearers of the unfortunate colour. But there is the further and more difficult problem as to the advantage of such a national custom. When we have gone home and taken off our blue ribands, and sit down to justify the proceeding in cold blood, we begin to be sensible that a devil's advocate might find one or two awkward topics upon which to enlarge. The Times the other day took occasion to express a scepticism as to the value of our athletic sports in which most people are beginning to share, and, in so doing, suggested an argument which leads to some considerations worth noting. What, it said, is the value of all that cricket and rowing and running? Does it really even accomplish the purpose which is supposed to be its justification, of raising a breed of athletes superior to those of foreign countries? In attempting to answer this question, it noticed the alleged inferiority of the English army in marching, and said that whereas our students were far more athletic in their tastes than young Americans or Germans, the English soldier would have been unable to perform the feats of the Prussian army in 1866, or of Sherman's expedition across Georgia. The argument put in this way is obviously inconclusive. Assuming, for the sake of argument, that the British army is really worse at marching than its rivals, that fact depends on totally different circumstances. No one who knows anything of our pedestrians can doubt that they could perform much greater feats than those of the Prussian or American armies without the slightest difficulty. Sherman, for example, in his great march, advanced from ten to twenty miles a day, exclusive of halts, and thus moved 255 miles in six weeks, in an easy country. Any Alpine tourist, even if loaded with a rifle and a military knapsack, would laugh at such a task. But the difficulty of effecting marching feats with an army depends upon the obvious fact that the speed of the army must be limited by the marching powers of the average, or, if no stragglers are to be left, of the weakest part of its rank and file. If an English army is bad at marching, it may be owing to the want of training, or to the absurd system of dressing and weighting the private soldier; or, if these causes are not sufficient, to some radical incapacity in the classes from which the army is recruited. But the athletic exercises on which we pride ourselves are almost entirely confined to the upper classes. Our privates do not come from Eton or Harrow, and ploughmen or manufacturing artisans have generally as little chance of indulging in athletic exercises as in the Latin grammar. Certain games, and especially cricket, still flourish in the rural districts, and it is much to be wished that the labouring classes could be in such circumstances as to enjoy a little labour in sport as well as in earnest. In parts of the North, where wrestling and other manly games are still popular, there is a population of far greater physical vigour than that of the Southern counties. But it is plain that our present passion for athletic excellence is as little likely to affect the lower stratum of the population as the habit of drinking champagne, and for identical reasons. We might as well argue, in a parallel case, that the English race-horse is deteriorating because the horses in our omnibuses do less work than those in some foreign countries. There is, of course, a certain influence in proportion to the degree in which classes are intermixed, but within any limited time the influence amounts to nothing.

If, however, we reject this summary solution of the question, it suggests certain reflections as to the real value of a system whose effects are so closely restricted. Not only does the passion for athletic excellence influence only the highest class, but it influences only a part of the class, and its influence even upon them is of doubtful utility. This is merely one illustration of our characteristic mode of leaving everything to individual competition. Great energy is produced, but it acts in a very irregular and uncertain fashion. Thus no one can doubt that athletic exercise under certain conditions is a great want of our time. A Londoner of the middle or upper classes probably over-eats and over-drinks himself; he passes his whole life in sedentary occupations, and very likely moves to and from his business through a tunnel full of unsavoury gases. A few occasional gasps of fresh air and a little regular exercise to his muscles would be of the greatest service to him, and he is only able to get along as well as he does because he takes in supplies of those essentials of life in a summer holiday. As we are every day crowding more and more into great cities, our requirements of this kind are steadily increased; and it would doubtless be an excellent thing if in early life we acquired a taste for some beneficial exercise which would enable us every now and then to stretch our limbs and often our lungs. In this direction, so far is athletic exercise from being too popular, that it is neglected to a lamentable extent. The great majority of men are very far from making the best possible use of their physical capacities. Even if they have been active in youth, they soon grow fat, flabby, and pursy. By way, then, of remedying this evil, we encourage our finest young men to throw themselves into violent exercises with an exaggerated enthusiasm. If a lad of twenty is six feet high, and weighs thirteen stone, we exhort him to devote his whole time to cultivate the art of rowing; we gather in enormous crowds to applaud him if he is successful, and we make him a popular hero with a certain class of like-minded persons, until he is forced by other duties to abandon the river. If, on the other hand, he is nearer five feet in height, and weighs four or five stone less, he has no encouragement to develop the small amount of muscle which providence has bestowed upon him, and he abandons himself in sheer disgust to idleness, or even to intellectual pursuits. Our system of teaching is precisely analogous. A clever lad at English schools and colleges is encouraged to work hard at every stage of his career by prizes, exhibitions, and fellowships, or public employment. The stupid lad is left to his stupidity. Our schools advertise themselves, not by the high level to which they have succeeded in raising their inferior scholars, but by the few clever scholars whom they have been able to stimulate into special activity; and, as a natural result, it is the worst fault of English schools, as has been remarked by all qualified observers, that whilst the best boys are equal to those in any country, the ordinary level is disgracefully low. It is the essential weakness of any purely competitive system that it puts a few persons under an artificial system of forcing, and leaves the great mass to follow their own devices. There are some cases in which it may be fairly doubted which class is most likely to be injured.

We have strayed rather far from our immediate text; but, to return to the University boat-race, we may confess that, with all its faults, we cannot conceal a sneaking affection for it. It gives so much pleasure to so many people, including, after a day or two, the defeated crew, and is in many respects so impressive a spectacle, that we should be sorry to see its charm decay. We have said enough to prove that we are not insensible to some of its evils, though it is hard to say how they should be remedied. Perhaps the only moral is the very obvious one, that athletic sports have reached a point at which the object of school and college authorities should be to regulate rather than to encourage them. They are coming, we believe, to be sensible of this necessity, and we hope that the undue stimulus which has succeeded to undue repression will in time be replaced by a more sensible and moderate system. There is, however, one more evil which may be directly noticed. It is with sincere regret that every lover of honourable sport must see that the state of the odds on the University race is gradually creeping into the regular quotations of betting. If ever the races should become a subject of gambling speculation, we may be quite certain that they will be thoroughly demoralizing and degrading. Rowing is probably freer from this dangerous influence than any other sport; but if it should make its way into any department of amateur competition, it will probably end by affecting all. Nothing is of greater importance than that every tendency in that direction should be carefully watched, and, if possible, arrested with all possible energy. The evil is still insignificant, which gives the better hope for putting it down at the very outset. The first time that a University or College boat-race is even suspected of being affected by the malign influence of betting men, the institution may be looked upon as doomed to destruction.

ALLEGED INCREASE OF LUNACY

WE often hear people assuming that lunacy is more common than it used to be, and speculating upon the causes of the supposed increase. Sometimes it is ascribed to education, sometimes to religion, and more frequently to the railways or the telegraph. The conception of proper treatment for lunatics is modern, and provision for giving practical effect to it belongs to the present century; and perhaps Providence has ordained that the number of subjects for treatment should increase in order to prevent so much good philanthropy from being wasted. It is probably correct to say that the middle and upper classes of Englishmen are more temperate than they were a century ago, and it would be disappointing to conclude that those who used only to get drunk now go mad. We are told that politics and statesmanship do not produce many lunatics, neither does law, literature, or the fine arts. We know that clergymen sometimes make their hearers mad, but we do not know that they go mad themselves. The army and navy send few patients to asylums; and, on the whole, it is concluded that intense devotion to business is the chief cause of madness. The speed at which we live is said to be too high, and if a man comes up to business by express train in the morning, receives and answers telegrams all day, and returns home by express train in the evening, it is supposed that his brain must be in process of deterioration. Another conjecture is that people have too much pleasure or too much variety in life, and that the best preservative of a sound mind was the dulness of a country town of the last century.

The statement that lunacy is increasing would be highly important if true, but we have some reason to think that it is not true. It is matter of common knowledge that lunatics have been very much looked up during the last twenty or thirty years, and it may be that the supposed increase in their numbers is merely the result of greater accuracy in registration. A considerable degree of accuracy has now been attained, and inaccuracy, even if it exists, does not affect the present question, because the belief in the supposed increase of lunacy, unless it is mere vague conjecture, must be founded upon such statistics as can be procured; and these statistics, as we shall proceed to show, do not support this belief, but disprove it. In short, it is a popular delusion to suppose that the spread of intelligence and progress in the arts of life renders this generation more liable than its predecessors to brain disease. This subject was discussed at a recent meeting of the Medico-Psychological Association, and a paper read before that meeting by Dr. C. Lockhart Robertson exhibited the results of examination of the returns, upon which alone a trustworthy opinion can be formed. This paper admitted that a general belief in the increase of lunacy existed, and had some apparent justification. The grand total of the insane of all classes, detained in asylums, in workhouses, and in private dwellings, was, in 1844, 20,611, and, in 1868, 50,118. Thus in twenty-five years the number of registered lunatics has more than doubled. And if we compare the number of lunatics with the total population of the country, we shall find that in 1844 the ratio was 1 in 802, while in 1868 it was 1 in 432. The statistics of France exhibit a similar result. The total number of the insane in that country increased, from 1 in 796 in 1851, to 1 in 444 in 1861. It is remarkable that the proportion of registered lunatics to population in England and France should be almost exactly the same, being in the former country 1 in 432, and in the latter 1 in 444. In explanation of the apparent increase of lunacy in England, it is to be observed that, previously to 1844, no statistical record existed of the number of the insane in England. The returns made in that year were considered by the Commissioners in Lunacy "plainly insufficient for general deductions." Again, the returns for 1847 were stated by the Commissioners to be "notoriously imperfect, falling far short of the actual amount." As regards pauper lunatics, there was until recently no official system of registration. County asylums have only been established since 1845, and the greater care bestowed on the insane poor since that time has produced a more accurate knowledge of their numbers, as well as of their condition. But as regards private patients in asylums belonging to the middle and upper classes, an accurate registration has been enforced for a longer time, and the number of these patients in proportion to population has not increased. In 1858 the number was 4,612, and the proportion was 1 in 4,164; in 1868 the number was 5,244, and the proportion was 1 in 4,065. These figures ought to make an end of all theories which ascribe the supposed increase of mental disease to particular habits or tendencies of our age. It cannot be education, nor business, nor politics, nor awakening sermons, nor express trains, nor telegrams, because the classes of society which enjoy or suffer these things do not, in fact, go mad more frequently than they used to do. The increase of lunacy has taken place, if it has taken place at all, among the poorer classes, who live now nearly as they lived a hundred years ago. But the increase among these classes has been apparent and not real. If Mr. Gladstone's Irish Church Bill passes as he has brought it in, there is likely to be an apparent increase in the number of pauper lunatics in Ireland, but we do not suppose there will be a real increase. And the apparent increase of pauper lunatics in England is an increase in a decreasing ratio. Thus, in the period 1844–9 the increase in the number of inmates of asylums in England—which increase, as we have seen, belonged to the pauper element—was in the ratio of 5.64 per cent. But in the period 1864–8 the ratio of increase was 3.82 per cent. In France also the increase in the number of inmates of asylums has been, on a comparison of the same periods, in nearly the same decreasing ratio. Thus, as Dr. Robertson says, "if mental disease be on the increase, it is at least satisfactory to find that the annual increase, both in England and in France, is in a decreasing ratio." A similar conclusion may be obtained by examining the numbers of admissions to asylums both in England and France. The result of the French returns is clearly stated by an official writer, quoted by Dr. Robertson:—

> Ainsi la proportion d'accroissement, après s'être élevée à 7.94 p. 100 vers 1838, date de la loi relative au traitement des aliénés indigents, est successivement descendue à 3.83 et à 2 p. 100. On trouve dans cette diminution graduelle la preuve bien manifeste que l'accroissement si considérable des admissions est un fait tout à fait temporaire, et qui tient, en grande partie, à l'action bienfaisante de la loi précitée. Pour satisfaire aux prescriptions de cette loi, qui a obligé chaque département à faire traiter ses aliénés indigents, les asiles ont été agrandis, multipliés, améliorés, et le nombre des admis s'y est naturellement accru.

The number of admissions to English asylums was largely affected by the passing of the Act of Parliament of 1861, rendering pauper lunatics chargeable upon the common fund of the union, instead of upon their parishes. The fear of burdening the parish rates now ceased to influence the action of parochial authorities, and accordingly we find that in the years 1863–5 there was an increase of nearly 10 per cent. in the admissions to asylums. But in late years the rate of increase has been considerably reduced. It must be remembered, too, that this increase of admission is a mere transfer from workhouses and private dwellings to asylums. The management of pauper lunatic asylums is most creditable to the humanity and scientific skill of their medical superintendents, and the experience gained in them has contributed to the amelioration of the treatment of the insane of the upper and middle classes. These satisfactory results cannot of course be obtained without paying for them, and the cry which is going up for a diminution of the burden of county rates may possibly produce some interference with the views which enlightened philanthropy entertains as to the proper mode of treating pauper lunatics. It seems probable that financial boards will be constituted in counties, and that ratepayers will have a voice in deciding questions which have hitherto been settled by a committee of magistrates. We doubt whether the representative vestryman is likely to act in harmony with the medical superintendent of a pauper lunatic asylum. It is a mistake to assume that expenditure upon these asylums is not true economy; but it is a mistake which uninstructed minds are very likely to fall into. But whatever conflicts may be in store for medical officers of lunatic asylums in England, we foresee that in Ireland, under Mr. Gladstone's Bill, they will find a paradise. They are to be invited to help to spend the surplus property of the disendowed Church, and we venture to believe that they will be found equal to the occasion. The pauper lunatic asylums of Ireland are likely to become models of complete arrangement and scientific management, and although we do not suppose that people will pretend madness to gain admission to them, we do suppose that pauperism will be assumed in order to obtain gratuitous maintenance and medical treatment for persons who ought to pay for it. In any asylum in England now the condition of a pauper lunatic is incomparably preferable to that of the most wealthy lunatics in any asylum of the last century. Indeed, the most wealthy lunatics were frequently the worst treated. Perhaps lunatics and idiots who remained in their own homes were treated better than those who were placed in asylums. The feelings of humanity would assert themselves in uninstructed bosoms, and it was only a pretended science that applied systematic cruelty to that portion of mankind which most deserved the pity of its fellows. There has been no more remarkable change of ideas than that which has almost banished from lunatic asylums the whole apparatus of restraint. It would be melancholy to think that, along with so great improvement in the treatment of mental disease, there is a tendency in advancing civilization to multiply the subjects of it. But Dr. Robertson has shown that this opinion, although not destitute of apparent foundation, is erroneous.

REVIEWS.

THE GLADSTONE GOVERNMENT.*

THE author of The Gladstone Government may be entirely acquitted of the indelicacy or intrusiveness which too often affects biographical notices of contemporary statesmen. He evidently knows nothing of the members of the Cabinet which is not equally familiar to newspaper readers who may be curious enough to study any Parliamentary Companion or Compendium. His dates and statements appear to be generally accurate, although he has not mentioned Mr. Gladstone's opposition to the Ecclesiastical Titles Bill, his bitter hostility to Lord Palmerston's first Administration, or his support of Lord Derby in the decisive division which restored Lord Palmerston and Mr. Gladstone himself to office in 1859. The style of the writer, who is probably a newspaper reporter, would seem to indicate the inexperience of youth, if his own statement that he has for three-and-twenty years been an advocate of the Ballot had not shown that he must have attained middle age. When the judicious reader is informed that on a change of Government "telegraphs flashed, express trains conveyed candidates for office to the announced rendezvous in the metropolis," "the private residence of the member for Greenwich, 11 Carlton Terrace, became the cynosure of," &c., an immediate and just suspicion arises that the author has nothing more important to communicate. Telegraphs "flash" the message that a man has forgotten his railway rug, or that he will not be in time for dinner, not less rapidly than an invitation to take office in a new Government. Express trains run every day at the same hour, with the same speed; and the interest which is felt in Mr. Gladstone's proceedings is entirely unconnected with the street where he lives, or the number of his house. The book, if it is neither profound nor instructive, may be recommended as perfectly harmless, and probably it may be found entertaining by the numerous persons who appreciate a reproduction of their own knowledge and opinions. The writer is neither illiterate nor violent, and he believes in the fashionable doctrines of Liberalism, though he has some personal leaning to Mr. Disraeli. The most original or the oddest passage in the book contains a censure on Mr. Gladstone's Neapolitan pamphlet, and an implied apology for the almost forgotten atrocities of the detestable Ferdinand. A paradox, suggested perhaps by some accidental circumstances of commercial or family tradition, forms a pleasant interruption to the stream of commonplace. Sometimes, indeed, platitudes excite a momentary interest from some special ineptitude. It seems that "it was in more ways than one, as it happened, an exceedingly odd, if it were not even a wholly unparalleled distinction, his (Lord De Grey's) having been born thus during the period of his father's Premiership." Being born "thus" means being born in 1827, a year in which many others besides Lord De Grey, including one or two of his colleagues, were also born. The odds are indeed against the birth of any man during his father's Premiership, because Prime Ministers are rare, even if they were not in most cases elderly men. If Pitt had had children, some of them would probably have been born when he was Prime Minister from the age of twenty-four to forty-two. Addington or Perceval might possibly have anticipated the achievement of Lord Goderich; Lord Grenville and Lord Liverpool were childless; the Duke of Portland, the Duke of Wellington, Lord Grey, and Sir Robert Peel became Prime Ministers many years after their respective marriages. Lord Kimberley's mission to Copenhagen in 1863 is expanded into an attempt to adjust "those extraordinary dynastic and international complications known as the Schleswig-Holstein question—a gordian knot impossible to be unravelled as the event proved, and only to be snapped asunder at last, and shattered to atoms, by the blinding fusillade of the Prussian needle-guns on the field of Sadowa." The blinding quality of the musketry at Sadowa would be as little to the purpose as the flashing of telegraphic messages from Carlton Terrace, even if the gordian knot of Schleswig-Holstein had not been cut by the Danish war, while Prussia and Austria were still allies. A tendency to turn off on every siding, with a loud whistle and discharge of steam, is one of the commonest defects of unskilful writers. If it was worth while to discuss Lord Kimberley's career, it must have been desirable to keep to the subject, instead of digressing into flourishes about gordian knots and needle-guns.

If any of the members of the Cabinet have time to look at The Gladstone Government, they may derive from it a tolerably just representation of the current estimate of their several characters. The space devoted to Mr. Gladstone, consisting of more than one third of the volume, fully corresponds to his preponderance over his colleagues in general popularity. It would be difficult to attract public attention by an elaborate analysis of the intellectual or moral peculiarities of Mr. Bruce, Lord Hartington, or Mr. Goschen; but Englishmen in general are never tired of discussing Mr. Gladstone. His present critic, as a Londoner, and probably a frequenter of the gallery of the House of Commons, is not contented with the vague and indiscriminate admiration which may be entertained for Mr. Gladstone in remoter districts. He is fully aware that the Prime Minister is sensitive and impulsive, and he ventures to hint that his speeches are sometimes wordy. He has even had the enterprise to read Mr. Gladstone's political and literary writings, including his "inflammatory pamphlet" on Naples. In future times Mr. Gladstone's written compositions will be forgotten, unless they are preserved as curiosities. The author of The Gladstone Government prefers to the singular book on Homer the criticism which, amongst its other merits, proves that Mr. Gladstone has never discovered that the author of Ecce Homo belongs to the theological school of Renan. The Cabinet includes only two avowed authors, although Mr. Lowe is believed to have been one of the most vigorous and voluminous of political writers. The Duke of Argyll has made a more ambitious use of his scientific acquirements, and of his considerable intellectual power. Following in the track of Cicero and of the teachers of Cicero, of Paley, and of the authors of the Bridgwater Treatises, he has satisfactorily demonstrated that the mechanism of a bird's wing is adapted to the purpose of flying. If this contribution to human knowledge is not extraordinarily valuable, it is nevertheless satisfactory to be assured that the Secretary of State for India combines the faculty of generalization with the industry which masters details.

The indirect process of selection by which men rise to the rank of Cabinet Ministers is one of the soundest parts of the English Constitution. It often happens that a capable candidate for office is for a time disappointed; and it is impossible, and perhaps not uniformly desirable, to exclude occasional mediocrity; but, on the whole, every party is represented by members whose general superiority is universally acknowledged. The result can be attained only by the competition of responsible Parliamentary government. In America Ministers and Presidents are appointed almost at random; and in France every ambitious politician thinks himself the equal of the fortunate objects of Imperial favour. In England, for many years past, the front benches on either side of the Speaker, or of the woolsack, or the seats below the gangway, which have now and then been selected by a third party of candidates for power, have been occupied by the real and acknowledged leaders of the community, as well as of the Parliament. With the exception of Mr. Cobden, who more than once declined office, every considerable politician has made his way to the Cabinet. Sir Robert Peel, Sir James Graham, Lord John Russell, Lord Derby, and Lord Palmerston would at different times have been raised to power by general acclamation, if they had not been placed in high office by the operation of a more refined machinery. Mr. Disraeli and Mr. Gladstone are allowed, even by their detractors, to be the undoubted chiefs of their respective parties. The discretion exercised by a Prime Minister in the choice of his colleagues, though it is confined within narrow limits, affords an additional security for personal competence. His sagacity is more fully tested by the selection of subordinates, to whom he gives the opportunity of proving, during their apprenticeship, their fitness for future promotion. All the younger members of the small and powerful party which once was known as Peelite had been picked out from the ranks of Parliament by Sir Robert Peel. Three years after the death of their master, although they had in the meantime incurred unbounded popular odium by their resistance to the Papal Aggression mania, they were strong enough in ability and character to claim half the seats in a Cabinet representing a coalition with the dominant Whigs. It is true that young men of rank are, in the words of Burke, sometimes rocked and dandled into statesmanship, but in many instances their early advantages of political education give them in after years a real superiority over less fortunate contemporaries; and, as English society has been hitherto constituted, rank and wealth and connexion contribute additional strength to a party or to a Government. There were many men in England more brilliant and more vigorous than Lord Lansdowne during the half-century which intervened between his first entrance into the Cabinet and his death; but long experience gave him a large knowledge of and his genial temper and perfect manner enabled him to influence political allies, and often to conciliate opponents. It is not desirable that a courtly magnate should be Prime Minister, unless he possesses more solid qualities; but it may often happen that he is one of the most useful members of a Cabinet, especially as the majority of his colleagues will have been appointed for entirely different reasons.

If it were possible to combine good taste with minute personal criticism, some of the members of the present Government would furnish materials for a study which has not been attempted by the author of The Gladstone Government. The interest of Mr. Gladstone's complex and peculiar character is proved to be inexhaustible by the constant psychological disquisitions on his merits and defects which form no inconsiderable part of general conversation; but a sacred rule of morals and good breeding prohibits the utterance, before the faces of men, of many criticisms which may be legitimately pronounced behind their backs. It is not permissible to discuss in public the more subtle judgment of a statesman's character which may have been deduced from his public acts. The conjectural investigation of motives and tendencies may be erroneous, and, unless it results in unmixed eulogy, it can scarcely fail to be offensive. Nothing but good should be said of the living in their actual or possible hearing. To an eminent man of a sensitive disposition it must be sufficiently disagreeable to know that every day a thousand formal parties and casual assemblages are enlivened by amateur lectures on his moral and spiritual physiology. Hereafter Mr. Gladstone's survivors will have the opportunity of repeating to the world at large the numerous observations which have been collected by industrious inquirers; but posterity will forget the alleged weaknesses and oddities of a statesman who will by universal consent receive the credit of extraordinary faculties,

After the Prime Minister, the most attractive topic for an andrologist or student of men would be undoubtedly the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The author of The Gladstone Government condescendingly prophesies that Mr. Lowe, from being a brilliant orator, will become a successful administrator. There is every reason to hope that one of the shrewdest and soundest of intellects will be suitably employed in the management of the finances. Some statesmen are conspicuous for their ability in dealing with men, while purely logical intellects apply themselves by preference to principles and to practical business. Mr. Lowe's gifts are administrative or legislative, rather than diplomatic. It is his tendency to arrive at definite conclusions which may be supported by forcible arguments, and not to win over obstinate adversaries or dull adherents by persuasion or compromise. No man has been more consistently Liberal, if Liberalism consists in exemption from political superstition. His antipathy to cant was conspicuously exhibited in his opposition to a Reform Bill which three-fourths of the House of Commons regarded with open or concealed aversion. A calmer appreciation of human nature might perhaps have suggested that, when large bodies of men conceal their thoughts, there are motives or reasons for what they say, as well as for what they think. The world is not exclusively governed by sound propositions, or by conclusive demonstrations; but the keenness of Mr. Lowe's intellectual vision, and the logical accuracy of his mind, may be counted among the most effective forces at the disposal of the Government. The Gladstone Government will at least remind its readers of the names, the ages, and the public experience of an unusually able body of Ministers.

COLERIDGE'S MEMOIR OF KEBLE.*

MR. KEBLE has been fortunate in his biographer. There have been since his death various attempts to appreciate a character manifestly of such depth and interest, yet about which outsiders could find so little to say. Professor Shairp, of St. Andrews, two or three years ago gave a charming little sketch, full of heart and insight, and full too of noble modesty and reverence, which deserves to be rescued from the danger of being forgotten into which sketches are apt to fall, both on account of its direct subject, and also for the contemporary evidence which it contains of the impressions made on a perfectly impartial and intelligent observer by the early events of the Oxford movement. The brilliant Dean of Westminster, in Macmillan, has attempted, with his usual grace and kindliness, to do justice to Keble's character, and has shown how hard he found the task. The paper on Keble forms a pendant to a recent paper on Dean Milman. The two papers show conspicuously the measure and range of Dr. Stanley's power; what he can comprehend and appreciate in religious earnestness and height, and what he cannot; in what shapes, as in Dean Milman, he can thoroughly sympathize with it and grasp it, and where its phenomena, as in Mr. Keble, simply perplex and baffle him, and carry him out of his depth. Sir John Coleridge knew Keble probably as long and as intimately as any one; and on the whole, he had the most entire sympathy with his friend's spirit, even where he disagreed with his opinions. He thoroughly understood and valued the real and living unity of a character which mostly revealed itself to the outer world by what seemed jerks and discordant traits. From early youth, through manhood to old age, he had watched and tested and loved that varied play and harmony of soul and mind, which was sometimes tender, sometimes stern, sometimes playful, sometimes eager; abounding with flashes of real genius, and yet always inclining by instinctive preference to things homely and humble; but which was always sound and unselfish and thorough, endeavouring to subject itself to the truth and will of God. To Sir John Coleridge all this was before him habitually as a whole; he could take it in, not by putting piece by piece together, but because he saw it. And besides being an old and affectionate and intelligent friend, he was also a discriminating one. In his circumstances he was as opposite to Keble as any one could be; he was a lawyer and a man of the world, whose busy life at Westminster had little in common with the studies or pursuits of the divine and the country parson.
